Assessment of Otunbayeva: The opposition forces selected Otunbayeva for several reasons: (i) among them she is the only figure who commands recognition and respect abroad; (ii) in the eyes of the Kyrgyz people she is closely associated with the Kyrgyz Tulip Revolution of 2005, yet she alone among the leaders of that revolution upheld its idealism, openly castigated Bakiyev and others for their corruption and failure to follow through on promises, and personally avoided corruption and graft; and (iii) she lacks a strong domestic power base and therefore is seen as less of a threat to the alternative candidates. Based on these factors, several of the opposition leaders tell me a quick consensus was reached that Otunbayeva should be the provisional leader and the "face to the world" of the new revolution.

Otunbayeva, who is 59, launched her career in the diplomatic service, obtaining the position of foreign minister of the Kyrgyz SSR at a precocious age. She served in the Soviet Foreign Ministry and caught the eye of Eduard Shevardnadze, who appointed her as a vice minister—an unprecedented accomplishment for a Central Asian and for a woman then in her late 30s. Shevardnadze told me in 2002 that he had viewed Otunbayeva as a person of extraordinary skills, well qualified to succeed him as Soviet foreign minister. He noted her ability quickly to grasp complex problems and to propose novel and interesting solutions. He called her a "natural diplomat" with an instinctive tendency to reconcile, but also with a clear grasp of policy objectives and a methodical approach to their accomplishment. My own experience in dealing with Otunbayeva confirms these observations. She has a measure of idealism that often guides her policy orientation, but she is instinctively pragmatic in her approach.

Otunbayeva defles categorization in terms of political philosophy. Her political parties, first Ata-Jurt ("Fatherland"), then the Social Democrats, are often portrayed as "leftists" on the political scale in Kyrgyzstan, but the party orients itself to continental European social democrats and to the British Labour Party (with which Otunbayeva has solid connections, including with Tony Blair). While schooled in basic concepts of Marxism-Leninism, which occasionally appear in conversation (though often as not in a joking way), her politics is fundamentally one of pragmatic engagement. She advocates maintenance of the republic's Soviet era social net and pays particular attention to health and education issues. She was a vigorous advocate for and supporter of the American University in Bishkek and was repeatedly identified for board membership—she declined one offer saying that her role as an opposition leader would probably complicate the university's relations with the government. As ambassador, Otunbayeva went to bat aggressively for foreign investors, helped them secure concessions, and advocated for them against government red tape. I am unaware of any instance in which she ever sought personal gain or advancement in connection with these deals, however. She is very unusual among Kyrgyz political figures in her rejection of rent-seeking and her loud denunciation of political figures who use their office for personal gain. Indeed, this aspect of her personality has won her some respect in the public, but general disdain among the political class, who frequently disparage her as "unrealistic."
