RELEASE IN FULL

SUBJECT: Diplomatic and strategic lessons from Vietnam for Extrication from Afghanistan

The similarities between the U.S. dilemma in Afghanistan today and its dilemma in Vietnam forty years ago suggest useful lessons. The strategy the Nixon administration eventually adopted managed to extricate the United States from the war in early 1973 but failed to head off a South Vietnamese collapse two years later. In today's different environment, a similar strategy of extrication should work better, permitting both U.S. withdrawal and the maintenance of acceptable local conditions following our departure. To improve the odds of achieving both these goals simultaneously, however, it will be important to blur the outlines of U.S. troop withdrawals with careful public rhetoric and diplomacy, cover the strategic retreat with tactical advances, and remain committed to Afghanistan even after U.S. combat troops have been withdrawn.

Nixon's Military Strategy

Coming to office in January 1969, Nixon initially decided to pursue a familiar goal—a negotiated settlement with the Communists that left the South Vietnamese regime intact and secure—with new means: expanded military operations, engagement with Moscow to restrain its North Vietnamese proxy, and attempts to transfer the capacity and responsibility for fighting to the South Vietnamese themselves.

But the first Nixon strategy failed, because the North Vietnamese did not give in. And rather than buy time for extended diplomacy, limited American troop withdrawals (begun in June) whetted rather than satisfied public desire for more. So by the end of 1969, Nixon and Kissinger devised what might be termed the second Nixon strategy, the goal of which was American extrication from the war no later than the end of 1972, in time for the next presidential election. This new approach consisted of gradual but steady U.S. troop withdrawals along with formal protection of the Thieu regime, together with a concerted effort to enshrine these elements in a negotiated settlement.

In the spring of 1969, there were almost 550,000 American troops in Vietnam. By the end of 1970, this number had dropped to 280,000; by the end of 1971, to 150,000; and by late spring 1972, to fewer than 70,000. Because the Communists had not stopped fighting, the only way for the troop withdrawals not to lead to an enemy victory was to have them replaced with something else. A vital part of the replacement package was aid and training for the South Vietnamese army (ARVN). Still, this alone could not create a true bulwark in the time allotted. So the Nixon administration supplemented aid to ARVN with other measures to keep the Communists off balance and entice them into a negotiated agreement.

One set of actions sought to make progress in counterinsurgency, including intensified efforts to "pacify" the South. Another set of actions constituted, in effect, a proactive defense. Rather than wait passively for new Communist attacks to emerge, the administration sought to disrupt them by striking at the base areas from which the attacks would be launched. So even as U.S. troop withdrawals undermined the long-term security of the Thieu regime, other U.S. measures made sure that regime was protected over the short term.

The Diplomatic Dimension

The administration followed the same pattern at the negotiating table. Kissinger met repeatedly in secret with the North Vietnamese in an attempt to formalize the American extrication in a written agreement, at first to little avail. In September 1970, Nixon and Kissinger went so far as to agree that the North's troops could remain after a settlement in the parts of the South they controlled. Any agreement based on such a "cease-fire-in-place" would make eventual Communist victory likely absent continued U.S. involvement in the war. But the North Vietnamese remained intransigent, demanding the one concession American leaders refused to make—direct betrayal of Thieu in the short term.

Thanks to an intricate sequence of events in a changed international context (marked by détente with the Soviets and the U.S. opening to China), the second Nixon strategy eventually resulted in the 1973 Paris Accords. The process began in the spring of 1972, when the North Vietnamese—eager to take advantage of the near-complete withdrawal of U.S. ground troops—launched a massive attack on the South. This Easter Offensive made significant advances at first, but was eventually halted by a combination of ARVN resistance, American tactical air support, and American strategic bombing. By late summer 1972, the North Vietnamese, facing few opportunities for further military success and calculating that Nixon might be more motivated to cut a deal before reelection than after it, appeared willing to continue their struggle on the political front alone for a while. The Nixon administration, for its part, wanted to take credit for ending the war during its first term—and if still unwilling to dump Thieu, was nonetheless prepared to make further concessions affecting the long-term viability of his regime. Under these conditions, the negotiations began to move forward.

The United States agreed to accept the formation of a tripartite electoral commission—made up of the Thieu government, southern neutralists, and the Viet Cong—which would be formally responsible for handling political issues remaining in the South following a cease-fire-in-place. The North Vietnamese agreed to permit the continuation of the Thieu regime—as long as the legitimacy of the southern Communists' political entity, the PRG, was acknowledged as well. By mid-October, Kissinger and his counterpart Le Duc Tho had worked out a draft agreement calling for the removal of the remaining U.S. troops and the return of the U.S. prisoners of war within sixty days after a cease-fire. Both men agreed to be responsible for the compliance of their respective sides in the conflict and they set a signing date for the end of October.

When Thieu realized that the Americans were serious about making a deal, however, he refused to cooperate, so the negotiations stalled. As the 1972 American presidential election came and went, the deadlock remained. Tantalized and frustrated by the prospect of a settlement just out of reach, Nixon and his advisers decided on a final pair of moves to end the war. First, to corral Thieu, they ordered a massive quick infusion of aid to the South and secretly promised him they would "respond with full force" to any Communist violations of the accords, while at the same time explicitly threatening to abandon him if he didn't fall into line. Second, to get the North Vietnamese back to the table, they ordered a new round of devastating air strikes. This "Christmas Bombing" succeeded in the limited goals of extracting a few minor concessions, compelling a North Vietnamese signature, and showing everybody that Nixon could buck public outrage. It also helped cover up American insistence that the South sign an agreement similar to the one negotiated in October.

Pulling along a reluctant ally and enemy, the United States signed the Paris Accords on January 27, 1973, formally extricating itself from the Vietnam War. The Nixon administration's policies had enabled the United States to get its troops out and its prisoners back without directly betraying its client—though the conditions of the agreement left that client acutely vulnerable.

The Aftermath

The Nixon administration came to office recognizing that America's global economic position had declined in recent years and wanting to bring America's commitments into line with its reduced capabilities. This general attitude not only reinforced the domestic imperative of withdrawal from Vietnam; it also guided the policy of détente with the Soviet Union and the administration's opening to China. Yet Nixon and Kissinger understood that retrenchment came with its own dangers, and wanted to make sure that in Vietnam and elsewhere, their retreat did not become a rout.

The central problem the administration faced in Vietnam, therefore, was how to extricate the United States from the war without looking too bad. Nixon and Kissinger first tried to win by escalating, bluffing, and negotiating. When that approach achieved little, they decided to disengage unilaterally while continuing to protect the Thieu regime. Such a gradual withdrawal might spell eventual doom for a non-Communist South Vietnam, but if the U.S. could credibly say that it had not betrayed an ally, the international ramifications and humiliation of such an outcome would be diminished—and that seems to have been senior policymakers' chief concern.

In August 1972, for example, Nixon privately told Kissinger, "Let's be perfectly cold-blooded about it. . . . South Vietnam probably is never gonna survive anyway. . . . [C]an we have a viable foreign policy if a year from now or two years from now, North Vietnam gobbles up South Vietnam? That's the real question." Kissinger replied, "We can have a viable foreign policy if it looks as if it's the result of South Vietnamese incompetence. . . . So we've got to find some formula that holds the thing together a year or two, after which—after a year, Mr. President, Vietnam will be a backwater."

Yet if Nixon and Kissinger accepted the possibility of an eventual South Vietnamese collapse, they hoped it could somehow be avoided and sincerely intended to do what they could to keep it at bay. They were unable to do so, however, largely because of Congressional insistence on cutting Saigon loose following the Paris Accords and the administration's own weakness and distraction stemming from the Watergate scandal.

In June 1973 Congress ordered that all U.S. military operations in Indochina cease by the end of the summer, and in November passed the War Powers Act restricting the president's ability to send troops into battle without congressional authorization. Congress also cut the aid the United States gave to South Vietnam, from about $2.3 billion in 1973 to about $1 billion in 1974 and still less after that.

The local belligerents had continued small-scale fighting even after the accords were signed, and in October 1974, the North Vietnamese leadership met to consider plans for future operations. The conference resolution summarized their conclusion: "Now that the United States has pulled out of the South, it will be hard for them to jump back in." So they attacked. Saigon made some clumsy moves in response, at which point the North stepped up its offensive and never stopped. Thieu outlasted Nixon by eight months, and on May Day 1975, Communist soldiers hoisted their flag above the erstwhile capital of South Vietnam, now Ho Chi Minh City.

Many have argued that this outcome was inevitable. Nixon and Kissinger have always taken the opposite position. The truth is somewhere in the middle. If events in Washington had played out differently—with Watergate not crippling the administration and with Congress less hell-bent on slamming the door behind the departing U.S. ground troops—Nixon might have been able to continue sending enough aid and airpower to keep the Thieu regime in power. Yet as Nixon and Kissinger knew full well, the settlement they had negotiated left the South vulnerable to future attacks, and it was precisely because a guarantee of renewed U.S. military intervention would have been political poison that Nixon had to keep his final promises of continued support to Thieu secret. Even without Watergate, in other words, it would have been difficult for the Nixon administration to counter northern actions.

The Implications of the Vietnam Experience for U.S. Policy in Afghanistan

In many ways, the situation today is similar to the situation four decades ago:

- Then as now, the United States finds itself embroiled in a thankless counterinsurgency in a remote theater of operations with little intrinsic strategic importance.
- Then as now, the enemy we are confronting appears capable, implacable, and unwilling to accept defeat or negotiate a partial solution—and is tied to a global anti-American ideological movement.
- Then as now, our local ally is relatively ineffective, corrupt, and difficult to deal with—and there seems little prospect of nurturing a robust friendly local political order in a reasonable period of time.
- Then as now, the enemy can make use of easily accessible sanctuaries in a neighboring country as bases of operations and staging areas for attacks.
- Then as now, the American public has tired of the war.

- Then as now, the U.S. global economic position is declining and a broader policy of grand strategic reorientation is under consideration.
- Then as now, a new administration has been elected with the de facto mandate of cleaning up the mess left behind by its predecessor, and has tried initially to end the war on positive terms through a new strategy—which has not yielded any settlement.

The good news is that the differences between the Vietnam and Afghanistan situations make the latter significantly more promising:

- The enemy is weaker today, more like the southern guerrilla forces in Vietnam than the regular northern conventional army that conquered Saigon.
- Domestic U.S. opposition to continued participation in the war effort today is less fervent, giving the administration more breathing room and making another forced abandonment of our local ally improbable.
- The administration's political position and the U.S. global position are both stronger.

All this suggests that it should be possible to achieve a more successful extrication this time around—one that not only withdraws U.S. ground combat forces from battle, but also protects U.S. interests in the area afterward.

A Successful Extrication

The key to pulling off such a feat lies in facing the situation squarely and acknowledging honestly (at least in private) the nature of the policy choice being made. Extrication is not victory, nor is it persistence (which essentially is hanging on in the hopes of eventual victory). It does not involve “conditions-based withdrawal,” at least if those conditions are defined as “having a high degree of confidence that the major objectives of the war have been sustainably achieved.” Extrication involves moving toward withdrawal even if such conditions have not been fully achieved. But nor is extrication the same as concession. Extrication is a policy designed to remove U.S. ground forces from combat without having that removal lead to defeat, whether actual or perceived.

Extrication involves presenting withdrawal, and supplementing it with other policies, so that its potential downsides are mitigated and kept at bay for as long as possible:

- Complete transparency is not desirable, and declaratory policy should diverge from actual policy. Withdrawal is being undertaken without all the war's objectives having been sustainably achieved, but that is something to be obscured rather than highlighted. Similarly, withdrawal is being undertaken because of a desire to avoid continued payment of the costs of war, but that too is something to be obscured. And withdrawal is likely to leave one's local ally in a somewhat uncertain position afterward, but that fact should be denied as strenuously as possible to everybody. The goal of declaratory policy during extrication, in short, should be to minimize the significance of what is occurring so that one's enemies are not encouraged or one's friends disheartened.

- Strategic retreat should be complemented by tactical aggression. The goal here should be to make it clear that the removal of U.S. ground troops will not create a safe environment for enemy maneuver and advance. In practice, this could mean that operations such as drone strikes or raids into heretofore protected areas would increase rather than decrease as troop withdrawals move forward. (This principle led to some of the Nixon administration's most controversial policies in Indochina—such as the “secret” bombing of the Ho Chi Minh trail and the attacks on enemy sanctuaries in Cambodia and Laos in 1970 and 1971—so it is worth noting that on this front, conditions today have changed dramatically for the better. Technological advances have made it possible to carry out such operations at far less human, diplomatic, and financial cost.)
- If possible, enshrine extrication in a formal negotiated settlement. This is not an absolute necessity (especially since in Afghanistan, unlike Vietnam, there are practically no U.S. prisoners of war in enemy hands whose return has to be engineered). But it is obviously desirable, particularly for the opportunity it would provide for the American public to gain a sense of psychological closure. If negotiations can lead to a plausible arrangement for demobilization, political integration, and power-sharing among the local belligerents, that would be a bonus. But in a pinch, a fig leaf that presents at least the appearance of such a deal will do (as with the Paris Accords). Pay careful attention to the sequencing of any agreement's stages—implementation of anything truly critical should be front-loaded, since later stages of such agreements are often left undone. Here again, of course, declaratory policy should obscure any agreement's shortcomings.
- “Linkage” is worth trying but not getting hung up on. Nixon and Kissinger made a big point of how all the administration's major negotiations were supposedly mutually reinforcing. In truth, though, such “linkage” never really worked, nor did they let their fetish for it get in the way of the negotiating logic of each track. Thus, they repeatedly sought Soviet and Chinese help in easing facilitating withdrawal from Vietnam, but these efforts never produced much. And when the 1972 Easter Offensive threatened to topple Saigon, Nixon insisted on doing whatever was necessary to help stop it—including bombing Hanoi and mining Haiphong Harbor—even at the risk of potentially disrupting a crucial upcoming

U.S.-Soviet summit. (His boldness paid off—the line was held in Vietnam and the Soviets let the summit continue unaffected.) In spite of what Nixon and Kissinger would say themselves, therefore, the real takeaway seems to be to pursue each major negotiating track largely on its own terms, since both hopes and fears of possible linkages between tracks will probably be overblown.

- Following the withdrawal of U.S. ground troops, other aspects of U.S. power should be brought to bear in order to prevent Afghanistan from once again becoming a source of major regional and global instability. This means continuing to supply economic aid, military advisers, intelligence, air power, and indirect military support so that local U.S. allies have as good a chance as possible at holding their own in the continuing struggle. Rather than withdrawal of ground troops amounting to the end of U.S. involvement in the conflict, in other words—which it might eventually be trumpeted as doing for domestic consumption—U.S. involvement there should be sustained at as high a level and in as diverse ways as necessary and possible.

Dear Cheryl,

Two quick things beside a thank you for your work in the world:

[1] John Doar's former colleagues are preparing a 2-day event for his 90th birthday, Oct 27-28, at Justice and Sidwell Friends. □ Please let Hillary know in case she'd like to be involved somehow. □ I know she admires Doar from her work on the Nixon impeachment committee.

[2] □ Do you know the proper channel at the White House □ to suggest Doar for the Medal of Freedom? □ (One of my former co-authors, Bill Russell, received it this year.) □ If so, I'd appreciate any tip on the process. □ Plenty of people working on the 90th would gather info if necessary.

Best,

- condolence notes continue to flood in. We will keep working on responses for you to sign when you get back.

B6

- on trip, if you are up for dinner tonight, you should go in hotel, there's a casual outdoor place. Willard and dan piccuta are there as is kurt tong and they have the night open. We planned for larger pre-brief for tomorrow morning to go through everything.

- also, we are going to add a meeting this week with reps levin, mcdermott and brady who are in town for apec. You don't really see them elsewhere and they are asking.

- there is quite a lot of sensitivity about looking too lavish in these economic times or looking like we are on vacation. Apparently there was commentary about Cannes being over the top. So we are starting to take down things like leis and fancy gifts. nothing that affects you. Just so you know.

Its the Hale Makai guest house at Bellows AFB. Willard/Dan piccuta say is the nicest set of guest houses they have for VIPs. House is small and not super luxurious but it has privacy and right on water which is fantastic.

So its all set if you want it. Not sure what you are thinking timing wise.

we found a few options for tomorrow. only thing thats been hard to find is places that have swimming pools because most people just go into the ocean, and not bother with a pool the best house is called halai makai and its at bellows AFB. i am getting pictures and sending people to look at it now. will report back we are finally there with deliverables in thailand. in fact, thais now getting sensitive that we will be announcing too much if we try to do more. we will visit a stadium with flood victims. also convinced that doing a local show is a good idea. would be brief. confirmed the 4 seasons. lona and i should probably talk thru the next part of trip with you at some point.

i hope you are ok! miss not being there. this is WEIRD.

Subject: Happy Thanksgiving

Madam Secretary:

I wish you and your family a Happy Thanksgiving. My family and I are [REDACTED]

I have not forgotten that I owe you some thoughts on our policy in the Americas. Actually, having spent two months now in the private sector with a heavy focus on Latin America, I have some particular points I wish to convey, and will do so soon.

Working closely with you on Honduras, Cuba, Pathways and other issues was one of the real highlights of my Foreign Service career, and I miss that. Your instincts and skills dealing with the wide range of characters in our neighborhood -- and well beyond -- is enormously impressive. On this Thanksgiving, there a lot of U.S. diplomats and U.S. citizens who are thankful that you are our Secretary of State

Warm regards,

Craig

Here's what WJC approved:

STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT CLINTON AND SECRETARY CLINTON

The Passing of Sargent Shriver

We are greatly saddened by the passing of Sargent Shriver. He leaves behind an astonishing legacy of people helped, lives transformed, and communities improved. Through his work and his passion, he helped build a better America and a more humane world. And he did it with boundless enthusiasm, infectious joy, and the deepest love for his family, his nation, and his work.

Sarge has been a presence in our lives for decades. We went into public service because of the example of leaders like Sarge, who translated President Kennedy's call to service into action, leading first the Peace Corps and then the War on Poverty. As young activists, we were inspired by his leadership in the McGovern Campaign in 1972. He launched many of the organizations and efforts that became touchstones of our careers, opening access to legal services, child care and jobs for America's working families. For the signing of the bill creating AmeriCorps, he offered the pen that President Kennedy had used to establish the Peace Corps. In 1994, we were honored to welcome Sarge to the White House to receive the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Today, as we travel the world, we see Sargent Shriver's lasting influence in the impact made by the nearly 200,000 Americans who have served in the Peace Corps. We see it at Head Start centers and Special Olympics competitions that give children the chance to begin living up to their God-given potential. And we see it in an ethic of service and responsibility that continues to animate Americans of all ages.

Our thoughts and prayers are with the Shriver family, Sarge's many devoted friends, and with the nation that has lost one of its most dedicated champions for equality and opportunity.

Max's latest piece (you have to go to the site to see the video, if you want):
<http://maxblumenthal.com/2011/04/remembering-juliano-mer-khamis/>

Remembering Juliano Mer Khamis

On 04.04.11, By Max

Juliano Mer Khamis was killed yesterday by a gunman in Jenin. I met him on a number of occasions. He exuded a unique charisma that was bound up with unpredictable rage and spontaneous joy. Gideon Levy has done justice to his legacy in a short but powerful obituary. My friend Jen Marlowe helped create this video about Juliano's work with the Jenin Freedom Theater. Watching it is all anyone needs to do to understand how much of a void his murder has created:

Juliano's documentary, Amna's Children, is the best film I have seen about the occupation. There is really no other film that approaches its emotional impact or captures the way in which the trash of the occupation methodically destroys the lives of everyone in its path and how those in its way resist it no matter what. So here it is, a testament to the genius of Juliano, the courage of his mother, who founded the Jenin Freedom Theater in 1988, and the humanity of the children of Jenin.

Juliano was born to a Jewish Israeli woman, Arna Mer, who dedicated the last years of her life to challenging the occupation, protesting at checkpoints and traveling to and from the Jenin refugee camp, even while in the terminal stages of breast cancer. His father was a Palestinian Christian bureaucrat, Saliba Khamis, who met Arna in the Israeli Communist Party, which was for decades the only party in Israel that promoted co-existence between Arabs and Jews. Mer and Khamis named their son after Salvatore Giuliano, a strikingly handsome, swaggering Italian bandit who led a small band of landless peasants against powerful oligarchs, earning himself a reputation as the Italian Robin Hood and eventual media stardom.

After making Amna's Children and appearing in films like Amos Gitai's Kippur (not the best Gitai film but still worth watching), Juliano set out to revive his mother's Jenin Freedom Theater. The theater had been in ruins since the Israeli army destroyed it while reducing Jenin to a post-apocalyptic moonscape of destruction. Once the Second Intifada was crushed, the camp was transformed into a laboratory for Tony Blair and General Keith Dayton's cynical security plan. Now Jenin was ringed by electrified fences, a virtual prison inhabited by thousands of children with post-traumatic stress disorder.

Juliano's return to Jenin was a rebuke to the promise of former Israel Labor Minister Shlomo Benizri to convert the life of Palestinians into hell, as he restored a creative outlet for a generation the occupation had sought to demoralize and destroy. In turn, he brought young Israelis (including Palestinian Israelis) and international activists over the Green Line to help him build the theater, promoting a model of co-existence based on solidarity with the Palestinian grassroots.

With assistance from Zachana Zubbeid, a former leader of the armed insurgency during the Second Intifada, the theater allowed young people from the camp to take aim not only at the occupation, but at the internal problems plaguing Palestinian society. The next Intifada would consist of theater, music, poetry, the struggle of a dispossessed, dehumanized generation asserting itself through culture. That was Juliano's vision.

Through their work in the theater, young Jenin residents challenged traditions and entrenched social mores like corporal punishment and the relegation of young women to secondary social roles. For me, freedom is the occupation ending and the army leaving, a young boy who participates in the theater said. But it's also playing snooker and not having anybody hit me.

Juliano's final play, a production of Alice in Wonderland, was filled with themes and symbols that explicitly challenged patriarchal authority. I wish I had traveled to Jenin with Matan Cohen when he invited me to see the play, the reviews I heard from those who attended it were glowing.

Was Juliano's murder motivated by religious extremism? For now no one knows. The theater has been attacked with molotov cocktails and Juliano has been denounced as a Zionist agent by militant elements. He knew the risks of his work and was committed enough to risk paying the ultimate price.

At the end, there's a feeling that the spirit [of freedom] is already here, it's already seeded, he said during an interview in Jenin. And I don't believe that someone or anyone can stop it.

CONFIDENTIAL

April 5, 2011

For: Hillary
From: Sid
Re: Holbrooke Memorial at American Academy/Berlin

I am enclosing below what amounts to a memo from John Kornblum on the Holbrooke event. I've adapted an email he sent me and attached two articles he sent, one on Holbrooke and Europe and another on Holbrooke and the Academy (published in the Academy's journal). You can use this material as the basis for your talk there.

1. Kornblum on American Academy event, Westerwelle and political context.

Hillary is undoubtedly aware that she will be flying into a hornet's nest in Berlin next week. Big losses in the regional elections have caused Westerwelle to be forced out of his position as FDP chairman. No one gives him much chance of staying on long as foreign minister either. But he will still be in office next week for the NATO ministerial and will give the Secretary his party award on Friday afternoon. This is a prize thought up by the FDP to create publicity and to flatter someone they want to get along with. It is a nice gesture to give it to the Secretary, but it loses much of its oomph after Westerwelle's collapse. I would recommend that she be positive and polite in her remarks, but go very light on praise for Guido. He is very unpopular right now and is not long for this world.

We are all very pleased that she will come to the Holbrooke event. It will be much along the lines of the Kennedy Center piece. Ms. Ashton will also be there. There will also be a much too long list of FOD's who will talk about themselves. Gary Smith (Academy director) knows that he cannot time Hillary's arrival perfectly. If she is delayed too long, he will start with other speakers. He would be very grateful for a chance to show her around the Academy, which can take as little as ten minutes.

As for her remarks, she has done this gig a few times already. I have attached a piece I did for the Academy's magazine, which gives some thoughts about the Academy itself and how it reflects RCH's personality and visions. It really is the place which puts his character all together. It shows a much more thoughtful side of him than the many Milosevic war stories do. You may recall that the Academy wasn't mentioned at all at Kennedy Center. This will be the only time a senior person remembers this part of Holbrooke's legacy.

The final three or four paragraphs of my piece give the most important points from my point of view

-- RCH is always known as a crisis manager, but he also cared deeply about building institutions for understanding. During his short tenure in Bonn he rediscovered his Central European roots and became deeply convinced that the United States and Germany must form the core of a permanent Atlantic community.

-- The American Academy is the embodiment of Richard's commitment's. It reflects his eclectic interests, his belief that scholarship and dialogue can help build peace and his commitment to Berlin and Germany. Living humanity was his slogan and the American Academy is what he was all about.

2. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke and the American Academy, by John C. Kornblum

I have always thought there was one fact which described Richard Holbrooke's success more than any other. Persons who have only met or talked with him briefly, or in fact sometimes have never met him, feel that he has touched their lives. The numbers of people who consider themselves to have been his good friends runs into the thousands more than he ever could even have talked seriously to. Those who felt that he had touched their lives or contributed to their well being can be counted in the millions.

All of these groups were somehow moved by his voracious desire to know who they were and what was important to them. This ability to create instant empathy gave him an unmatched talent to build bridges to others. Nations he had never visited were brought back from despair by his commitments to the fight against AIDS or his peace efforts in the Balkans. Others have made similar contributions, but missed the human impact of Richard Holbrooke. The reason? Richard cared so much about the world and its condition that he instinctively absorbed the personal messages from others and transformed them into mutual understanding. His prodigious intellectual and rhetorical skills did the rest. One could never forget a conversation with him or not take seriously a request for assistance.

Exposure to this force of personality did not always win Richard friends or admirers. Those who were bruised, unhappy or just plain jealous of his talents were also numerous. But in almost every case, even those who were less than thrilled with his treatment could not deny the power of his ideas.

Once, at a very important Washington meeting, Richard accused a very senior general of disloyalty for not following the President's goals -- goals which Richard had of course written for him. A year later, this general was one of Richard's most loyal deputies. Most successful was Richard's two year massaging of Serbian dictator Slobodan Milosevic. Milosevic was a true sociopath. He cared little for the lives of others. His only goal was to amass as much power and control as possible.

Richard met Milosevic when the ugly Balkan war was in its fifth year. Several teams of negotiators had tried to stop the killing and had failed. Richard

Here is where the United States has too often dropped the ball. Both Bush and Obama seem to have taken the achievements of the 1990s for granted. Each in his own way projected the US more as a separate power which cooperates with Europe rather than as a constituent part of a Euro-Atlantic community. President Obama's speeches in Berlin, Strasbourg, Oslo, and Prague - dominated European debate. But they did little to define how the United States intends to behave as a European power.

Ronald Reagan's famous speech at the Brandenburg Gate was at first ridiculed as being naïve and unrealistic. It became historic only when the results were evident. Here, Richard Holbrooke's judgment would be clear and penetrating. Obama's skillful rhetoric will also be forgotten if engagement and action do not soon follow.

Ok. Let me know

Also, when I told Mike Mullen I was looking forward to seeing him the 27th, he said he didn't know anything about it. I explained that I was hosting dinner for Gates and he and his wife were invited. Do you know why he didn't know? [REDACTED] Any clues? ~

How are you doing? Where did you end up going?

- as you know, ghanaian president mills is dead. not sure if that means we might need to stop in ghana given how soon your visit is. there is no word on funeral etc.
- also, johnnie feels strongly about going to kenya given the 2013 elections. can be a quick stop but you were amenable to this last time we spoke. Johnnie was recommending dropping namibia in order to do this. i am leaving namibia on schedule so you can see what it looks like.
- lastly; mandela is switching days on us which makes cape town quite a liesurely stop. it does tighten up the joburg/pretoria schedule but it works out.

i will be in the office tomorrow and thursday fyi.

Marvin Hamlisch, Composer of 'A Chorus Line,' Dies at 68

By DAVE ITZKOFF

Marvin Hamlisch, the singularly productive and sensationallly decorated composer of musicals like "A Chorus Line" and songs like "The Way We Were," has died, The Associated Press reported. A family spokesman told The A.P. that Mr. Hamlisch died in Los Angeles on Monday after a brief illness but did not provide additional details. Mr. Hamlisch was 68.

In a career that spanned film, television, theater and recorded music, Mr. Hamlisch won seemingly every award available

Jake,

I truly do understand how difficult it is to have a private meeting with S. So, I am entirely realistic when I ask to see if you, Sylvia, and I might have a few minutes with her alone next week.

It is most likely that both she and I will be out of office before we meet again. It would give Sylvia and me the opportunity to express our views of the privilege of serving under her leadership

It would also give Sylva and me the chance to tell how we might hope to be allied together in the future..

I know it will be hard to achieve but I thank you for trying.

Sam

yes [redacted] coming monday with [redacted] goosby is still being worked out he could stop at your house before departure for inauguration but i dont think thats the best idea. otherwise, we do him tues morning while others come for hearing prep which i realize you wont necessarily be dressed for. last option is wed morning on the hill before your hearing which might be crazy.

barbara is set for the 23rd. will confirm the other dates.

Not sure about Oscar coat--it's white and pretty but not sure it will work. I'll try it later

But there's a beautiful red dress for you to try.

Is [redacted] coming Monday morning w [redacted]

Did we work out time for Goosby photo?

Did we get Barbara for Wed and Friday for 60 Minutes? Should she also come 24th for my return to Hill for Kerry intro? Also for the entire week of 28th--2/1?
