The Congress that proposed the Fourteenth Amendment rightly regarded the situation as outrageous—not only morally, but practically. If former Confederates held the levers of federal and state government power, effective "reconstruction" of the political order and any hope of extending the full and equal protection of the laws to the newly freed former slaves would be at an end. Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment responded to that outrage, enacting a sweeping disqualification from state and federal office of those who had, as legislators or officers in the federal or state government prior to the War, sworn required oaths of loyalty to the United States Constitution and subsequently engaged in "insurrection or rebellion" against the U.S. constitutional authority or given "aid or comfort" to its enemies. Only a two-thirds majority vote of both houses of Congress could remove that sweeping disqualification.

Fast-forward a century and a half. The events surrounding efforts to overturn the result of the presidential election of 2020 have sparked renewed scholarly, judicial, and political interest in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.[5] The core events are familiar to all—the dishonest attempts to set aside valid state election results with false claims of voter fraud; the attempted subversion of the constitutional processes for States' selection of electors for President and Vice President; the efforts to have the Vice President unconstitutionally claim a power to refuse to count electoral votes certified and submitted by several States; the efforts of Members of Congress to assert a similar power to reject votes lawfully cast by electors; the fomenting

---

[3] See infra note 231 and sources cited there.

[4] Akhil Reed Amar, America's Constitution: A Biography 377 (2005); see also Eric L. McKitrick, Andrew Johnson and Reconstruction 176-179 (1960); Allen C. Guelzo, Reconstruction: A Concise History 25 (2018).

[5] The most important scholarly articles (to which we are deeply indebted) are Gerard N. Magliocca, Amnesty and Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, 36 Const. Comment.. 87 (2021); Myles S. Lynch, Disloyalty and Disqualification: Reconstructing Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, 30 William & Mary Bill of Rights J. 153 (2021), both of which were written before the events of January 6, and Daniel J. Hemel, Disqualifying Insurrectionists and Rebels: A How-to Guide, Lawfare (Jan. 19, 2021), available at https://www.lawfareblog.com/disqualifying-insurrectionists-and-rebels-how-guide.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

and immediate incitement of a mob to attempt to forcibly prevent Congress's and the Vice President's counting of such lawfully cast votes—all in an attempt to prevent the defeated incumbent President, Donald Trump, from losing power in accordance with the Constitution.

This was undoubtedly a serious assault on the American constitutional order. Not since the Civil War has there been so serious a threat to the foundations of the American constitutional republic. It takes little imagination to describe the efforts to maintain Trump in office, notwithstanding his defeat, as an attempted political coup d'etat. These actions culminated in the incitement and execution of a violent uprising at the Capitol on January 6, 2021—an "insurrection" aimed at preventing Congress and the incumbent Vice President from performing their constitutional responsibilities to count the votes for President and Vice President in the 2020 election. Several of the people involved in these events—most notably the defeated President, Donald Trump—had previously taken oaths to support the Constitution. If they engaged in or gave aid and comfort to an insurrection against the constitutional government, Section Three would appear to bar them from holding office again.

As legal officials and citizens generally have begun to confront the application of Section Three, they have foundered on the most fundamental questions. How does Section Three's disqualification apply—does it apply—to those who planned, supported, encouraged, assisted, incited, or otherwise participated in the events surrounding the attempted overturning of the presidential election of 2020? Does Section Three's century-and-a-half old disqualification, designed for the aftermath of the Civil War, even remain legally operative in the first place? If so, what must be done to enforce Section Three? Does it require implementing legislation or criminal trials (or impeachments) before its disqualification kicks in? How does Section Three interact with the rest of the constitutional order—are its subjects protected by constitutional principles of attainder, anti-retroactivity, due process and free speech? And if Section Three does apply—to what and to whom? What actions count as having "engaged in insurrection or rebellion" against the Constitution of the United States or having "given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof"? Which officials are covered by Section Three's exclusions?

This article attempts to answer these questions. It makes four key points (or clusters of points):

First. Section Three remains legally operative. It is no less part of the Constitution than the other provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. It is not a dead letter. The Constitution is a binding, authoritative written text, not a collection of specific historical purposes and intentions. Where the text applies, it applies. Its legal force is not limited to the immediate problem or purpose that prompted its enactment. Section Three is not limited to the circumstances of the Civil War and Reconstruction, even if the meaning of its terms may be illuminated by that experience and history.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Nor has Section Three somehow been "repealed" by Congress's two major nineteenth-century statutes granting amnesty to those covered by Section Three. This is not because it would be impossible for a constitutional provision to expire by its terms after a period of time, or upon the occurrence of a particular event, or upon action taken by future actors. Article I, Section 9, for example, created a constitutional prohibition of most congressional regulation of the international slave trade for a period of twenty years—but its prohibition then vanished in 1808. Section Three, however, does not work that way. It imposes a general, prospective, rule of disqualification, which Congress may remove by two-thirds vote of both houses only once it has occurred. Section Three is prospective; Congressional amnesty is retrospective.

Second. Section Three is legally self-executing. That is, Section Three's disqualification is constitutionally automatic whenever its terms are satisfied. Section Three requires no legislation or adjudication to be legally effective. It is enacted by the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment. Its disqualification, where triggered, just is. It follows that Section Three's disqualification may and should be followed and carried out by all whose duties are affected by it. In many cases, Section Three will give rise to justiciable controversies in the courts. In others it will be enforceable by state and federal officials. But no prior judicial decision, and no implementing legislation, is required for Section Three to be carried out by officials sworn to uphold the Constitution whose duties present the occasion for applying Section Three's commands. Section Three is ready for use.

While Section Three's requirements could be made the subject of enforcement legislation by Congress, under its general power under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment "to enforce" the provisions of the amendment, no such legislation is constitutionally required as a prerequisite to Section Three doing what Section Three itself does. Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase's circuit court opinion to the contrary, In re Griffin,[6] is simply wrong on this point—full of sleight of hand, motivated reasoning, and self-defeating maneuvers—as we will explain at length. In re Griffin should be hooted down the pages of history, purged from our constitutional understanding of Section Three.

Third. Section Three supersedes (or satisfies) earlier-enacted constitutional provisions to the extent of any supposed conflict between them. Section Three, at the time it was adopted as part of the Constitution, imposed a disqualification from office based on an individual's past conduct. Even if imposition of such a disability might otherwise, if done by statute, have been a forbidden Ex Post Facto law or Bill of Attainder, Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment constitutionally supersedes any prior provision conflicting with its terms.

[6] 11 F. Cas. 7, 22-27 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

This principle extends to a more unsettling point. To the extent Section Three's disqualification for having "engaged in insurrection or rebellion" or giving "aid or comfort" to "the enemies" might turn out to be in tension with the First Amendment's protection of freedom of speech, Section Three supersedes the First Amendment to the extent of any true conflict. To be sure, the proper construction of Section Three's terms ("insurrection," "rebellion," "aid or comfort," "enemies") will leave much speech and advocacy completely free. But in the cases where it does not, the terms of Section Three, not the constructions of the First Amendment, decide where the line is.

This leads to the article's fourth and final group of points:

Fourth. Section Three's disqualification is sweeping in its terms. It disqualifies from future office-holding persons who "engaged in"—an expansive and encompassing term connoting many forms of participation in or active support of—a broad swath of activity covered by the terms "insurrection or rebellion" or the giving of "aid or comfort" to "enemies" of the nation or its constitutional order. It applies to a broad swath of civilian, military, and legislative office holders who swore oaths of fidelity to the Constitution, and it disqualifies such persons from holding in the future any of an extraordinarily broad swath of public offices. Taking Section Three seriously, on its own terms, means taking seriously the enormous sweep of the disqualification it creates. And, we will argue, taking Section Three seriously means that its constitutional disqualifications from future state and federal officeholding extend to participants in the attempted overturning of the presidential election of 2020, including former President Donald Trump and others. The substantive terms of Section Three's prohibition are not themselves difficult or inscrutable (even if there might be questions of application at the outer edges of the text's meaning). But they are potentially breathtaking in their straightforward consequences.

In what follows, we develop each of these four core points at length.

Section Three remains a valid, prospective, enforceable, self-executing, broad, and relevant part of our Constitution. It falls to us to fulfill our duties to it. These include the duties of legislative bodies, state and federal election officials, executive officers, and perhaps others to take up the Constitution, including Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, and wield it faithfully and forcefully against its enemies. Taking Section Three seriously means excluding from present or future office those who sought to subvert lawful government authority under the Constitution in the aftermath of the 2020 election by engaging in insurrection or rebellion or giving aid or comfort to enemies of the lawful constitutional order.

I. Section Three is Legally Operative Today

A. The Generality and Presumptive Perpetuity of Constitutional Language

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The first step in our argument is an easy one, but perhaps not immediately obvious to everyone: Section Three's disqualification remains an operative rule of the Constitution. The reason this might not be obvious, at least to the uninitiated, is that Section Three plainly was designed for a specific historical situation—the circumstances of Reconstruction following the end of the Civil War. The implication, in the eyes of some, might be that that historical situation limits the scope of the provision's operation. We think any such inference badly mistaken. Section Three was prompted by historical circumstances, but that does not in any way detract from its enduring force.

To be sure, Section Three clearly bears the hallmarks of its historical context. It is, for one thing, a radical rule. The sheer sweep of the disqualification from offices that it imposed on former Southern officeholders-turned-rebels was dramatic. Its operation was hugely disruptive of antebellum patterns of elite political leadership, apparently indifferent to inconvenience, and seemingly rather punitive in its consequences. Section Three is harsh. It is categorical. It is insistent. It seems to have been deliberately designed to turn the prior Southern political order upside down. As Eric Foner puts it, "Section 3 aimed to promote a sweeping transformation of Southern public life."[7]

In these respects, the disqualification reflects and embodies the distinctive political impulses of the so-called Radical Republican Congress that proposed the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866. If its disqualification had radical policy consequences for the South, so be it.[8] It was more important to strip insurrectionists and rebels of governing power completely, to remake Southern political society thoroughly, and to prevent Southern backsliding from the full consequences of Union victory entirely, than to be concerned about such things as seeming harshness, impracticality, or disruptiveness. Section Three is very much a creation and creature of its day.

Yet it is (or should be) basic constitutional law that it is the enduring text of the Constitution that supplies the governing rule, not the ostensible "purpose" or specific historical situation for which the text was written. Constitutional provisions, written into our fundamental law, live beyond the circumstances that prompted their adoption. And many such constitutional provisions are written in broad, or general, terms that obviously extend beyond the specific situation or situations that led to their enactment. Sometimes this is by design: the text's drafters wrote a general rule, applicable to a broad class of circumstances, as a more general, "neutral," way of addressing a class of situations of which the specific problem motivating the writing of the text might be just one instance. The thinking might be that if the principle giving rise to the text is a correct one, it should be correct in like circumstances, not just the one situation that provoked the rule's adoption. And sometimes a text's breadth and [7] Eric Foner, Reconstruction, 1863-1877, at 260 (1988).

---

[8] Mark Graber, Punish Treason, Reward Loyalty: The Forgotten Fourteenth Amendment, Volume 1 (2023, University Press of Kansas).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

generality might not reflect conscious design: the text's drafters wrote a general rule that unintentionally went further than the problem they had in mind. Put colloquially, the text sometimes "overshoots" its drafters' intended purposes. (A text might undershoot the problem its framers had in mind to address, too—or achieve only part of its intended purpose, perhaps because of political compromise.)

The reason does not really matter. It is the rule as drafted and enacted in the written text that counts, whether it goes further than the purposes supposed to have inspired its adoption, or even whether it falls short of fully achieving those purposes. While evidence of intention, usage, purpose, and political context can assist in ascertaining the meaning of the enactment, it is that objective meaning that constitutes the law, not the ostensible purposes or motivations that supposedly lay behind it. This is "originalism," our system's basic method for interpreting the Constitution and its amendments.[9]

Consider, for example, Section One of the same Fourteenth Amendment. As a matter of historical purpose, the specific mischief the framers of Section One had in mind was the enactment of "Black Codes" in Southern States that discriminated against the newly freed former slaves. But the words chosen by the drafters to enact the rule embodied in the text command, in general terms, that no state shall abridge the "privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States" nor deny to any "person" within its jurisdiction the "equal protection of the laws"—rules not cast in racial terms at all, let alone limited to the immediate situation of former enslaved persons. The rules enacted apply to all persons irrespective of race. So it was entirely plausible for lawyers to argue that Section One also barred the same kind of discrimination against women citizens that it barred against black citizens. It doesn't matter that the drafts*men* of the amendment might not have had women "in mind" if women are covered by the meaning of the words they actually wrote and ratified.[10] Similarly, it was entirely plausible to argue that Section One went so far as to ban racially segregated schools.[11] The answers to each of these questions turn on the objective, original

---

[9] See Vasan Kesavan & Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Interpretive Force of the Constitution's Secret Drafting History, 91 Geo. L. J. 1113, 1124-1148 (2004); Michael Stokes Paulsen, Does the Constitution Prescribe Rules for Its Own Interpretation? 103 Nw. U. L. Rev. 857, 872-883 (2009); William Baude & Stephen Sachs, The Misunderstood Eleventh Amendment, 169 U Pa. L. Rev. 609, 624-625 (2021); William Baude & Stephen Sachs, Grounding Originalism, 113 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1455, 1456-1460 (2019). For purposes of this article, we can bracket any differences in emphasis between Paulsen's objective-original-meaning originalism and Baude's original-law originalism.

[10] We have used such examples before. Paulsen, Rules for Its Own, supra note 9, at 901-902; Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Text, the Whole Text, and Nothing but the Text, So Help Me God: Un-Writing Amar's Unwritten Constitution, 81 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1385, 1421 n. 68 (2014); William Baude, Jud Campbell, & Stephen Sachs, General Law and the Fourteenth Amendment , 76 Stan. L. Rev. at 67-68 (forthcoming 2024).

[11] We have used this example before, too. Michael Stokes Paulsen, Lemon Is Dead, 43 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 795, 839-840 (1993); William Baude, Is Originalism Our Law?, 115 Colum. L. Rev. 2349, 2380-2381 (2015). See also Baude, Campbell, & Sachs, supra note 10, at 66.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

meaning of "privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States" and "equal protection of the laws," not whether the 1866 Congress and subsequent ratifiers had thought through the possible radical implications of their own work. If the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment's terms forbade racially discriminatory classifications of any and all kinds, as a matter of the rules of late-1860s language and usage, it doesn't matter one way or the other whether it was intended or expected that governments could enforce certain types of racial discrimination, like enforced racial segregation. The rule as adopted might overshoot the purposes, expectations, or desires of those who voted for it. But the rule is the rule; the text's meaning is the text's meaning.

Thus, if the framers and ratifiers of the Fourteenth Amendment enacted a general rule in Section Three—a disqualification from future officeholding keyed to having taken an oath to the Constitution and subsequently engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States—rather than a provision that by its terms applied only to the case of former Civil War secessionists and Confederate officials and officers,[12] it is the general rule that matters. That the rule had a particular political purpose behind it as a matter of history might be an aid to correct interpretation of the language supplying that rule. (We will make such an argument below, concerning the meaning, in context, of the phrase "insurrection or rebellion.")[13] But in the end the question is what rule was enacted. If Section Three's rule fell short somehow, missing some folks its drafters might have meant to ensnare, those persons are not ensnared. The text might (or might not) be thought deficient in this regard—as having failed to fulfill its full purpose. But the text means what it says. Similarly, if the rule supplied by the objective meaning of the text runs right on past the specific historical purpose for which it was enacted and embraces as well other insurrectionists, rebels, and aiders and comforters of enemies, that rule must be given full legal effect as part of the Constitution. The rule's overbreadth in terms of its perceived purpose, and even its inconvenience as a consequence of such overbreadth, are beside the point.[14] [12] Indeed, for what it is worth, the legislative history of Section Three confirms that this is what the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment did. Earlier drafts had limited the Section's application to the "late insurrection." Later versions dropped this limitation and generalized Section Three's application to "insurrection" and "rebellion." See Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., at 2767-68, 2770 2869, 2921; see also Mark A. Graber, Rewarding Loyalty (?) and Punishing Treason Through Disenfranchisement and Bans on Officeholding: Section 3, at 3-4 (unpublished chapter, forthcoming in The Forgotten Fourteenth Amendment, Volume 2, University Press of Kansas) (documenting this development).

---

[13] Infra Part IV.A.

[14] See, e.g., Michael Stokes Paulsen, Is Lloyd Bentsen Unconstitutional? 46 Stanford L. Rev. 907, 908-909 (1994) (making this point about the disqualification of some senators and representatives from eligibility for certain appointed offices posed by the Emoluments Clause of Article I, § 6, cl. 2); William Baude, The 2023 Scalia Lecture: Beyond Textualism?, 46 Harv. J. L. & Pub. Pol'y (forthcoming 2023) ("Sometimes rules go beyond their reasons; a rule can be overbroad compared to the reasons for enacting it. And sometimes rules are underbroad; a rule cannot quite do all the things that you might want to do given the reasons for enacting the rule. Textualism recognizes that when the judge enforces the law, the law's rule might sometimes be different from what the people who enacted the law would have wanted had they thought about the situation."). For an extended discussion of the abuse of arguments

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Finally, we take it as almost too obvious to require stating that constitutional provisions have indefinite life unless and until repealed or amended by subsequent constitutional enactments. The fact that an unrepealed, unamended provision of law is "old" does not in any way weaken its legal force. The First Amendment is old too, as is the entire original Constitution. But both remain in force. This is true even if the purpose for which a constitutional provision was originally written has ceased to be relevant, or even if the constitutional provision at issue might be thought in today's society to be something of an anachronism.[15] There are, of course, some self-identified living constitutionalists who deny this point—who think that old texts have a legal shelf life and lose their potency over time, as "the interest in sovereignty fades."[16] But in our view, this just shows what is wrong with such living constitutionalism.[17] The Constitution is not a spice cabinet.

All of this might seem to belabor the obvious. Few interpreters of Section Three explicitly deny that it continues to govern new insurrections and rebellions.[18] But sometimes we wonder if this kind of denial is sneaking in to people's intuitions—subtly infecting and distorting the actual interpretation of Section Three. So let us start from the right first principles: Section Three remains constitutionally fully in force, as alive as the day it was enacted.

B. Has Congress Removed the Disability for Everyone for All Time? (And Could It Do So If It Wanted To?)

But what about this? The second sentence of Section Three provides that Congress "may by vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability."[19] Just as the first sentence's disqualification is not limited specifically to the Civil War, neither is Congress's power to grant amnesty. Thus, Congress can, by the requisite vote, remove any disqualification that exists by virtue of the operation of Section Three. But just exactly how far does that power reach? Could Congress, by two-thirds majorities, essentially extinguish the legally operative effect of Section Three entirely, by removing the disability imposed by Section Three generally, prospectively, and universally? Put from inconvenience, see infra Part II.C.2.a (discussing Chief Justice Chase's appalling opinion in Griffin's Case).

---

[15] Michael Stokes Paulsen, Dirty Harry and the Real Constitution, 64 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1457, 1486-1490 (1997) (discussing privilege against self-incrimination).

[16] David A. Strauss, The Supreme Court, 2014 Term—Foreword: Does the Constitution Mean What It Says?, 129 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 58 (2015); see also Adam M. Samaha, Originalism's Expiration Date, 30 Cardozo L. Rev. 1295 (2008).

[17] See Baude & Sachs, Grounding, supra note 9, at 1487 (responding to Strauss).

[18] For a rare example, see an argument made and rejected by the House during the exclusion of Victor Berger. 6 Clarence Cannon, Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives 55 (1935) ("It was also seriously contended by counsel that section 3 of the fourteenth amendment was an outgrowth of the Civil War and that such a provision cannot possibly apply to the present case").

[19] U.S. Const. amdt. XIV, sec. 3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

more vividly: Can Congress, by two-thirds vote of each house, essentially "explode" Section Three—render it inoperative in the future, for all time?

These questions turn out not to be completely hypothetical. In two statutes enacted in the late nineteenth century, Congress might arguably have done this. One statute (from 1872) removed "from all persons whomsoever"—except designated categories of individuals—all "political disabilities imposed" by Section Three.[20] Another (from 1898) further removed "the disability imposed by section three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States heretofore incurred."[21] And indeed, in a recent case (brought by then-Representative Madison Cawthorn) a federal judge relied on these statutes to conclude that Section Three was now legally dead.[22] Is that right? Do these statutes—can these statutes—grant amnesty to all insurrectionists, past, present and future?[23]

No. While the argument is not entirely bonkers, it does not withstand more serious scrutiny. It is wrong on both statutory and constitutional grounds. Consider the statutes first. Neither one purports to rescind Section Three's operative rule for all time. They do not pretend to explode the first sentence of the constitutional provision.

Begin with the 1872 act. In 1872, after a period of case-by-case consideration of amnesty requests, Congress, as mentioned above, enacted a general statute removing disqualification from a broad description of persons embraced by Section Three's prohibition. As Professor Magliocca recounts, the statute reflected a mixture of motives: genuine mercy and magnanimity; the practical consequences of Section Three in the South; the burdens and biases of case-by-case consideration of private bills; the politics of a presidential election year; and the general but regrettable retreat from aggressive Congressional Reconstruction.[24] But what is most important is what it says. The statute reads, in full:

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each house concurring therein), That all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments of the Constitution of the United States are hereby removed from all persons whomsoever, except Senators and Representatives of the thirty-sixth and thirty-

---

[20] Act of May 22, 1872, ch. 193, 17 Stat. 142.

[21] Act of June 6, 1898, ch. 389, 30 Stat. 432.

[22] Cawthorn v. Circosta, 590 F. Supp. 3d 873, 889-892 (E.D. N.C. 2022) rev'd sub nom Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F. 4th 245 (4th Cir. 2022). This argument, too, was made and rejected by the House during the exclusion of Victor Berger. 6 Cannon, supra note 18, at 55.

[23] The power in general of Congress by two-thirds vote of each House to remove Section Three's disability and the history of its exercise are the central themes of Professor Gerard Magliocca's excellent article, cited supra note 5.

[24] See generally Magliocca, Amnesty, supra note 5, at 112-120.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial, military, and naval service of the United States, heads of departments, and foreign ministers of the United States.[25]

The key words are "imposed" and "[hereby] removed." The words of the 1872 statute are used in the past tense: the statute removed disqualifications imposed by the Fourteenth Amendment—that is, disabilities that had already become legally effective. That is simply the natural reading, and the natural implication, of the language employed.

Indeed, this is almost exactly what the Fourth Circuit recently said in reversing the district court's decision in the Cawthorn case: Congress in 1872 employed "the past-tense version" of the verb "impose," thus "indicating its intent to lift only those disabilities that had by then been 'imposed.'"[26] Moreover, the Fourth Circuit continued: "[t]he operative clause's principal verb—'removed'—reinforces this conclusion. In the mid-nineteenth century, as today, that word generally connoted taking away something that already exists rather than forestalling something yet to come."[27]

By contrast, the district court had faulted Congress for not being more explicit: Congress "could have limited the Act to remove Section 3's disabilities from 'persons currently subject to the disabilities' or 'persons against whom the disabilities were lodged' at the time (i.e., the 'Confederates') but did not do so."[28] Therefore, the district court concluded, by the "plain language of Section 3 and the 1872 Act, Congress removed all of Section 3's disabilities from all persons whomsoever who were not explicitly excepted."[29] With all due respect, the district court appears to have been simply hoodwinked by the (for lack of a better word) feel of the "all persons whomsoever" language and completely missed the other language that made clear the statute's past tense.

What about the 1898 statute? Does it yield a different result? On the cusp of the Spanish-American War, at a moment of seeming national unity and perhaps a desire to put aside old sectional grievances (and, one might add more cynically, at a time of rising Jim Crow sentiment)[30]—Congress enacted another general disqualification-removal statute. This one removed the disqualification for everybody, without exception. Its language is even more laconic:

---

[25] Act of May 22, 1872, ch. 193, 17 Stat. 142.
[26] Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F. 4th 245, 258 (4th Cir. 2022).
[27] Id.
[28] Cawthorn v. Circosta, 590 F. Supp. 3d 873, 891 (E.D. N.C. 2022) rev'd sub nom Carthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F. 4th 245 (4th Cir. 2022).
[29] Id.
[30] See, e.g., Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896); Cummings v. Richmond County Bd. of Ed. 175 U.S. 528 (1899). See also Michael Stokes Paulsen & Luke Paulsen, The Constitution: An Introduction 195-201 (2015).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the disability imposed by section three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States heretofore incurred is hereby removed.[31]

In one sense, that's about as categorical, across-the-board a disqualification-removal as one can imagine: the disability imposed by section three is hereby removed. Period. No exceptions. But here it is also even clearer that the 1898 act is backward-looking. Like the 1872 act, the 1898 act uses past-tense language: a disability (already) "imposed" is now being "removed" from its prior legal existence. What's more, the 1898 act says that the Section Three disqualification being removed was one "heretofore incurred." That is unmistakably backward-looking, past-occurrence language.

What might otherwise—that is, but for the clarity of the "heretofore incurred" language—give the 1898 act the feel of a now-and-ever-shalt-be removal, eliminating all future Section Three disqualification as well as any and all extant ones, is the Act's reference to "the disability" imposed by Section Three. This singular reference might be taken to suggest that Section Three's disqualification was thought a one-time-only, single-shot, Civil War era occurrence.[32] If Section Three was good for one rebellion only, then repealing it in the past tense repeals all that there is. But of course, as we have argued, Section Three is not limited to one rebellion only, and so far as we can tell even the Fifty-fifth Congress did not think that it was[33] (nor would it matter if they did).

In any event, though these statutes do not even purport to sunset Section Three for the future, they do prompt us to consider the interesting question of Congress's constitutional power: What if they did purport to sunset Section Three for the future? Is Congress's constitutional power to remove Section Three's disqualification general and prospective, letting it remove Section Three's disqualification once and for all, including for future situations? We think not.

To be clear, we don't think there's anything inherently unthinkable or absurd about the idea of an "exploding" or otherwise defeasible constitutional provision. Legal drafters might sometimes want to provide for an expiration event or expiration

---

[31] Act of June 6, 1898, ch. 389, 30 Stat. 432.

[32] For instance, the D.C. Circuit's recess-appointments opinion in Noel Canning v. NLRB, 705 F.3d 490, 500 (D.C. Cir. 2013) aff'd only on alternate grounds, 134 S.Ct. 2550 (2014), leaned heavily on "this difference between the word choice 'recess' and 'the Recess'," arguing that "[a]s a matter of cold, unadorned logic, it makes no sense to [say] that when the Framers said 'the Recess,' what they really meant was 'a recess.' This is not an insignificant distinction. In the end it makes all the difference." Id. But a majority of the Supreme Court did not share this view of the text. NLRB v. Noel Canning, 134 S.Ct. 2550, 2561 (2014).

[33] For the brief legislative history of the 1898 act, see 31 Cong. Rec. 5367-5419 (1898).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

date, even in an enduring Constitution. Article I's Slave Importation Clause, protecting the international slave trade, exploded after twenty years.[34] So too the initial allocation of representatives to states is written in to the text of the Constitution, even though it was then exploded by the subsequent census.[35] Other provisions of the Constitution set baseline rules that Congress has power to modify. Article I, section 4 does that with respect to state legislative power over congressional elections: "Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations."[36] Article III, section 2 does that with respect to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, setting a default rule subject to "such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."[37] The Twentieth Amendment, in Section 2, sets a default date of Congress's annual meeting.[38]

There's no reason why the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment could not have similarly drafted Section Three to provide for the provision's own extinction after a supermajority vote of Congress.[39] But that is simply not what Section Three says. The second sentence of Section Three is not a grant of power to explode, or amend, the content of the rule stated in the first sentence. It is a grant of power to remove the consequences of the rule's operation.

To see this, break down Section Three into its component parts: Section Three has two sentences. The first one describes at length the disqualification for those who have taken a covered oath and engaged in insurrection or related conduct. Of course, those two things must actually have happened for the rule of Section Three's first sentence to be triggered—for a disqualification to have come into legal effect.

---

[34] U.S. Const. art. I, §9, cl. 1. ("The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.") For a scathing critique of the substance and purpose of this proviso, see, e.g., Paulsen & Paulsen, supra note 30, at 81-83.

[35] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl.3.

[36] U.S. Const. art. I, § 4.

[37] U.S. Const. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

[38] U.S. Const. amend. XX, §2.

[39] We thus part ways with Professor Magliocca here. Magliocca argues (in addition to versions of the points we make above) that Section Three's second sentence cannot be read as authorizing Congress to remove future disabilities because this "would mean that Congress basically repealed Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1872. But Congress cannot repeal a part of the Constitution by itself: only a constitutional amendment can do that." Gerard N. Magliocca, The January 6th Insurrectionists Do Not Have Amnesty, JURIST – Academic Commentary, April 13, 2022, https://www.jurist.org/commentary/2022/04/gerard-magliocca-january-6-insurrectionists/. See also Greene v. Raffensperger, 599 F. Supp. 3d 1283, 1314 (N.D. Ga. 2022) ("'Congress has no power whatever to repeal a provision of the Constitution by a mere statute'") (quoting 6 Cannon, supra note 18, at 55).

This strikes us as not quite right: If Section Three in fact authorized prospective removal of disqualifications arising from future acts of insurrection, a statute doing so would not be repealing a constitutional provision but exercising a power conferred by that constitutional provision—a power to terminate the provision's ongoing legal effect.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The second sentence (the "But" sentence) then gives Congress the power to "remove such disability." ("But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.") The "But" sentence explicitly cross-references the first. Thus, the most natural reading of the two sentences in relation to each other is that the second sentence confers an exceptions power that only comes into existence when the conditions specified in the first sentence have occurred. And to belabor the point a moment further, the word "Remove" means (and meant at the time, according to 1864 dictionaries) to displace or take away something that already exists.[40] This confirms that Congress's removal power therefore only comes into being when a legal disqualification has vested by virtue of the operation of Section Three's first sentence.

Section Three's first sentence is written as a general and prospective rule, not limited to the specific instance of the Civil War. Section Three's second sentence is written as a continuing power to grant relief from disabilities already imposed by the operation of the first sentence. The power to remove an extant legal disability is not a power to rescind the legal rule that creates that disability. Thus, not only has Congress never purported to sunset Section Three, it lacks the power to do so by Section Three's own terms.

* * *

All of this is, we submit, basic. But it is also foundational. Section Three remains legally operative as part of the U.S. Constitution. Its rule of disqualification is general, not limited to the Civil War era. It states a rule of law embodied in the written constitutional text as permanent fundamental law. It possesses prospective force and applies to new situations: wherever the rule applies, the rule applies. And while Congress comprehensively relieved insurrectionists of the disability of disqualifications incurred prior to 1898, it did not (and could not) erase Section Three from the Constitution. Section Three remains in force.

Is anything more required, then, before this provision of the Constitution can (and must) be given effect by U.S. political actors whose powers and duties are such as to call for application of Section Three as a rule of law? Put somewhat differently: Is Section Three a self-executing rule of constitutional law, complete in itself? Or does Section Three require implementing legislation by Congress or some other further legal or administrative action before it has legal force? We take up that question next.

---

[40] Dr. Webster's Complete Dictionary of the English Language 1116 (Chauncy A. Goodrich and Noah Porter, eds. 1864) (defining "remove" as "To cause to change place; to move away from the position occupied; to displace") (quoted in Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F. 4th 245, 258 (4th Cir. 2022)).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

II. Section Three is Legally Self-Executing

Our second point is colossally important—a major sticking point for some. But it is a point we think should be obvious: Section Three is self-executing. That is, its disqualifications from office are constitutionally automatic whenever its conditions for disqualification are met. Nothing more needs to be done in order for Section Three's prohibitions to be legally effective. Section Three requires no implementing legislation by Congress. Its commands are enacted into law by the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment. Where Section Three's legal rule of constitutional disqualification is satisfied, an affected prospective officeholder is disqualified. Automatically. Legally.

In the years immediately after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted this seemingly obvious reading of Section Three was deemed inconvenient, rejected in the highest quarters, and has since faded from view. We thus give the point considerable attention here. Our analysis here is organized in three steps. First, we take Section Three itself, and explain why it has direct legal effect. Second, we discuss how this legal effect can and must be recognized by all persons and institutions who have the occasion to apply it in the performance of their duties—election officials, state and federal administrators, legislatures, courts. Third, we consider at some length the leading counterargument to our view: the 1869 opinion written by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase as a circuit court judge in Griffin's Case. Even if the result in that case is defensible—which is far from clear, and raises grave separation-of-powers problems of its own—its argument against self-execution is so wrong as to prove our case. Section Three is legally self-executing as operative constitutional law.

A. Section Three as Automatic Legal Disqualification

Before we consider Section Three itself, consider the Constitution as a whole. Though too many constitutional law teachers and casebooks begin their study of the Constitution with questions of judicial review, and cases like Marbury,[41] in doing so they put the cart before the horse. The horse is the Constitution, which is itself the "supreme law of the land."[42] Our system is one of constitutional supremacy, not judicial supremacy or legislative supremacy. As a general matter, this means that it is the Constitution which states the law, and it is the job of government officials to apply it, not the other way around.

This general truth is no less true of Section Three. Section Three's language is language of automatic legal effect: "No person shall be" directly enacts the officeholding bar it describes where its rule is satisfied. It lays down a rule by saying what shall [41] But not ours! See Paulsen, McConnell, Bray and Baude, The Constitution of the United States (5th ed. 2022).

[42] U.S. Const. art. VI.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

be.[43] It does not grant a power to Congress (or any other body) to enact or effectuate a rule of disqualification. It enacts the rule itself. Section Three directly adopts a constitutional rule of disqualification from office.

This should be no surprise, as the same thing is true of the Constitution's other rules of disqualification from office. A person who has not attained to the age of thirty-five is not qualified to be President of the United States. This disqualification is automatic. The Constitution's rule is self-executing. "No person . . . shall be eligible" to be President who does not satisfy the age requirement.[44] The disqualification requires no further legislation or other action, by anybody, to be operative. The disqualification simply is. So too for Article II's citizenship and length-of-residency eligibility prerequisites for the office of President. And so too for the constitutional qualifications—age, citizenship, state inhabitancy—for members of the House and Senate: "No Person shall be" a Representative who does not meet Article I, section 2's requirements.[45] "No Person shall be" a U.S. Senator who does not meet Article I, section 3's requirements.[46] These restrictions on eligibility are legally binding simply by virtue of their presence in the Constitution.

The language of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment parallels, even duplicates, the language used in these other provisions to express other constitutional disqualifications from officeholding.[47] None of these disqualifications requires any further legal action or legislation to be operative. Where a constitutional legal disqualification exists, it simply exists. It is a binding rule of constitutional law.

Again, this kind of binding rule should be no surprise. The Thirteenth Amendment's ban on slavery, enacted a few years earlier, works the same way. Immediately upon adoption of the amendment, slavery was legally extinguished as a matter of constitutional law. "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude . . . shall exist ...," the Thirteenth Amendment provides.[48] The institution of slavery was immediately, legally, constitutionally gone.[49] The Thirteenth Amendment contains a separate section granting Congress the power to enforce the prohibition of slavery.[50] But that enforcement power scarcely means that the ban on slavery contained in Section One was inoperative unless and until Congress passed legislation making it operative. Such a

---

[43] We have borrowed this felicitous phrasing from John Harrison. Cf. John Harrison, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts and the Text of Article III, 84 U. Chi. L. Rev. 203, 211 (1997) ("The Vesting Clause is a self-executing enactment; it lays down rules by saying what shall be.")

[44] U.S. Const. art. II, §2, cl. 5 (emphasis added).

[45] U.S. Const. art. I, §2, cl. 2(emphasis added).

[46] U.S. Const. art. I, §3, cl. 3 (emphasis added).

[47] See Josh Chafetz, Democracy's Privileged Few 168 (2007).

[48] U.S. Const. amend. XIII §1 (emphasis added).

[49] See Alexander Tsesis, The Thirteenth Amendment and American Freedom: A Legal History 48–53 (2004) (documenting reactions of persons learning of their freedom immediately after ratification).

[50] U.S. Const. amend. XIII §2 ("Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

position would be ridiculous. The power to enforce adds to the substantive prohibition—it is not a subtraction from or suspension of it.

And of course, the same is true elsewhere in the Fourteenth Amendment too. We take it as obvious that Section One is self-executing. Section One of the Fourteenth Amendment, like Section Three states directly operative rules of constitutional law: "No state shall," in Section One, and "No person shall" in Section Three.[51] Both of these provisions are subject to additional enforcement legislation by Congress under Section Five. Yet it is common ground that Section One is self-executing. Nobody thinks (for example) that the prohibitions of Section One are inoperative unless and until Congress enacts legislation pursuant to its Section Five legislative power to bring them to life.

In each instance, Congress certainly can enact legislation "to enforce" the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments' commands, pursuant to their grants of legislative power.[52] Doing so can unlock additional procedural mechanisms, additional deference by courts to Congress's view of the law, and so on. The Civil Rights Act of 1866, the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 and more were designed to enforce Section One of the Thirteenth and Section One of the Fourteenth Amendment. But, to repeat, the existence of an enforcement power does not mean that the Amendment's specific legal commands lack any independent, self-executing force.[53]

So too, Congress in fact enacted implementing legislation in 1870 to enforce Section Three, authorizing quo warranto civil suits brought by the United States to remove state officials unconstitutionally holding office in violation of Section Three and imposing criminal penalties for knowing violations of Section Three.[54] But Congress's choice to trigger additional procedural mechanisms and federal jurisdiction

---

[51] U.S. Const. amdt XIV, sec. 1, 3. Nothing here turns on it, but Section Four of the Fourteenth Amendment, which repudiates rebel and slave debts while guaranteeing the legal obligation of the national debt, also seems to be self-executing. Section Two, which alters Article I, section 2's rule for how Representatives "shall be apportioned," presents a more complicated case. Its rule is immediately operative, like the rest of the Fourteenth Amendment, but its rule operates by changing an apportionment process undertaken by Congress. In practice, Congress has ignored it, see Michael Rosin, The Five-Fifths Rule and the Unconstitutional Presidential Election of 1916, 46 Hist. Meth. 57 (2013); Amar, America's Constitution, supra note 4, at 395; see also email from John Harrison to Akhil Reed Amar, quoted in id. at 611 n. 96, and it is hard to see how anybody else can realistically enforce it.

[52] U.S. Const. amdt. XIII, sec. 2; amdt. XIV, sec. 5.

[53] Indeed, Section One was added to an early draft of the Fourteenth Amendment precisely to ensure that state Black Codes would be unenforceable even if there were no federal legislation saying so. Baude, Campbell, & Sachs, supra note 10, at 30-31, 63-64.

[54] Act of May 31, 1870 (First Ku Klux Klan Act), ch. 114 §§14, 15, 16 Stat. 140, 143. The criminal prohibition in Section 15 of the Act was repealed in the 1909 codification of the penal code, 35 Stat. 1088, 1153, § 341 (1909), and the quo warranto provision in Section 14 was repealed during the 1948 positive law codifications of Title 28 of the U.S. Code, see Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 646, § 39; see also Lynch, supra note 5, at 206 n. 365. Neither of these codifications was thought to make a substantive change by repealing these provisions, see generally William W. Barron, The Judicial Code, 8 F.R.D. 439 (1949); see also The United States Compiled Statutes, Title XIX, page 4459 (1916), which were for Section Three cases does not mean that there was no constitutional prohibition before Congress acted.[55] Congress enforced Section Three's prohibition. Congress was not the one to give it legal effect. Section Three was effective law all along.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section Three is also noticeably different from other constitutional provisions that deal with misbehavior—provisions that are not self-executing in the same way. Article III, for instance, describes the offense of treason:

> Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.
>
> The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.[56]

Note the contrast. The Treason Clause defines an offense ("Treason . . . shall consist") but it does not itself convict anybody of treason. Section Three, by contrast, enacts its own disqualification ("No person shall be"). It acts on persons, not offenses. This is driven home by the Treason Clause's specific procedures and powers: "[C]onvict[ions] of treason" require two witnesses or a public confession; and "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason." Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, by contrast enacts its standard and imposes its consequences all at once.

Similarly, the Constitution's impeachment provisions say that those who are impeached "shall be removed from Office."[57] But the Constitution does not itself impeach anybody. Instead, it specifies that somebody else—the House and Senate—must do the impeaching.[58] Again, Section Three's contrast is glaring. The framers of Section Three had the treason clause and impeachment clauses at hand and chose a thought obsolete by then. The repeals therefore certainly did not reflect a decision to preempt or preclude any other existing remedies for Section Three.

---

[55] Professor Magliocca concurs. Magliocca, Amnesty, supra note 5, at 106 & n.101 (noting that "enacting enforcement legislation does not imply that legislation is required" and that the existence of Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment does not imply that the other sections are not self-executing). Indeed, this is especially so because Congress may have been responding to the decision in Griffin's Case (wrongly) holding that such legislation was required for Section Three to have operative legal effect. See infra Part II.C.

[56] U. S. Const. art. III, sec. 3.

[57] U.S. Const. art. II, sec. 4.

[58] U.S. Const. art I, sec. 3 & sec. 4.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

noticeably different path.[59] Section Three does not call for treason trials or the impeachment of insurrections and rebels. It directly imposes an across-the-board disqualification and involves Congress only if Congress wishes to end it.

Section Three's constitutional disqualification, where applicable, just is. It stands on its own as a constitutional rule of law, having come into legal force "as Part of this Constitution," along with the rest of the Fourteenth Amendment, "when ratified" as a constitutional amendment.[60] It immediately became "supreme Law of the Land." [61] Its rule took immediate effect. Section Three is, in that sense, legally self-executing.

Is there any serious textual argument to the contrary? We will address Chief Justice Chase's conclusion in Griffin's Case in a moment. But we suspect that resistance to this point often comes instead from some misdirected intuitions. One is the problem of supposed difficulty. It seems easy, perhaps, to apply the constitutional qualifications of age and citizenship.[62] It is pretty obvious what these are and obvious what they demand that we do. But who exactly is disqualified by Section Three is, at least to initial appearances, a more difficult, complicated, and fact-specific question. It is a more difficult question of law because we must plumb the meanings of "insurrection" and "rebellion" and so on—and these meanings are not quite as self-evident as "thirty-five years of age" (at least until this article is widely read and accepted). And it is more difficult in practice, because even once we know what the terms of Section Three mean, we must know what exactly every prior-oath-sworn official did.

---

[59] Indeed, for what it is worth, the legislative history supports this understanding. Section Three's opponents criticized the proposal for its immediate consequences on former Confederates, and its proponents seemed to share the same understanding. For opponents, see Cong. Globe 39th Cong., 1st Sess., at 2900 (Senator Doolittle) (amendment "will have the effect of putting a new punishment, not prescribed by the laws, upon all those persons who are embraced within its provisions"); id. at 2916 (Senator Doolittle); id. at 2940 (Senator Hendricks) (complaining about immediate consequences); for proponents, see id. at 2919 (Senator Willey) (defending the amendment's immediate effect because those affected had already "forfeited" their claim to participate in government "by their past conduct'); id. (they lost their "citizenship rights when they committed treason"); Cong. Globe 39th Cong., 1st Sess., App., at 228 (Senator Defrees); Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. at 3036 (Senator Henderson) (defending the immediate effect of Section Three against the charge that it is a bill of attainder or ex post facto law); see generally infra Part III.A-B. See also Graber, supra note 12, at 26-27, 35-37 (documenting all of these discussions) .

[60] U.S. Const. art. V.

[61] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

[62] See Gerard N. Magliocca, Background as Foreground: Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment and January 6th, at 14 n.42 (Mar. 2, 2023), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=4306094 ("Section Three was unprecedented in the sense that prior restrictions on serving in office were bright-line rules (age and citizenship, for example) instead of standards"). On the other hand, the Constitution's inhabitancy requirement, has proved far from simple in practice. See Jack Maskell, Congressional Research Service, Qualifications of Members of Congress (Jan 15, 2015) at 13-18, https://sgp.fas.org/crs/misc/R41946.pdf. And there has been recent litigation about the requirement that the President be a "natural born citizen" as well. See Derek T. Muller, "Natural Born" Disputes in the 2016 Election, 85 Fordham L. Rev. 1097 (2016).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Not all participation in insurrection or rebellion is open and notorious. More difficult it may be, to interpret and apply the disqualification of Section Three than the disqualifications of age, citizenship, and residency. But the fact of difficulty is a non sequitur. The fact that it might be hard for us to know today what a legal rule means (or how it applies) does not mean that it is not the legal rule.[63] The Constitution says what it says and we must try to apply it as best we can. To start by asking what is easy for us, and then to assume that the Constitution must mean something that makes our lives easy, is as fallacious as drawing the curve before gathering the data points.[64]

Resistance might also come from the problem of enforcement. The Constitution is generally self-executing law, but still, somebody has to enforce it. Somebody has to read it, understand it, and ensure that our practices conform to its commands. (Many somebodies, actually, as we discuss shortly.) This is true, but again it is a non-sequitur. It is true that government officials must enforce the Constitution, and who does this and how they do it are important questions, maybe the central questions of constitutional law. But the meaning of the Constitution comes first. Officials must enforce the Constitution because it is law; it is wrong to think that it only becomes law if they decide to enforce it. Section Three has legal force already.

B. Who (All) Can (Must) Faithfully Apply and Enforce Section Three?

As we just said, even though Section Three is a self-executing, immediately applicable constitutional legal rule, someone needs to do the actual applying of that rule to particular situations where its application is called for. Section Three's constitutional disqualification exists of its own force as an abstract matter. But someone needs to bring that legal rule to bear in a concrete situation as a practical matter.

Who has the power and duty to do this? We think the answer is: anybody who possesses legal authority (under relevant state or federal law) to decide whether somebody is eligible for office. This might mean different political or judicial actors, depending on the office involved, and depending on the relevant state or federal law. But in principle: Section Three's disqualification rule may and must be followed—applied, honored, obeyed, enforced, carried out—by anyone whose job it is to figure out whether someone is legally qualified to office, just as with any of the Constitution's other qualifications.

---

[63] Christopher R. Green, Constitutional Truthmakers, 32 Notre Dame J. L. Ethics & Pub Pol'y 497, 511-512 (2018).

[64] Cf. Michael Stokes Paulsen, Lemon Is Dead, 43 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 795, 839 (1993) (mocking constitutional interpretation that engages in "the legal equivalent of the method my lab partner and I used in high school chemistry: first draw the desired curve; then plot the data; if time permits, do the experiment"); Stephen E. Sachs, Originalism: Standard and Procedure, 135 Harv. L. Rev. 777 (2022).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

These actors might include (for example): state election officials; other state executive or administrative officials; state legislatures and governors; the two houses of Congress; the President and subordinate executive branch officers; state and federal judges deciding cases where such legal rules apply; even electors for the offices of president and vice president. We will discuss in detail some of these examples presently. But two points are important to keep clear at the outset: First, all of these bodies or entities may possess, within their sphere, the power and duty to apply Section Three as governing law. Second, their authority to do so exists as a function of the powers they otherwise possess. No action is necessary to "activate" Section Three as a prerequisite to its application as law by bodies or persons whose responsibilities call for its application. The Constitution's qualification and disqualification rules exist and possess legal force in their own right, which is what makes them applicable and enforceable by a variety of officials in a variety of contexts.

Consider some illustrations:

1. Seeking Office

a. by election

Anybody who seeks office will at some point need to show that they are entitled to hold that office. At every point that this occurs, Section Three governs. So, for instance, state or local election boards, and state Secretaries of State, may possess state-law authority to make at least initial determinations as to eligibility of candidates for elected office in that state or representing that state in Congress (as authorized by Article I, section 4 of the Constitution)—and, thus, whether or not such candidates shall be placed on a primary or general election ballot.[65] Those state bodies or officers are obliged, often by oath—sometimes by oath mandated by the U.S. Constitution—to act consistently with the requirements of the Constitution in the discharge of their duties.[66] Accordingly, such state actors can and must apply Section Three's disquali-

[65] To be sure, the centralized, government-administered ballot did not come to American until the late Nineteenth Century and so of course states are not constitutionally required to run elections in this way. But if they do, Section Three governs how they carry out their duties.

[66] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl.2 ("This Constitution ... shall be the supreme Law of the Land"). See also U.S. Const. art. VI, cl.3 ("The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution."). The nature of the Constitution as supreme, binding law is of course fundamental to the argument for "judicial review," as it is likewise fundamental to the argument for the obligation of all government officials to adhere to the law supplied by the Constitution and give its commands priority over any other source of law or legal duty. See generally Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Irrepressible Myth of Marbury, 101 Mich. L. Rev. 2706 (2003); see also William Baude, Severability First Principles, 109 Va. L. Rev. 1, 5-9 (2023).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

fication in carrying out their state-law responsibilities—just as they possess the authority and duty to comply with and enforce the Constitution's other qualification-for-office requirements.[67]

For an example of how this process is supposed to work, consider how the state of Georgia entertained a Section Three challenge to the qualifications of Representative Marjorie Taylor Greene under Georgia law. A state administrative law judge took evidence about Representative Greene's involvement in the events of January 6, 2021.[68] The judge proceeded under the theory that if January 6 was a constitutional "insurrection," and if Representative Greene had been part of it, she would be barred from office.[69] But it concluded that the challengers had failed to meet their burden of proof under state law: "In short, even assuming, arguendo, that the Invasion was an insurrection, Challengers presented no persuasive evidence Rep. Greene took any action—direct physical efforts, contribution of personal services or capital, issuance of directives or marching orders, transmissions of intelligence, or even statements of encouragement—in furtherance thereof on or after January 3, 2021."[70] Secretary of State Brad Raffensberger issued a final decision ratifying the hearing officer's proposed findings that day.[71]

Such determinations about ballot eligibility may also be subject to further judicial review. In state courts, these procedures will of course depend on what review is available under state law. Similarly, federal courts might well possess jurisdiction, subject to the usual federal jurisdiction doctrines (such as standing, ripeness, mootness, and abstention), to decide cases of candidate eligibility. Continuing the example, Representative Greene did file a federal lawsuit attempting to enjoin the then-pending state proceedings (mentioned above), and the district court concluded that the case was justiciable and that Younger abstention did not apply, but that Greene's claims failed on the merits.[72] While Greene's appeal to the Eleventh Circuit was pending, she prevailed in the state proceedings, so the case was dismissed as moot.[73] The [67] We note that the determination by state officials that a candidate for election to the U.S. Congress is not disqualified—and may be elected—does not bind the respective houses of Congress, in the exercise of their independent Article I, section 5, powers to act as "Judge" of the "Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own Members" and refuse to seat prospective members it judges to be constitutionally disqualified by Section Three or other constitutional limitation. See also infra n. 96 and accompanying text.

---

[68] Initial Decision, Rowan v. Greene, No. 2222-582-OSAH-SECSTATE-CE-57-Beaudrot (Georgia Office of State Administrative Hearings, May 6, 2022).

[69] Id. at 5-6.

[70] Id. at 15. The January 3, 2021 cut-off is because that is the date that Representative Greene first took a constitutional oath. The Court also specifically rejected the argument that a Newsmax appearance on January 5, 2021, should be interpreted as a "coded message from Rep. Greene to her co-conspirators to go forward with a previously planned incursion into the Capitol." Id. at 16.

[71] Final Decision, Rowan v. Greene, No. 2222-582-OSAH-SECSTATE-CE-57-Beaudrot (Georgia Office of the Secretary of State, May 6, 2022).

[72] Greene v. Raffensperger, 599 F. Supp. 3d 1283, 1320 (N.D. Ga. 2022).

[73] Greene v. Sec'y of State for Georgia, 52 F.4th 907, 909-910 (11th Cir. 2022).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

details, of course, will vary from case to case. But where any of these tribunals has jurisdiction they too obviously have the power and duty to apply Section Three as the supreme law of the land.

This is not to say that states must provide any particular procedure for bringing a challenge to ballot eligibility qualification or grant a cause of action to particular private individuals to bring such challenges. For instance, in a recent suit seeking to disqualify Arizona Representative Mark Finchem and U.S. Representatives Paul Gosar and Andy Biggs from the 2022 primary ballot, the Arizona Supreme Court concluded that state law did not provide a private cause of action for a disqualification challenge.[74] In principle, that could well be right. Whether to provide a cause of action in such cases is largely a question of state law. Section Three slots in to existing powers and procedures without mandating or micromanaging them.

That said, the Arizona Supreme Court's muddied reasoning in the Finchem-Gosar-Biggs case necessitates a few clarifying points. First, state law can enforce Section Three, and the Fourteenth Amendment does not place any particular presumption against doing so. Unfortunately, the Arizona Supreme Court suggested otherwise, writing that "Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment appears to expressly delegate to Congress the authority to devise the method to enforce the Disqualification Clause . . . which suggests that A.R.S. 16-351(B) does not provide a private right of action to invoke the Disqualification Clause against the Candidates."[75] This inference is mistaken—Congress's power to enforce federal law, including constitutional law, is not exclusive of the states, and states regularly enforce federal law including constitutional law in their own courts.[76]

Second, in some circumstances state law not only can but must enforce Section Three. Under the rule of Testa v. Katt,[77] where a state does open its courts to a cause of action, it must apply federal law evenhandedly to that cause of action. As the unanimous Court put it: "[T]he Constitution and the laws passed pursuant to it are the supreme laws of the land, binding alike upon states, courts, and the people, 'any-thing

---

[74] Hansen v. Finchem, No. CV-22-0099-AP/EL, 2022 WL 1468157 (Ariz. Supreme Ct. May 9, 2022) (nonprecedential disposition).

[75] Id. at *1. The court did not cite any authority for this interpretation, but its argument does echo a fallacious argument made by Chief Justice Chase in Griffin's Case, which we discuss at greater length presently. See infra Part II.C.2.d. The Arizona Supreme Court also made the additional suggestion that Article I, Section 5 gave Congress "exclusive authority to determine whether to enforce the Disqualification Clause against its prospective members," id. We are skeptical of this point as well, see infra n. 96 and accompanying text, but in any event it would have only applied to federal representatives Gosar and Biggs, not the lead defendant, state representative Finchem. The individual houses of Congress of course have no Article I, Section 5 power, exclusive or otherwise, to determine the membership of state legislatures.

[76] See, e.g., Tafflin v. Levitt, 493 U.S. 455, 458-460 (1990); id. at 469- 470 (Scalia, J., concurring); see also Thomas Koenig & Christopher D. Moore, Of State Remedies and Federal Rights (May 29, 2023) https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=4462807.

[77] 330 U.S. 386 (1947).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."[78] And thus "the policy of the federal Act is the prevailing policy in every state."[79] A state cannot treat federal obligations the way it can treat foreign ones.

The Arizona Supreme Court's decision unfortunately can be read to suggest otherwise. The court cryptically wrote that the state "statute's scope is limited to challenges based upon 'qualifications . . . as prescribed by law,' and does not include the Disqualification Clause, a legal proscription from holding office."[80] If the court meant to distinguish federal constitutional qualifications from state statutes, it seems to have violated Testa. If the court meant that Section Three's dis-qualification is not a "qualification," that seems nonsensical. And if it meant something else, it is hard to figure out what.

In any event, the real question is what procedure is available for determining whether a candidate is qualified to office. That is basically a question of state law, and the correct procedures will likely vary from state to state. But the courts owe state law a full and fair reading, not one slanted by reticence to acknowledge the life in Section Three.

b. by appointment

Now let us turn to appointments. Just as with elected office, anybody who must decide whether an appointee is qualified must comply with Section Three. Traditionally this includes at a minimum whoever nominated the officer.[81] Thus governors, presidents, and other nominating authorities can and should—indeed, constitutionally must—decline to nominate and appoint to state or federal offices persons who are constitutionally disqualified by Section Three. And likewise, where nominating authority is subject to additional confirmation—by a state senate, the U.S. Senate, or any other body—that body presumably can and should, constitutionally must, decline to consent to the appointment of such constitutionally disqualified nominees.[82]

---

[78] Id. at 391 (quoting U.S. Const. Art VI, sec. 2).

[79] Id. at 393. To be sure, Testa and especially subsequent cases expanding it have been subject to powerful criticisms as a matter of original meaning, see Ann Woolhandler & Michael G. Collins, State Jurisdictional Independence and Federal Supremacy, 72 Fla. L. Rev. 73, 78-83, 97-105 (2020); Haywood v. Drown, 556 U.S. 729, 742-67 (2009) (Thomas, J., dissenting). We bracket those criticisms here.

[80] Hansen v. Finchem, No. CV-22-0099-AP/EL, 2022 WL 1468157, at *1 (Ariz. Supreme Ct. May 9, 2022) (nonprecedential disposition).

[81] For instance, both President George Washington and President Franklin Roosevelt felt obligated to consider whether their Supreme Court nominees (Patterson and Black, respectively) were constitutionally disqualified by Article I, sec. 6. See William Baude, The Unconstitutionality of Justice Black, 98 Tex. L. Rev. 327, 330, 333-334, 355-356 (2019).

[82] See Michael Stokes Paulsen, Is Lloyd Bentsen Unconstitutional? 46 Stanford L. Rev. 907, 914-918 (1994) (discussing constitutional responsibility of political branches to enforce constitutional disqualifications from office irrespective of whether they give rise to a judicial case or controversy, and bemoaning the failure of all to enforce the Emoluments Clause); see also Baude, Black, supra note 81, at 355-356 (similar); see also Michael Stokes Paulsen, Straightening Out The Confirmation Mess, 105

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In other words, the election and appointment systems, from top to bottom, frequently make decisions about a candidate's eligibility for office. All of those decisions are legally bound by Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment; and all persons making such decisions are correspondingly bound to faithfully interpret, enforce, and apply Section Three.

2. Holding Office

What about those who already hold office—either because Section Three was not attended to before they gained office, or because their disqualifying conduct happened later?[83]

Once again, the answer turns in part on what procedures are available under other law. State officials can be subject to a variety of remedies for unlawfully holding office. They might (or might not) be subject to removal, as a matter of state law, by a private suit quo warranto, by the authority of another executive or judicial officer or administrative board, or perhaps even by the state legislature exercising powers of impeachment or recall. In addition, it is possible that the salaries of such rightfully-disqualified officials—and the legal eligibility of such persons for those salaries—might be subject to the authority and determination of some other state official.

We submit that all such officials—administrators, executives, legislatures—possessing legal authority concerning such matters likewise possess the authority (and duty) to interpret, apply, and enforce Section Three's disqualification in the course of exercising that legal authority. And once again: if such determinations are judicially reviewable under state law, the courts likewise possess the authority and duty to interpret, apply, and enforce Section Three.[84]

For an example of how this process is supposed to work consider how the state of New Mexico removed commissioner Couy Griffin from state office.[85] Griffin was an elected commissioner for Otero County, New Mexico, who promoted, assisted, and

---

Yale L.J. 549, 562-570 (1995) (noting parallel constitutional structural argument for obligation of both the President and the Senate to exercise independent faithful constitutional interpretive judgment in the course of carrying out their respective powers with respect to appointment); Charles L. Black, Jr., A Note on Senatorial Consideration of Supreme Court Nominees, 79 Yale L.J. 657, 658-660 (1970) (similar).

[83] Or because Section Three was not yet adopted as law when they were appointed to office but became operative and disqualified them subsequently. This was the situation presented in Griffin's Case, discussed presently. See infra at II.C.

[84] Of course, federal courts, too, might possess jurisdiction, subject to the usual rules and conditions, to decide such lawsuits just as they will for state determinations of election candidate eligibility. See supra notes 72-73 and accompanying text. And when doing so, they have the authority and duty to interpret, apply, and enforce Section Three.

[85] New Mexico ex rel. White v. Griffin, 2022 WL 4295619, D-101-CV-2022-00473 (1st. Dist. Santa Fe County, Sep. 6, 2022).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ultimately joined in the January 6 insurrection against the Capitol. A group of New Mexico citizens filed a quo warranto action against Griffin under New Mexico law, seeking his removal from office. The New Mexico district court took evidence, received legal arguments, and then concluded that Griffin was disqualified under Section Three. More precisely, and quite correctly, it held that Griffin had been disqualified since the day of the January 6 insurrection, and ordered his immediate ejection from office, and permanently enjoined him from seeking or holding any other covered position.[86]

As a matter of state procedure, the court concluded that the New Mexico quo warranto statute was a remedy for ejecting unlawful office holders.[87] It also concluded that quo warranto could be sought by any citizen of New Mexico, without any further showing of injury, because the New Mexico courts are not bound by the same "standing" limitations as the federal courts are. As a matter of federal law, the court had no trouble concluding that the events of January 6. 2021 were a constitutional "insurrection." And it had no trouble concluding that Griffin had engaged in that insurrection, both by "voluntarily aid[ing] the insurrectionists' cause by helping to mobilize and incite" the crowd, and by joining in the invasion of the Capitol itself, even though Griffin himself did not commit a violent act.[88] The New Mexico county court correctly recognized both its power and its duty to interpret and apply Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The same general principle applies to the situations of those who hold federal office. Again, anyone who possesses legal power to decide whether such a person can and should hold (or continue to hold) the office in question must apply Section Three's disqualification in doing so.[89] Here, the specific federal constitutional rules for tenure and removal present some interesting complications, which we address shortly.

---

[86] Id. at 46. The New Mexico Supreme Court dismissed Griffin's appeal on procedural grounds. NO. S-1-SC-39571 (N.M. Sup. Ct. Nov. 15, 2022). Meanwhile, the federal courts concluded that they lacked federal jurisdiction over two related claims by Griffin: an attempt to remove the state action to federal court, State ex rel. White v. Griffin, 2022 WL 1707187 (D.N.M. May 27, 2022) (denying removal because of plaintiffs' lack of Article III standing) and a separate parallel suit attempting to enjoin the state proceedings, Griffin v. White, 2022 WL 2315980 (D.N.M. June 28, 2022) (finding lack of standing, lack of ripeness, and invoking Pullman abstention).

[87] New Mexico ex rel. White v. Griffin, 2022 WL 4295619, D-101-CV-2022-00473, at 24-25 (1st. Dist. Santa Fe County, Sep. 6, 2022).

[88] Id. at 35-38.

[89] The availability of a federal quo warranto action is curiously codified in the D.C. Code, §§ 16-3501-02. Courts have generally construed this statute quite narrowly, holding that only the Attorney General may bring a quo warranto against a public official, and that he has broad discretion not to do so. See Andrade v. Lauer, 729 F.2d 1475, 1498 (D.C. Cir. 1984); Drake v. Obama, 664 F.3d 774, 784-785 (9th Cir. 2011); SW Gen., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 796 F.3d 67, 81 (D.C. Cir. 2015), aff'd, 580 U.S. 288 (2017). The Third Circuit recently dismissed a Section Three quo warranto against former state senator Doug Mastriano on this ground. Hill v. Mastriano, No. 22-2464, 2022 WL 16707073, at *2 (3d Cir. Nov. 4, 2022). See also Hill v. Perry, No. 22-2465, 2023 WL 3336648, at *1 (3d Cir. May 10, 2023) (dismissing similar suits by same plaintiff against Rick Saccone and Scott Perry).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But in general: wherever anyone possesses the constitutional authority or duty to remove others from office for legal reasons, they can and should remove those barred by Section Three. Presidents—and subordinate executive officers acting at the president's direction—should remove from office executive officers, civil and military, who are constitutionally disqualified by Section Three. Likewise, the House of Representatives should impeach, and the Senate convict and thereby remove from office, civil executive officers who become constitutionally disqualified by Section Three.[90]

Finally and additionally, what happens if all of the above fails? Somebody disqualified by Section Three is given office and nobody removes that person from office. What then? Here too there will often still be additional procedures to enforce Section Three. These procedures mirror those available to enforce the Appointments Clause and other constitutional law of appointments. A litigant can move to disqualify a judge whose appointment is improper.[91] A regulated entity can challenge the actions of an executive official who holds office improperly.[92] Those who cannot constitutionally hold office cannot constitutionally exercise government power, so the subjects of that power can challenge their acts as ultra vires. While there may be some limits to the available relief in some kinds of suits under the "de facto officer doctrine," (more on which shortly), in many cases the courts will be called on to decide if an action is ultra vires. Section Three governs those cases.

3. Special Situations

A few federal constitutional offices raise special cases, where the Constitution itself speaks to official tenure or qualifications.

First consider Congress. Each house of Congress has two specific powers with respect to its own membership in which Section Three might come into play. First, each house has power to "Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications" of "its own Members."[93] Since one of those qualifications is non-disqualification under Section Three, each house can and must judge whether Section Three forbids the seating of a member. This judgment is conclusive, and it operates as a crucial constitutional [90] An officeholder who has engaged in insurrection or rebellion or given aid or comfort to enemies of the United States has surely committed a "high Crime or Misdemeanor" within the meaning of Article II, section 4's description of the scope of the impeachment and removal power. See generally Michael Stokes Paulsen, To End a (Republican) Presidency, 132 Harv. L. Rev. 689, 698-702 (2018). Note that military officers are not subject to impeachment; they are subject instead to the President's removal authority as Commander in Chief. Whether Congress could supplement that authority through appropriate legislation is an interesting question. See Zachary Price, Congress's Power Over Military Offices, 99 Tex. L. Rev. 291 (2021).

---

[91] Nguyen v. United States, 539 U.S. 69, 77–79, 81–82 (2003); Baude, Black, supra note 81, at 346-47.

[92] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 8–9 (1976) (per curiam); Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 668 (1988); Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 487–88 (2010); NLRB v. Noel Canning, 134 S. Ct. 2550, 2557 (2014); see also Baude, Severability, supra note 66, at 36-37.

[93] U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 5, cl. 1.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

backstop for each house. No state or group of voters can force upon the House or Senate a Member it judges to be constitutionally disqualified. Indeed, even federal courts could not properly do so. While the Supreme Court has held, in Powell v. McCormack,[94] that Congress cannot create new "Qualifications" and that the federal courts have the power to stop it from doing so, neither Powell nor first principles allow a federal court to second-guess each house's judgment about whether the existing, constitutional, qualifications have been satisfied.[95]

Some have argued that each house's judging power also preempts other early stages of the election process. The argument is that states and state election law have no power to exclude a candidate for Congress because they are constitutionally ineligible to office—that instead the state must allow the voters to send up the ineligible candidate, so as not to prejudge the possibility that the House or Senate will find them eligible.[96] With respect, we do not agree with this argument. As a logical matter, each house's right to judge whether an elected candidate can hold office does not give it the power to force states to elect that candidate (or allow them to be elected) in the first place. And as a textual matter, state legislatures have the power to regulate the "manner" of elections, which includes ballot eligibility.[97] In our view, the better interpretation is that Section Three can be relevant to both the state's power to regulate the manner of elections and each house's power to judge the results of those elections.

---

[94] 395 U.S. 486 (1969).

[95] See Powell, 395 U.S. at 520 n. 41 (reserving the possibility that Section Three disqualification is a qualification); see also P. Allan Dionisopoulos, A Commentary on the Constitutional Issues in the Powell and Related Cases, 17 J. Pub. L. 103, 114-115 (1968) (cited in id. at n.41) (arguing that it is); Powell, 395 U.S. at 521 n.42 (noting that "federal courts might still be barred by the political question doctrine from reviewing the House's factual determination that a member did not meet one of the standing qualifications"). We emphasize that questions of interpretation and application of Section Three are not in general "political questions" that cannot be decided by federal courts, simply because they have political consequences. Where the Constitution supplies a rule, and the rule's application is not committed by the text of the Constitution to the judgment of one of the political branches, the courts are not disabled from deciding a case based on that rule. We simply think that the provision committing to each house the power to be the "Judge" of the "Elections, Returns, and Qualifications" of its own Members does not permit judicial review of determinations of each house that properly fall within these constitutional categories.

[96] See Derek T. Muller, Scrutinizing Federal Electoral Qualifications, 90 Ind. L.J. 559, 594-598 (2015); see also Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F.4th 245, 267-273, 282-284 (4th Cir. 2022) (Richardson, J., concurring); Greene v. Sec'y of State for Georgia, 52 F.4th 907, 912-916 (11th Cir. 2022) (Branch, J., concurring).

[97] U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 4. The same Clause also gives Congress the power to "make or alter" such regulations by legislation if it wishes. Two relatively recent Supreme Court cases have invalidated state ballot eligibility rules for members of Congress that attempted to impose congressional term limits, U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995); Cook v. Gralike, 531 U.S. 510 (2001), and Judge Richardson relies on these cases to argue that states cannot judge the qualifications of congressional candidates, Cawthorn, 35 F.4th at 273-275 (Richardson, J., concurring). Putting aside whether these cases are correct as an original matter, we think they further support our view. The Court rejected term-limit-ballot-access restrictions because they were an attempt to impose a qualification not contained in the Constitution. E.g., U.S. Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 784, 787-788, 806-815. It

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The second relevant power each house possesses with respect to its own Members concerns Members already sitting in Congress. Each house also has power to "determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member."[98] So in addition to the initial power to exclude under Section Three, each house could potentially proceed through the expulsion power instead, by two-thirds vote.[99] As with the power to exclude, the power to expel, where exercised within the scope of the power conferred exclusively on each house, is committed to that house's discretion.

Additionally, Article I's Speech and Debate Clause provides that "for any Speech or Debate in either House," members of Congress "shall not be questioned in any other Place."[100] This means that to the extent that the conduct that violates Section Three was a member of Congress's official statements or legislative actions,[101] each house's powers of exclusion and expulsion are necessarily the sole mechanism for enforcing Section Three.

Federal judges hold their offices during "good Behaviour."[102] What if a sitting federal judge or even a Supreme Court justice has engaged in insurrection or rebellion or given aid or comfort to the nation's enemies?[103] As a matter of substance this is easy. Whether regarded as simply a violation of the Article III tenure condition of "good Behaviour" or as satisfying the impeachment standard of "high Crimes and Misdemeanors,"[104] conduct meeting Section Three's standard disqualifies a federal judge from office.

As a matter of procedure the question is trickier. The conventional wisdom is that Article III allows good behavior to be judged only through the procedure of impeachment by Congress. An alternative view, with some support in the history, is follows that ballot access rules that follow the qualifications contained in the Constitution could be treated differently.

---

[98] U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 5, cl. 2.

[99] There is some debate whether Congress can expel a member for conduct that occurred before being elected. See Chafetz, Democracy's Privileged Few, supra note 47, at 210-212 (recounting arguments on both sides but arguing that it can); Jack Maskell, Congressional Research Service, Expulsion, Censure, Reprimand, and Fine: Legislative Discipline in the House of Representatives 4-7 (2016) https://sgp.fas.org/crs/misc/RL31382.pdf (same). At all events, however, continuing to hold office when forbidden to do so by Section Three is ongoing conduct that would seem independently to justify expulsion in the here-and-now.

[100] U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 6, cl. 1.

[101] As we elaborate later, we think it is quite rare that such conduct could violate Section Three, even on its own terms.

[102] U.S. Const. art. III.

[103] Cf. Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2, 141 (1866) (Chase, C.J., concurring in the judgment) ("In Indiana, the judges and officers of the courts were loyal to the government. But it might have been otherwise. In times of rebellion and civil war, it may often happen, indeed, that judges and marshals will be in active sympathy with the rebels, and courts their most efficient allies.").

[104] See supra note 90.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

that Congress could provide other procedures for adjudicating misbehavior (as for instance in the 1791 Crimes Act, which purported to require the immediate removal of any federal official convicted of bribery or other crimes).[105] Whichever is the answer, the procedures and criteria for judging judges can and must apply Section Three.

Finally, what about the top of the ticket? What if the President or a presidential candidate (or likewise for Vice President) is constitutionally disqualified?[106] Who has the power and duty to enforce Section Three's legal prohibition? Again, the answer depends on whether the supposedly disqualified individual is seeking election to office or already holds it. In the case of a candidate, state election officials and state election law will frequently judge that candidate's ballot eligibility, applying Section Three as described above, and subject to the usual avenues of judicial review. That eligibility question can be a part of a state's Article II election for electors just as much as any other state election.[107] Put simply: a state secretary of state (for example) might well possess state-law authority to determine candidate eligibility for federal elective offices—President and Vice President, U.S. Representatives, U.S. Senators—selected directly or indirectly via state elections; and among those relevant eligibility criteria is whether a candidate is disqualified from the office he or she seeks by Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Additionally, presidential electors have the power (and therefore perhaps the responsibility as well) to enforce Section Three.[108] In perhaps half the states, the question is more complicated, because state laws purport to bind the electors in various ways to vote for their party's candidate rather than making their own determination, and the Supreme Court has recently upheld such laws.[109] But even working [105] Saikrishna Prakash & Steven D. Smith, How to Remove A Federal Judge, 116 Yale L.J. 72 (2006). In the interests of full disclosure, one of us was the student lead editor when this piece was published, and continues to think it is probably right, notwithstanding the counterarguments in James E. Pfander, Removing Federal Judges, 74 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1227 (2007). The other of us adheres to the traditional view. Michael Stokes Paulsen, Checking the Court, 10 NYU J. L. & Liberty 18, 76-77 (2016).

---

[106] We are assuming for now that the Presidency and Vice Presidency are covered by Section Three's language as an "office, civil or military, under the United States." We think that assumption is correct, and we will return to it in Part IV.B.

[107] See Hemel, How-to Guide, supra note 5; Lindsay v. Bowen, 750 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2014) (upholding state exclusion from presidential primary ballot of twenty-seven-year-old candidate constitutionally disqualified on grounds of age); Hassan v. Colorado, 495 Fed. App'x 947, 948 (10th Cir. 2012) (Gorsuch, J.) (upholding state exclusion from presidential election ballot of naturalized citizen constitutionally disqualified from office by Natural Born Citizen Clause of Article II); see also Muller, Scrutinizing, supra note 96, at 599-608; see also Muller, Natural Born, supra note 62, at 1100-1106. This is standard practice and law even though the President and Vice President are only indirect candidates, with their electors as direct candidates.

[108] See Muller, Scrutinizing, supra note 96, at 579-580.

[109] Chiafolo v. Washington, 591 U.S. ___ (2020); see also Muller, supra note 96, at 580. We bracket the serious possibility that Chiafolo was wrongly decided. See, e.g., Mike Rappaport, The Originalist Disaster in Chiafolo, Law & Liberty (Aug. 7, 2020), https://lawliberty.org/the-originalist-disaster-in-within that paradigm, states and their legislatures have their own duties to uphold the Constitution. That means they have a responsibility to arrange that their electors do not elect a constitutionally disqualified candidate, which should be reflected in their laws.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

If the voters and presidential electors do select a disqualified candidate for the Presidency, we do not believe that Congress (or the Vice President) have the power to reject that candidate when the votes are counted in joint session. Whatever the extent of Congress's and the Vice President's authority to count the electoral votes, or determine the authenticity of submitted votes—i.e., was this the act of the electors of the state?—we do not believe that they have the authority to evaluate the decisions or actions of the electors themselves.[110] So if a properly selected elector submits a vote for a constitutionally disqualified individual it should still be counted.

Still, once those votes are counted, a disqualified candidate does not become president, even if he has the most votes. This is made explicit by the (self-executing) command of Section Three of the Twentieth Amendment, which sets the constitutional terms of a President's term. It states that at "the time fixed for the beginning of [the President's] term," "if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified."[111] The language thus specifically confirms the possibility of a failure to qualify, and specifies the consequences of that failure. If the President-elect is covered by Section Three, he cannot become President—unless Congress chooses (by supermajority votes) to remove Section Three's disability.

Once the President has taken office, the Constitution provides two paths for involuntary removal from office: impeachment for "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" and removal for being "unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office" under the procedure of the Twenty-fifth Amendment. The impeachment route is straightforward. As we have discussed, an insurrection against the United States is a paradigm example of a high crime or misdemeanor. On the other hand, it is less clear whether being legally disqualified from holding office makes the would-be President "unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office" within the meaning of the Twenty-fifth Amendment. (Structurally, the Twenty-fifth Amendment appears to relate to Article II, Section 1, paragraph 6, which deals with Presidential succession, rather than Article II, Section 1, paragraph 5, which deals with eligibility.) But in chiafalo/; Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Constitutional Power of the Electoral College, Public Discourse (Nov. 21, 2016), https://www.thepublicdiscourse.com/2016/11/18283/.

---

[110] We take no position on many further details of this issue, including the relative interplay of the Electoral Count Reform Act, Pub.L. 117-328, Div. P, Title I, § 109(a) (Dec. 29, 2022) 136 Stat. 5238-5239, codified in relevant part at 3 U.S.C. 15(b) & (d)(2)(B)(ii), possible constitutional challenges to it, see Vasan Kesavan, Is the Electoral Count Act Unconstitutional?, 80 N.C. L. Rev. 1653, 1805 (2002); see also John Harrison, Nobody for President, 16 J.L & Pol. 699 (2000), interpretations of it, but see Derek T. Muller, Electoral Votes Regularly Given, 55 Ga. L. Rev. 1529, 1538 (2021), or the like.

[111] U.S. Const. amdt. XX, sec. 3. Cf, Muller, Regularly Given, supra note 110, at 1538 n.42.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

any event the Twenty-fifth Amendment question will usually be unimportant in practice, because it requires a two thirds vote of both houses, and the Vice President and many cabinet officials, and so it will usually be significantly easier to use the impeachment process instead.[112]

* * *

Tying together all of these different procedures and possibilities: consider briefly (and not-so-hypothetically) a violent insurrection on the seat of government, by a mob joined or given aid or comfort by various government officials, from a state representative or commissioner to a U.S. Senator to the President himself.[113] From the moment of their participation in the insurrection, those officials would be legally ineligible to hold their offices, thanks to Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. How this would play out practically might vary across them. As the state official returned home, he would immediately be subject to state law procedures such as a quo warranto suit.[114] He might be removed by such a suit,[115] or might well choose to resign instead.[116] The Senator might choose to brazen it out, counting on the difficulty in getting together a two-thirds vote to expel him. But if he sought re-election the Senate could and should exclude him by a mere majority vote. As for the hypothetical President, by right he ought to be immediately subject to impeachment and conviction by Congress, and perhaps also a Twenty-fifth Amendment declaration by the Vice President and supported by the cabinet. Even if those things did not happen, if he sought re-election, state election officials around the country would be bound by Section Three in deciding whether to put him on the ballot, even in the primary.

And of course, some of these matters would no doubt promptly find their way into the courts as well. Continuing the example of the presidential candidate, if state officials excluded him from ballot eligibility, he would likely be able to sue in state or federal court to challenge state officials' determination of ineligibility. And if he was not excluded by state officials, voters (at least in some states) might possess the legal right to challenge his eligibility. Either way, such a challenge would present a classic legal case or controversy. It is not difficult to imagine such suit being resolved by courts. Indeed, given the magnitude of the question and its consequences, it is not

---

[112] Brian Kalt, Unable: The Law, Politics, and Limits of Section 4 of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment (2019).

[113] See infra Part IV.C. for further discussion.

[114] For two relevant examples, see NMSA. 1978, sec. 44-3; W.V. Code sec. 53-2-1. In West Virginia, such a claim may be brought "[w]henever the Attorney General or prosecuting attorney of any county is satisfied that a cause exists therefor he may, at his own instance, or at the relation of any person interested." Id. 53-2-2. For illustrative applications, see State ex rel. Zickefoose v. West, 145 W. Va. 498, 545 (1960); Wells v. Miller, 237 W. Va. 731 (2016).

[115] New Mexico ex rel. White v. Griffin, 2022 WL 4295619, D-101-CV-2022-00473 (1st. Dist. Santa Fe County, Sep. 6, 2022).

[116] Resignation letter from West Virginia Delegate Derrick Evans to Governor Jim Justice (Jan. 9, 2021), available at https://s3.documentcloud.org/documents/20447012/derrick-evans-resignation-letter.pdf.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

difficult to imagine such an important case making its way quickly to the U.S. Supreme Court. It would then become the province and duty of the Court to determine and apply the meaning of Section Three.

Section Three thus functions as a sort of constitutional immune system, mobilizing every official charged with constitutional application to keep those who have fundamentally betrayed the constitutional order from keeping or reassuming power.

C. The Problem of Griffin's Case

A small problem with our view that Section Three is self-executing and immediately operative is that the Chief Justice of the United States said the opposite, almost immediately after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. This was the opinion in Griffin's Case by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, sitting as Circuit Justice in 1869, in one of the first cases to interpret any part of the Amendment. In Griffin's Case, Chief Justice Chase concluded that Section Three is inoperative unless and until Congress passes implementing legislation to carry it into effect.[117] This precedent continues to cast a shadow over Section Three today.[118]

But there is a simple response to this small problem. Griffin's Case is just wrong. It is possible—possible—that its result is correct on an alternate ground, under the so-called de facto officer doctrine, which we will discuss. But Chase's legal reasoning that the Fourteenth Amendment is not self-executing is unsustainable. Indeed, the more one pulls at his opinion, the more it unravels. We examine it in some detail.[119]

1. Background

Caesar Griffin, a black man, was charged in a Virginia state court with the crime of shooting with the intent to kill. Griffin was tried, convicted, and sentenced to prison. He made no claim that the statute under which he was tried was unconstitutional; nor that he had been subjected to discrimination because of his race; nor that the composition of the jury was improper. As Chase put it: Griffin made "no allegation that the trial was not fairly conducted, or that any discrimination was made against him, either in indictment, trial, or sentence, on account of his color."[120] Nor did Griffin allege that the presiding judge—Judge Hugh W. Sheffey—"did not [117] In re Griffin ("Griffin's Case"), 11 F. Cas. 7 (C.C.D.Va. 1869) (No. 5,815) (Chase 364).

---

[118] See, e.g., Josh Blackman and S. B. Tillman, Opinion, "Only the Feds Could Disqualify Madison Cawthorn and Marjorie Taylor Greene," The New York Times, (Apr. 20, 2022); Tom Ginsburg, Aziz Huq, & David Landau, The Law of Democratic Disqualification, 111 Calif. L. Rev. at 16, 51 (forthcoming 2023) at https://ssrn.com/abstract=3938600.

[119] For other criticism of Griffin's Case, insightful as always, see Magliocca, Amnesty, supra note 5, at 102-108; Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 9-14.

[120] 11 F. Cas. at 22.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

conduct the trial with fairness and uprightness."[121] Griffin raised just one challenge to the validity of his conviction: that Judge Sheffey (or, one might say, so-called Judge Sheffey)[122] was legally disqualified by Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment from serving.

The facts relevant to Judge Sheffey were not disputed either. He had taken the oath: Before the Civil War, Hugh Sheffey had been a member of the Virginia state legislature, as far back as 1849. And he had "engaged in" rebellion: After Virginia purported to secede from the Union, Sheffey continued to serve as a member of Virginia's secessionist legislature. In that role, in 1862, he "voted for measures to sustain the so-called Confederate States in their war against the United States."[123] Thus "it is admitted," wrote Chase, that Judge Sheffey "was one of the persons to whom the prohibition to hold office pronounced by the amendment applied."[124]

Griffin had petitioned the U.S. district judge, Judge John Underwood, for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the lawfulness of his custody, which Judge Underwood granted.[125] The sheriff appealed to the circuit court, which was held by Chase as circuit justice.[126]

---

[121] Id. at 22.

[122] Cf. Will Baude, The deadly serious accusation of being a "so-called judge," Volokh Conspiracy, Wash. Post. (Feb. 4, 2017), https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/volokh-conspiracy/wp/2017/02/04/the-deadly-serious-accusation-of-being-a-so-called-judge/ ("[T]o call him a 'so-called' judge is to hint that he is not really a judge, that he lacks judicial power. It is just a hint, but it flirts with a deadly serious issue").

[123] 11 F. Cas. at 22.

[124] Id. at 23.

[125] See Opinion of Judge Underwood in Edward McPherson, The Political History of the United States of America During the Period of Reconstruction (from April 15, 1865, to July 15, 1870), at 462-466 (1875). We are indebted to Myles Lynch for locating this source.

[126] The procedural posture of this and several related cases are extremely confusing and reflect background machinations by both Judge Underwood and Chief Justice Chase: At the time, habeas was apparently available from the district court, or "at chambers," or from the circuit court. If Judge Underwood issued the writ from the district court or at chambers, he could be reviewed by the circuit court, which would include Chief Justice Chase. But if Chief Justice Chase was not present, Judge Underwood could also sit alone as the circuit court. And thanks to a recent statute designed to strip jurisdiction over the anti-Reconstruction suit of Ex parte McCardle, there would be no appeal if Judge Underwood sat as the circuit court. Underwood took this, the unreviewable route, in another habeas case like Griffin's brought by Sally Anderson. Chief Justice Chase then wrote to Underwood with a veiled threat, floating the possibility that a recent statute could be interpreted to deprive Underwood of his ability to hold the circuit court at that time, and encouraging Underwood to hear the cases in the district court or at chambers so that Chase could review him. Underwood obliged. Meanwhile, Virginia also sought an original writ in the Supreme Court to put a stop to Underwood's Section Three docket. The Supreme Court ordered all of the proceedings stayed, and then let Chase go down to the circuit to clean things up, taking no action on the writ. See Charles Fairman, Reconstruction and Reunion at 601-607; Letter from Chase to Underwood (Nov. 19, 1868) in 5 The Salmon P. Chase Papers 285-286 (1998); Letter from Chase to Underwood (Jan. 14, 1869) in id. at 292-293.

This background is briefly alluded to in the synopsis in Griffin's Case which explains that "[a] motion was then made by James Lyons, Esq. in the supreme court of the United States for a writ of prohibition against the district judge, to restrain him from further exercise of such power. The supreme

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2. Chase on Section Three

Chase reversed. Here is how he framed the problem: Everybody agreed that Sheffey had been lawfully appointed as a state judge in February 1866, while Virginia was controlled by military reconstruction and the Fourteenth Amendment did not exist.[127] The question was whether ratification of Section Three kicked him out. As Chase put it: "whether upon a sound construction of the amendment, it must be regarded as operating directly, without any intermediate proceeding whatever, upon all persons within the category of prohibition, and as depriving them at once, and absolutely, of all official authority and power."[128]

Chase said no, rejecting this as a "literal construction" [129] of Section Three. There is a lot going on in this opinion. Chase included a number of makeweight arguments and asides on topics such as the legal history of West Virginia.[130] But his core argument was that surely Section Three cannot mean what it says: It would have bad consequences, can't possibly have been intended by the ratifiers, and would violate the spirit of the Constitution. As we will explain, these arguments are bad ones. Chase then supplemented them with a shocking claim of a secret Supreme Court ruling in favor of an alternative approach—which was both generally improper, but also further impeached Chase's interpretation of Section Three. All in all, Griffin's Case is a case study in how not to go about the enterprise of faithful constitutional interpretation.

---

court advised on the motion, and never announced any conclusion, but shortly afterward the chief justice opened the circuit court at Richmond, and immediately called up the appeal in Griffin's Case. This statement is necessary for a full understanding of the pregnancy of the chief justice's statement that the supreme court agreed with him as to the decision he rendered in this case." Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 7-8. But really, these circumstances are extraordinary. We take them up again below.

[127] Id. at 23.

[128] Id. at 18.

[129] Id. at 24.

[130] Chase summarized the intriguing legal history of this Virginia government: When Virginia, by act of its legislature in 1861, purported to secede from the Union, loyal Unionists assembled in convention in Wheeling to organize a new state government. Congress and the Lincoln administration recognized the Wheeling government as the lawful government of Virginia. The Wheeling Virginia government then gave its consent to the creation of a new Wheeling-based state of West Virginia, after which the (Wheeling) Virginia government-in-exile relocated to Alexandria, just across the river from Washington, to serve as the loyal, Union-recognized government of all of what remained as "Virginia." After Lee's surrender at Appomattox, Chase's opinion notes, the "government recognized by the United States was transferred from Alexandria to Richmond" and "became in fact what it was before in law, the government of the whole state." Id. at 18. Judge Sheffey was appointed under the authority of this government. (For the full story – and full formalist legal defense – of the validity of the legal fiction of "Virginia" giving its consent to the creation of a breakaway state of West Virginia, see Vasan Kesavan and Michael Stokes Paulsen, Is West Virginia Unconstitutional? 90 Calif. L. Rev. 291 (2002) For an argument that this aside was actually relevant to Chase's argument, see Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 10 n.30, discussed infra note 157.)

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

a. "The argument from inconveniences, great as these"

The core of Chase's argument was that if Section Three were an immediately operative, self-executing constitutional rule of disqualification, it would have inconvenient consequences in the Reconstruction South. "In the examination of questions of this sort," Chase wrote, "great attention is properly paid to the argument from inconvenience."[131] And here "the argument from inconveniences" was "great" in Chase's estimation— it was "of no light weight."[132]

In several incompletely reconstructed Southern governments, many offices were in fact held by former oath-breaking rebels.[133] If Section Three were automatically operative, it would have immediately barred all such men from office. (Indeed.) Yet, Chase argued, many such disqualified persons in fact had not vacated their offices but instead continued to exercise authority under those offices notwithstanding the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. To give Section Three immediate effect would thus upset the apple cart in a fairly major way. "No sentence, no judgment, no decree, no acknowledgement of a deed, no record of a deed, no sheriff's or commissioner's sale—in short no official act—is of the least validity."[134] Chase found this unthinkable: "It is impossible to measure the evils which such a construction would add to the calamities which have already fallen upon the people of these [Southern] states."[135]

Chase went on: not only did Section Three impose great "inconveniences" and "calamities," it was unfairly punitive—ungraciously ousting once-lawfully-appointed officers from their offices—and ostensibly inconsistent with the "spirit" of prior constitutional principles, concerning due process, bills of attainder and ex post facto laws.[136] And besides, the specific remedy sought—vacating Griffin's conviction—only worked mischief, because it did not even seek the literal removal of Judge Sheffey from office. Put these things together and you have Chase's interpretive driver: "Surely," Chase continued, "a construction which fails to accomplish the main purpose of the amendment, and yet necessarily works the mischief and inconveniences which have been described, and is repugnant to the first principles of justice and right embodied in other provisions of the constitution, is not to be favored, if any other reasonable construction can be found."[137]

---

[131] 11 F. Cas. at 24.
[132] Id. at 25.
[133] Chase also suggested that the problem was not completely limited to the Southern governments. Id. at 25 (observing that "[i]t is well known that many persons, engaged in the late Rebellion, have emigrated to states which adhered to the national government . . ." and that "it is not to be doubted that not a few among them" had previously taken a covered oath, and that "[p]robably some of these persons" had subsequently been elected to office).
[134] Id. at 25. Of course, Chase would undercut this conclusion later in the opinion. See infra Part II.C.
[135] 11 F. Cas. at 25.
[136] More on this point presently, Part II.C.2.c, and again Part III.
[137] 11 F. Cas. at 26.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Chase tried to funnel these policy arguments into a rule of constitutional construction: "the argument from inconvenience."[138] This argument "it is true, can not prevail over plain words or clear reason," Chase acknowledged.[139] "But, on the other hand," he wrote, "a construction which must necessarily occasion great public and private mischief, must never be preferred to a construction which will occasion neither, or neither in so great a degree, unless the terms of the instrument absolutely require such preference."[140]

This is not an unreasonable principle, as interpretive canons go. When confronted with two plausible interpretations of genuinely ambiguous, unclear text, one of which would produce manifestly jarring results, the less jarring interpretation is more likely the correct one. As James Madison said in his famous speech against the national bank: "Where a meaning is clear, the consequences, whatever they may be, are to be admitted—where doubtful, it is fairly triable by its consequences."[141] Or as Chief Justice Marshall said in United States v. Fisher: "where great inconvenience will result from a particular construction, that construction is to be avoided, unless the meaning of the legislature be plain; in which case it must be obeyed."[142] But Chase's canon was noticeably more aggressive: The supposedly more disruptive reading must "never be preferred" unless the text's terms "absolutely require" such preference.[143] That is putting not just a thumb on the scale, but a whole hand.

But that is not the real problem with Chase's analysis. The real problem was how Chase applied these principles to Section Three.

First, Chase was too quick—far too quick—to dismiss the "literal" reading of the "terms of the instrument" as meaning exactly what they seem to say. As discussed above, the language of Section Three's prohibition on office holding is clear and direct; it is hardly doubtful at all. It takes considerable effort to impute any ambiguity to the text and Chase's opinion does not even undertake that effort. Instead, the opinion assumes its own conclusion—that the text's language is somehow insufficiently clear to justify applying the "literal" meaning of its words. Indeed, even on Chase's own hyper-strict standard, the words of Section Three do "absolutely require" the conclusion that it, on its own, disqualifies covered rebels from office.

Second, Chase was too ready—far too ready—to find that following the ("literal") language of the document would produce (what Chase considered to be) great "inconveniences" or "mischief"— indeed, increase "calamities" already visited upon

---

[138] Id. at 24.
[139] Id. at 24.
[140] Id. at 24.
[141] James Madison, Speech on Feb. 2, 1791, reprinted in Legislative and Documentary History of the Bank of the United States 39, 40 (photo. reprint 2008)
[142] United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch (6 U.S.) 358, 386 (1805)
[143] 11 F. Cas. at 24 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the South. Chase emphasized the breadth of Section Three's language: it applied in all the states, not just the former Confederacy (so?); it applied beyond the context of Civil War but included aiding enemies in a foreign war (so?); it would apply in terms to immediately disqualify men for acts done long ago, for example in the Mexican War (so?); it would apply "to all persons in the category" and "for all time, present and future" (so?). And, taken seriously, this broad rule would, as noted, "annul all official acts" performed by disqualified officers, including judges. (Would it?)

For Chase, all this seemed to border on the shocking—a parade of horribles demanding the search for an alternative construction of Section Three. But why? Because it might have a broad effect? Because it adopted a new rule of constitutional law superseding prior law? Because it would have removed immediately a substantial number of former-oath-swearing-officeholders-turned-rebels from positions of power? Because it could have the effect of invalidating their unauthorized, lawless actions? Chase's parade of horribles assumes, without argument, the correctness of his own apparent policy prejudices.[144]

Now Chase did attempt to groom these prejudices into more plausible legal arguments, which we will get to in a moment. But because these arguments from inconvenience are the heart of Chase's opinion, and because we still see these kinds of arguments repeated today, we pause to emphasize that this is not how judging is supposed to work, even if it too often does.

Chase's construe-to-avoid-the-force-of-constitutional-language-whose-policy-consequences-you-dislike approach to constitutional interpretation is simply wrong. Judges do not get to rewrite constitutional provisions they find objectionable on policy grounds. Relatedly, judges do not get to make up new provisions of law in order to devise policy "solutions" to texts they don't like. Chase's opinion imposed, as a solution to textual literalism and its real and imagined policy inconveniences, a different kind of constitutional provision, one more like the Impeachment Clause and the Treason Clause. Put bluntly, Chase made up law that was not there in order to change law that was there but that he did not like.

b. The argument from "the intention of the people"

In places, Chase raises the inconvenience argument as an inquiry into the "intent" of the Framers: "What was the intention of the people of the United States in adopting the fourteenth amendment? What is the true scope and purpose of the prohibition to hold office contained in the third section?"[145] This at least sounds kind of [144] As Judge Underwood had put it: "Whatever inconvenience may result from the maintenance of the Constitution and the laws, I think the experience of the last few years shows that much greater inconvenience comes from attempting their overthrow." Opinion of Judge Underwood, supra note 125, at 465.

[145] 11 F.Cas. at 24.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

like the question a judge should be asking—the original meaning of the constitutional provision adopted by We The People and binding on those who interpret it. But in fact it conceals still more sleight of hand.

First and foremost, Chase's framing of the interpretive question commits a classic blunder: swapping in original intent for original meaning. In our constitutional system, law is made by enacting texts, not by searching for the unenacted wishes of lawmakers.[146] And whatever evidence Chase might have that the consequences of Section Three were unintended by some of those who voted for it, he had no evidence that these consequences were not entailed by what they voted for.

Second, however dubious it is to look to original intent over original meaning generally, it is especially dicey to do so in the case of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in unusual, exigent circumstances. In Congress, the Amendment represented a compromise between different Republican factions, some much more radical than the others. And in the states, where ratification made it law, the Amendment depended on the ratification votes of the southern states, who were pressured—some might say "coerced"—to ratify the Amendment as the price of regaining their representation in Congress.[147] Even if one accepts this process as lawful (which we do) it is obvious that it means one must cast a skeptical eye on stories about the supposed "intent" of those who ratified it, especially in the South. It may well be that some of the ratifiers had their fingers crossed behind their backs and intended to give the Amendment as little effect and as little quarter as they could get away with. But so what? What matters is what they did, in one of the highest-stakes moments of constitutional law making in American history. By diminishing the plain scope of the Amendment's text, Chase was succumbing to this kind of anti-constitutional subversion.

Third and finally, all of Chase's evidence of this supposed intent just boils down to the inconvenience argument we have just discussed. And as discussed above, this is why one must be especially careful with judges who invoke the supposed "intent" of a written text. When meaning is uncertain, it is permissible to give a slight edge to the interpretation that is more likely to match what its authors were trying to do.

---

[146] See supra notes 9-14, sources cited there, and accompanying text.

[147] See generally, John Harrison, The Lawfulness of the Reconstruction Amendments, 68 U. Chi. L. Rev. 375, 461 (2001). For arguments that Congress's requiring states' ratification as condition of restored representation was entirely lawful and appropriate, see id; Kesavan & Paulsen, West Virginia, supra note 130, at 329; Amar, America's Constitution, supra note 4, at 364-380, see especially id. at 376-378. There is a different argument for ratification, the "loyal denominator" theory, in which the southern states were unnecessary for ratification. See Christopher R. Green, Loyal Denominatorism and the Fourteenth Amendment: Normative Defense and Implications, 13 Duke J. Const. L. & Pub. Pol'y 167, 168 (2017); Christopher R. Green, The History of the Loyal Denominator, 79 La. L. Rev. 47, 48 (2018). One of us has rejected this theory in prior writing, Michael Stokes Paulsen, A General Theory of Article V: The Constitutional Lessons of the Twenty-Seventh Amendment, 103 Yale L.J. 677, 709 (1993); see also Amar, supra note 4, at 378-380, and the other of us is inclined in the same direction.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But it is easy for a judge to use this principle as an excuse for reading into the text his own views of what the law should be. After all, the authors of the provision were reasonable people, trying to do reasonable things, and, I, the judge, am also reasonable, so surely if I don't like this result, they wouldn't have liked this result, and therefore it must not be the result. To write it down this way would give up the game, but it is too easy to think it. Chase's use of original intent is makeweight at best, and a trick at worst.

c. The argument that Section Three should not be read to depart from the "spirit" of prior constitutional law

The "inconveniences" and "calamities" that, surely, were not intended by the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment were Chase's main arguments. But he had a bit more to say. There was "another principle, which in determining the construction of this amendment, is entitled to equal consideration."

> Of two constructions, either of which is warranted by the words of an amendment of a public act, that is to be preferred which best harmonizes the amendment with the general terms and spirit of the act amended. This principle forbids a construction of the amendment, not clearly required by its terms, which will bring it into conflict or disaccord with the other provisions of the constitution.[148]

What was the supposed conflict between Section Three and the rest of the Constitution? Chase fretted that Section Three was a penal enactment, imposing punishment without trial on secessionists, and thus in tension with the spirit of earlier provisions on bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and due process:

> Now it is undoubted that those provisions of the constitution which deny to the legislature power to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or to pass a bill of attainder or an ex post facto, are inconsistent in their spirit and general purpose with a provision which, at once and without trial, deprives a whole class of persons of offices held by them, for cause, however grave. It is true that no limit can be imposed on the people when exercising their sovereign power in amending their own constitution of government. But it is a necessary presumption that the people in the exercise of that power, seek to confirm and improve, rather than to weaken and impair the general spirit of the constitution.[149]

Thus, Chase concluded, Section Three should not be read as accomplishing disqualification of its own force.

---

[148] 11 F.Cas. at 25.

[149] Id. at 26.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Now once again, the interpretive rule Chase is formulating here is not totally crazy. But it is a warped version of the real thing. As we discuss at length in the next part: It is true that repeals by implication are disfavored, and this principle applies to constitutional law. But at the same time, constitutional amendments change things, and when an amendment is inconsistent with prior constitutional rules, ultimately it is the amendment that controls. If a new provision fairly can be harmonized with prior law—where there is no true conflict—the provisions should be read harmoniously.[150] But where new language in fact changes old law, by clear terms or necessary logical effect, the greater error is to deny such change out of undue attachment to the former legal regime.

This greater error is exactly what Chase did. Chase leaned very heavily—too heavily—on the rule against implied repeals, ratcheting it up to "forbid[]" readings of a text "not clearly required" by its terms, that would "bring it into conflict or disaccord" with other provisions of the Constitution.[151] Each leaning is wrong. Repeals by implication may be disfavored; but repeals, made in terms or by necessary logical implication, are not presumptively forbidden. Nor does new language changing old provisions require such extraordinary clarity as Chase would have it. The true question is whether the language and logic of a new provision really does present a conflict with prior law. And the idea that constitutional amendments should presumptively be read so as not to change the Constitution (!)—that they should be construed to avoid conflict or even mere disaccord with prior constitutional law—is indefensible. Of course constitutional amendments change prior constitutional law. That is their purpose and function. Now, that doesn't warrant reading them to change more than they really do. But a presumption that constitutional amendments should be read to change as little as possible makes no sense.

Finally, this part of Chase's argument took a puzzling turn that is worth noting. In one of many strange asides, Chase noted the possibility that Section Three had implicitly repealed the Treason Clause: "in the judgment of some enlightened jurists, the legal effect" of Section Three's imposition of a new prohibition on officeholding for rebels and insurrectionists "was to remit all other punishments" for treason.[152] If anything this seemed to hurt Chase's argument against self-execution, because it emphasized that Section Three could change the pre-existing constitutional rules. And at the same time this supposedly enlightened argument was also bonkers. The enactment of a constitutional rule of disqualification from office does not remotely suggest a supersession or repeal of criminal-law punishment for treason. And if it did it would have the perverse effect of leaving Confederates who had not previously [150] See infra, Part III.

[151] 11 F. Cas. at 25 (emphasis added).
[152] Id. at 26.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

taken a constitutional oath subject to the death penalty, while previous office holders avoided all criminal punishment except the officeholding ban.[153]

So why did Chase bring it up? Who were these "enlightened jurists" who imagined such a thing? The answer is . . . Chase himself! He had asserted precisely this wacky construction of Section Three's effect on the criminal penalty for treason—and quietly suggested the argument to defense counsel—in the federal criminal treason prosecution of Jefferson Davis just two years earlier.[154] Even Davis's lawyers had been puzzled by the argument, and wondered if it was some sort of trick, and it seems likely that Chase had complex political motivations in proposing it at the time.[155] This argument was tendentious then, and weirdly irrelevant in Griffin's Case. But it is a helpful reminder that Chief Justice Chase was not shooting straight in his applications of Section Three.

d. The argument from the Section Five enforcement power

Having flailed to avoid the natural reading of Section Three, Chase finally offered his alternative, "reasonable construction":

> For in the very nature of things, it must be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition, before any sentence of exclusion can be made to operate. To accomplish this ascertainment and ensure effective results, proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcement of decisions, more or less formal, are indispensable; and these can only be provided by Congress. Now, the necessity of this is recognized by the amendment itself, in its fifth and final section, which declares that 'congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provision[s] of this article.' [sic] … The fifth section qualifies the third to the same extent as it would if the whole amendment consisted of these two sections.[156]

Section Five "qualifies" Section Three. Of course, this proves too much. Taken seriously, it would suggest that Section Five likewise "qualifies" Section One and renders its commands—birthright citizenship, privileges or immunities, due process, and equal protection—inoperative until enforced by congressional legislation. It would imply that Section One had no self-executing legal effect, which has never been the law. It also proves too little. It is true, perhaps, that carrying a legal prohibition into [153] See Case of Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 92, 95 (C.C.D. Va. 1867).

---

[154] Id. See Magliocca. Amnesty, supra note 5, at 100-102; Cynthia Nicoletti, Secession on Trial: The Treason Prosecution of Jefferson Davis 293-300 (2017).

[155] Nicoletti suggests—and she is not making this up—that either Chase was gunning for the Democratic nomination for President, or that this was a bank shot to get southern whites to accept the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, by arranging for the Amendment to benefit them. Id. at 293-296.

[156] 11 F. Cas. at 26.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

practical effect in actual situations frequently will involve, necessarily, actions by persons and institutions charged with applying that prohibition as law in the course of performing their assigned duties. But as noted above there is no reason why "proceedings" and "decisions" and "enforcement" with respect to Section Three's commands may not be conducted and carried out by these various state and federal actors, exercising their usual authority with respect to such matters.[157] It is simply not true that "these can only be provided by Congress." Congress can provide them. But so can many others. Indeed, that is just what Judge Underwood was trying to accomplish in Griffin's Case, until Chase stopped him.

Chase's tendentious construction of Section Three has gone on to a surprisingly serious career as a precedent. But it simply does not hold up as an original matter. But that is not even the weirdest thing about Griffin's Case.

3. Griffin's Self-Defeating and Highly Irregular Dictum

Chase concluded his discussion of Section Three this way: "After the most careful consideration, therefore, I find myself constrained to the conclusion that Hugh W. Sheffey had not been removed from the office of judge at the time of the trial and sentence of the petitioner; and that the sentence of the circuit court of Rockbridge county was lawful."[158]

By Chase's logic, such as it was, that should have been the final line of his opinion. But strangely, Chase was not actually done. He then launched into the weirdest part of his opinion, a sort of half-dictum, half-advisory opinion that cast further doubt on all that had come before:

> In this view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to determine the question relating to the effect of the sentence of a judge de facto, exercising the office with the color, but without the substance of right. It is proper to say, however, that I should have no difficulty in sustaining the custody of the sheriff under sentence of a court held by such a judge. . . .
>
> This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term, with reference to this and kindred cases in this district, and I am authorized to say that they unanimously concur in [157] Magliocca also suggests that in the specific situation in Griffin's Case, state law may have been "unavailable for enforcement" of Section Three because "Virginia was an unreconstructed state and thus lacked the ordinary powers of a state" and "because Virginia did not yet recognize the Fourteenth Amendment's legitimacy" – in contrast with states such as North Carolina. Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 10 n.30. We are not sure whether this is giving Chase too much credit or not, but regardless, these points would obviously not hold today, where state law is fully available in every state of the union.

[158] 11 F. Cas. at 27.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> the opinion that a person convicted by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, can not be properly discharged upon habeas corpus.[159]

What is going on here? Chase describes an alternate ground for the case—"a judge de facto acting under color of office," which we would now call the "de facto officer doctrine"—explains that it is unnecessary to decide it, but then also explains that he would "have no difficulty" resolving the case on that alternate ground, and also that the rest of the Supreme Court agrees with him. It is hard to make sense of this part of Chase's opinion, but the more one digs in to it the more dubious the whole opinion becomes.

First of all, notice that what Chase says here fatally undercuts his earlier arguments about Section Three. The heart of Chase's argument was that a self-executing Section Three would have calamitous consequences that could not possibly have been intended. But here Chase says that even an illegally appointed officer can be a "de facto" officer whose acts are treated as valid for purposes of a habeas claim. If Chase believed this claim about the de facto officer doctrine, then his earlier claim about the consequences was overblown. The de facto officer doctrine would limit or eliminate the supposedly calamitous consequences and allow Section Three to be given its more natural interpretation in other situations. On its own terms, then, this dictum is colossally self-defeating.[160]

Indeed, if Chase's extensive dictum about Section Three made it "unnecessary" to resolve the de facto officer doctrine, the same was equally true in reverse. Accepting Chase's conclusion about the de facto officer doctrine would have made his erroneous disquisition on Section Three completely unnecessary. The criticisms sometimes levelled against the chief justices who wrote the famous (or infamous) opinions in Marbury v. Madison, and Dred Scott v. Sandford, for having reached out to decide, gratuitously, unnecessarily, and improperly, grand questions of constitutional law,[161] fall far more heavily upon the head of Chief Justice Chase for his opinion in Griffin's Case.

Even stranger, Chase represented that the full Supreme Court unanimously agreed with him that on the de facto officer question. "This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term," Chase asserted, "with

---

[159] 11 F. Cas. at 27.

[160] Accord, Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 11 n.25.

[161] See, e.g., Letter from Thomas Jefferson to William Johnson (June 12, 1823) ("This practice of Judge Marshall, of travelling out of his case to prescribe what the law would be in a moot case not before the court, is very irregular and very censurable.") https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/98-01-02-3562; Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Worst Constitutional Decision of All Time, 78 Notre Dame L. Rev. 995, 1011-12 & n.39 (2003); Baude, Judgment Power, 96 Geo. L.J. 1807, 1823-24 (2008).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

reference to this and kindred cases in this district."[162] The full Court had apparently decided the de facto officer question, in secret, without having announced the fact in any case decision or written opinion,[163] in some form of advisory preemptive appellate jurisdiction!?

To be sure, judicial norms were looser back then, but the whole thing was highly irregular even by the standards of the day. Charles Fairman, whose account defends the whole affair as an urgent workaround to stop Judge Underwood, nonetheless acknowledges that "[i]t was most unusual to hear a Justice on circuit declare that he was authorized to announce the opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Court on a matter pending in the Circuit Court."[164] Fairman further acknowledges technical problems with this maneuver, because the only issue in front of the full Court was an original writ of prohibition in Ex Parte State of Virginia, where the Court had granted a stay despite manifest procedural flaws.[165] Somehow the Court's non-ruling in a dubious vehicle became a second-hand advisory opinion on a legal question of great importance. The criticisms levelled today at the shenanigans allegedly perpetrated on the Supreme Court's "shadow docket,"[166] fall much more heavily and justifiably on the heads of the Reconstruction justices.

And to return to this point once more, even if we accept this whole problematic advisory opinion, it simultaneously undermines the other part of Chase's decision—his interpretation of Section Three. As Chase described it, there were two alternative ways to resolve the case—one massive constitutional question, and the other a more modest procedural question. Chase claimed that the whole Supreme Court had authorized him to issue a secondhand advisory opinion on the procedural question, an opinion adequate to resolve the Judge Underwood situation. But Chase ignored his colleagues' apparent preference and resolved the case on massive constitutional grounds instead—grounds that he did not claim were endorsed by the rest of the Court. Is there any justification for his doing so other than a personal power grab?

All of this is without taking a view on the merits of the de facto officer question. This, we think, is not as obvious as Chase (and apparently his colleagues) made it out

---

[162] 11 F. Cas. at 27.

[163] The Court's one recorded public statement on the matter was a statement from Justice Nelson in the original writ of prohibition case, Ex Parte State of Virginia, that Chief Justice Chase had "informed the court that before the pending motion for prohibition was made, he signified to the district judge his dissent" and that Chase was going to "direct that this division of opinion . . . be certified to this court." Ex parte State of Virginia No. 11, 1868 WL 10951, 19 L. Ed. 153 (1868); Fairman, supra note 126, at 606. That statement did not state the Court's view on the division, and seemed to anticipate that the Justices would deliberate on the issue later in the more ordinary course – not deputize the Chief Justice to go deliver some secret verdict in their stead.

[164] Fairman, supra note 126, at 607.

[165] Id.

[166] Stephen Vladeck, The Shadow Docket: How the Supreme Court Uses Stealth Rulings to Amass Power and Undermine the Republic (2023); William Baude, Foreword: The Supreme Court's Shadow Docket, 9 N.Y.U. J. L. & Lib. 1 (2015).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

to be. True, American and English history was full of many statements about the valid acts of "de facto" officers and even specifically judges.[167] But many of these statements could not be taken to their logical extreme in our constitutional system, and indeed, at the founding the Supreme Court had refused to accept the actions of several de facto judges in the saga surrounding Hayburn's Case.[168]

How to reconcile these principles is a difficult question. One possibility, stated in some of the cases, is that an unlawful, but de facto, officer's acts can be questioned directly, and on direct review, but not "collaterally."[169] On this possibility, maybe the de facto officer doctrine was a defense to claims like habeas—the procedural vehicle in Griffin's Case—because habeas was a collateral attack.[170] Habeas could not be used as a substitute for a writ of error, where the challenge would have been properly raised.

But another possibility is that the de facto officer doctrine protects only technical and ordinary legal defects in an officer's appointment, not fundamental inability to exercise power, as when that power is forbidden by the Constitution.[171] On this possibility, Judge Sheffey's acts were inherently void, and thus everything he did fell outside of his court's jurisdiction.[172] The de facto officer arguments in Griffin's Case—and thus the correct legal fate of Caesar Griffin—turn on these technicalities.[173] Indeed, these technicalities were argued by the parties and they were the main subject

---

[167] For many citations, see Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 18-21 (argument of counsel). For more, see also Reply and Response Brief for the United States, Financial Oversight and Management Board for Puerto Rico v. Aurelius (Nos. 18-1334, 18-1475, 18-1496, 18-1514, 18-15121) at 27-47; and Calcutt v. Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp., 37 F.4th 293, 342-45 (6th Cir. 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting).

[168] Baude, Severability, supra note 66, at 12 (discussing Yale Todd).

[169] For statements like this, see Ball v. United States, 140 U.S. 118, 128-129 (1891) ("was judge de facto if not de jure, and his acts as such are not open to collateral attack."); see also Note, The De Facto Officer Doctrine, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 909, 910, 919 (1963); but see id. at 910 & n. 9 (suggesting that a suit is collateral whenever the officer "is not a party," including on "writ of error").

[170] All three cases cited by Chase in Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 27, can be characterized this way. Taylor v. Skrine, 5 S.C.L. 516, 3 Brev. 516 (1815) deals with a writ of execution and observes that "no objections were made to his authority at the time the decree was given." State v. Bloom, 17 Wis. 521 (1863) relies entirely on In re Boyle 9 Wis. 264 (1859) which is a habeas case holding that the "right to hold the offices cannot be inquired into in a collateral proceeding of this kind," id. at 267. And People v. Bangs, 24 Ill. 184., 187 (1860) distinguishes a "direct proceeding" from one where the doctrine applied.

[171] For statements like this, see McDowell v. United States, 159 U.S. 596, 598 (1895) ("presents a mere matter of statutory construction . . . . It involves no trespass upon the executive power of appointment."); see also Note, The De Facto Officer Doctrine, at 918 (discussing Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530 (1962)).

[172] But see In re Boyle, cited supra note 170 (distinguishing "the jurisdiction of the court, which may always be inquired into; it is an inquiry into the right of the judge to hold his office, which is a question entirely distinct from that of the jurisdiction of the court over the offence").

[173] In the Supreme Court's most recent de facto officer doctrine case, Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177 (1995), it split the difference, holding the doctrine inapplicable because the case was on direct of Judge Underwood's opinion below.[174] Chief Justice Chase could have turned his considerable powers to them, had he not been busy knee-capping the Fourteenth Amendment instead.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

* * *

There is little to be said in defense of Griffin's Case, but much to be learned from it. The very weakness of its arguments; the obviously result-oriented nature of its legal analysis; and the inconsistency of its conclusion with Section Three's language, end up confirming the core conclusion in this section: Section Three's disqualification of designated persons from office is a self-executing constitutional command that requires nothing more to have immediate legal force.

III. Section Three Supersedes, Qualifies, or Satisfies Prior Constitutional Provisions

Our third proposition is logically and methodologically straightforward but perhaps unsettling in some of its implications: Section Three trumps the earlier parts of the Constitution—to the extent there is a true conflict between them.

As noted above, one of Chief Justice Chase's arguments against enforcing Section Three was that it conflicted (he thought) with prior constitutional norms—of due process, prospectivity, fairness, and so on.[175] Even for those who do not put the claim in so many words, we suspect that they might share a similar intuition—there is something about Section Three, taken seriously, that seems harsh, unforgiving, undemocratic, unAmerican (?), even . . . unconstitutional(!?). If so, it might seem to follow that somebody (judges?) should tame Section Three.

This is an understandable instinct. But it is wrong: dead wrong. We think the conflict with prior constitutional rules is overstated—more feel than real. But to the extent the conflict is real, Section Three wins the face-off.

Constitutional amendments change the Constitution. It thus should be unsurprising—indeed, it is in the very nature of constitutional amendments—that such new provisions, when added to the Constitution, supersede, displace, qualify, adjust, correct, or simply must be considered to satisfy earlier constitutional rules, to the extent of any actual conflict between them. Simply put: a constitutional amendment review and the challenge was constitutional. In the more recent case of Financial Oversight and Management Board for Puerto Rico v. Aurelius, 140 S. Ct. 1649, 1666 (2020), it avoided the issue because it found the appointments lawful.

---

[174] See Opinion of Judge Underwood, supra note 125, at 463-466.

[175] See supra Part III.C.2.c.; see also Ginsburg, Huq, & Landau, supra note 118, at 18 (suggesting that a self-executing interpretation, "while in harmony with the original operation of Section 3, raises due process and perhaps bill of attainder concerns" and for that reason an "alternative, more plausible construction gives Congress authority to determine how Section 3 is enforced").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

supersedes prior law precisely to the extent that it departs from the prior rules. This general maxim of interpretation applies to Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment the same as it applies to any other constitutional amendment provision. If the original textual meaning of Section Three's terms, understood in their natural sense and accounting for any terms of art or specialized usages of words, departs from or alters prior constitutional understandings, that new constitutional language must be given full effect and priority over earlier provisions.

These basic principles of conflicting legal provisions were astutely captured by Alexander Hamilton, writing as Publius in The Federalist Number 78. "It not uncommonly happens that there are two statutes existing at one time, clashing in whole or in part with each other and neither of them containing any repealing clause or expression," Hamilton wrote. When this occurs, the courts must determine the "meaning and operation" of the two provisions.

Hamilton articulated two principles for doing so, which work as a complementary pair. "So far as they can, by fair construction, be reconciled to each other, reason and law conspire to dictate that this should be done"—there's the first of the pair, but Hamilton's sentence does not end there, but instead pauses only ever-so-briefly, with a semi-colon, before proceeding to the second rule of the pair: "where this is impracticable, it becomes a matter of necessity to give effect to one in exclusion of the other. The rule which has obtained in the courts for determining their relative validity is that the last in order of time shall be preferred to the first." This was, Hamilton continued, "a mere rule of construction," but it was an appropriate one, "consonant to truth and propriety," consistently recognized by courts as interpreters of law: that, as "between the interfering acts of an equal authority that which was the last indication of its will should have the preference."[176]

Hamilton went on, more famously, to explain that a different interpretive principle governed the interfering acts of a superior and a subordinate authority—and proceeded to derive the proposition customarily called "judicial review."[177] But that is not the interpretive question here. Here, the key point is precisely Hamilton's lead-in proposition: that, as between "interfering" acts of equal legal stature—the paradigm being two statutes, adopted by the same legislature, at different times—the last in time prevails to the extent of any true, irreconcilable conflict. As with statutes adopted by the same legislative authority at different times, so with constitutional provisions adopted by the same authority at different times and possessing the same

---

[176] See The Federalist No. 78 (I. Kramnick ed. 1987) at 439 (Hamilton). These rules were well-established in American and English law. Caleb Nelson, Preemption, 86 Va. L. Rev. 225, 235-244 (2000)

[177] See The Federalist No. 78, supra note 176, at 439-440 (Hamilton) ("But in regard to the interfering acts of a superior and subordinate authority of an original and derivative power, the nature and reason of the thing indicate the converse of that rule as proper to be followed. They teach us that the prior act of a superior ought to be preferred to the subsequent act of an inferior and subordinate authority; and that accordingly whenever a particular statute contravenes the Constitution, it will be the duty of the judicial tribunals to adhere to the latter and disregard the former.")

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

legal status: By the terms of Article V, constitutional amendments are "valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution," when adopted.[178] Thus, where We, the People, have adopted a new constitutional text "interfering" with or departing from prior constitutional provisions, the last-in-time enacted prevails to the extent of any conflict. That is the interpretive principle that governs the relationship between new constitutional language and old language from which it departs.

Actual constitutional examples of these principles abound. The entire Bill of Rights in a sense qualifies, or limits, the original Constitution's grant of enumerated powers—to the extent of a conflict between those powers and the subsequently enumerated rights.[179] Likewise, the Eleventh Amendment qualifies Article III's extension of the federal judicial power to various cases and controversies. To the extent the Eleventh Amendment changes what Article III may originally have provided, the amendment supersedes that prior law.[180]

Much of the time, new amendments can be harmonized with what came before them. Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment's grant of "power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article"[181] does not preempt, for example, the Due Process Clause or the Cruel or Unusual Punishments Clause. It does not allow Congress to punish civil rights violations through summary tortures without trial. Similarly, Section Five does not preempt the Veto Clause; it can and should be read together with Article I, to require "appropriate legislation" to go through the preexisting lawmaking process.[182] A new amendment does not ignore the legal system that it amends.

On the other hand, other parts of the Reconstruction Amendments did conflict sharply with prior constitutional norms, and they displaced them precisely to that extent. Consider the Thirteenth Amendment's ban on slavery—a dramatic and particularly obvious illustration of the point that new constitutional language supersedes and repudiates old constitutional language, to the extent of any conflict. The Thirteenth Amendment's abolition of slavery implicitly but necessarily overrides and extinguishes the Fugitive Slave Clause and any other provision of the original Constitution that protected the institution of slavery to the full logical extent of inconsistency with the amendment's flat ban. Similarly, Section Two of the Fourteenth Amendment supersedes and displaces the Constitution's original apportionment

---

[178] U.S. Const. art. V.

[179] On the relationship between rights and powers, see William Baude, Rethinking the Federal Eminent Domain Power, 122 Yale L.J. 1738, 1821-1822 (2013); Jud Campbell, The Invention of First Amendment Federalism, 97 Tex. L. Rev. 517, 561-67 (2019).

[180] Baude & Sachs, Eleventh Amendment, supra note 9, at 624-25; cf. Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1, 21 (1890) (Harlan, J., concurring).

[181] U.S. Const. amdt XIV, sec. 5.

[182] See William Baude, Sovereign Immunity and the Constitutional Text, 103 Va. L. Rev. 1, 19 (2017) (offering the examples in this paragraph).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

rules including the notorious Three-fifths Clause.[183] Because the two rules conflict in substance, the amendment prevails over the Constitution's original language.

Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is in the same family. In most respects, Section Three can be easily harmonized with other parts of the Constitution, such as Article I's Speech or Debate Clause, Article I and II's impeachment provisions, Article II's process of presidential selection, Article III's requirement of a case or controversy, and so on. As we have discussed, Section Three's new constitutional qualification for office is enforced in the same way as other constitutional qualifications for office, and is easily reconciled with existing constitutional rules.

But there are a few constitutional provisions that have been alleged to conflict with Section Three. If and when this is the case, just as any later-enacted constitutional provision supersedes or modifies an earlier-enacted constitutional provisions with which the new provision conflicts, Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment logically qualifies and, where the language so compels the conclusion, overrides prior constitutional rules.[184]

Thus, we think all this follows: To the extent of any inconsistency between them, Section Three overrides any limitations otherwise imposed by the Bill of Attainder Clause. To the extent of any inconsistency between them, Section Three also overrides limitations imposed by the Ex post Facto Clause. To the extent of any inconsistency between them, Section Three likewise overrides—or simply satisfies—prior constitutional requirements of due process of law.

Finally—and this example might present more difficult questions—to the extent of any inconsistency between them, Section Three overrides, supersedes, or satisfies the free speech principles reflected in the First Amendment. That is: Whatever the [183] See U.S. Const. amdt. XIV, sec. 2; U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 3. By itself, the Thirteenth Amendment also already rendered the Three-fifths Clause a null set. Section Two then dealt with the injustice of letting the South claim a massive increase in political power for its disenfranchised black population.

---

[184] Indeed, for what it is worth, the legislative history supports this conclusion as well. Opponents of Section Three characterized it as directly imposing retroactive punishment, thus contradicting principles of due process and principles against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws. Cong. Globe, 39th Cong. 1st Sess. at 2915 (Sen. Doolittle) (complaining that Section Three was an "ex post facto provision, a bill of attainder"); id. at 2890 (Sen. Cowen) (bill of attainder); id. at App 241 (Sen. Davis) (Section Three "is in the nature of both a bill of attainder and an ex post facto law"); id. at 2940 (Sen. Hendricks) (ex post facto); id. at 2916; see also id. at 2467 (Rep. Boyer) (criticizing earlier version of Section Three as "a bill of attainder or ex post facto law"). These charges were generally premised on the view – with which proponents of the amendment evidently agreed, see id. at 3036 (Sen. Henderson) – that Section Three would preempt these earlier rules to the extent of a direct conflict. Though at one point Senator Davis did make the wild suggestion that Section Three might itself exceed Congress's power to propose amendments to the Constitution. Id. at App. 241 ("The framers of the Constitution did not intend to invest, and have not in fact conferred on Congress the power to initiate alterations of it which would revolutionize the Government formed by it"); see also id. at 3146. See also Graber, supra note 12, at 26-31, 36-37 (documenting this history).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

correct meaning of Section Three as applied to conspiracies, attempts, incitements, and advocacy that meet the description of "engag[ing] in insurrection or rebellion" or of giving of "aid or comfort" to enemies of the constitutional government of the United States, the constitutional meaning of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment modifies or qualifies what otherwise might have been thought the dictates of the First Amendment.

In the end, we think that these various prior provisions can mostly be read harmoniously with Section Three. Reason and common sense suggest they should be read consistently with one another to the extent fairly possible; and it is, for the most part, fairly possible to do so. But to the legitimate extent of any conflict or tension, Section Three controls over the Bill of Attainder Clause, the Ex Post Facto Clause, the Due Process Clause, and the First Amendment.

The first three are easy.

A. Bills of Attainder

A bill of attainder is the legislative infliction of punishment on specific people without a trial.[185] It is a violation of both the separation of powers and individual rights because it short-circuits the normal adjudication of guilt or innocence. But Section Three is neither a bill nor an attainder. It is not a "bill"—that is, an enactment of the legislature. Rather, it is an enactment of The People as supreme constitutional law. And it is not an "attainder" either—in that it is not at all clear that it inflicts punishment, because disqualification from office is not necessarily or exclusively a form of punishment. For instance, the Twenty-second Amendment is surely not inflicting a "punishment" when it precludes the President from running for a third term.[186] Moreover, Section Three does not inflict it on specified persons or groups, but rather on anybody who has committed a described course of conduct.

To be sure, Supreme Court precedent has read the Bill of Attainder Clauses more broadly, both in a pair of 20th-century "red scare" cases[187] and perhaps more relevantly in a pair of immediate post-Civil War-era loyalty cases: In Cummings v. Missouri[188] and Ex Parte Garland,[189] the Supreme Court invalidated state and federal oath requirements that required an "Ironclad Oath" from anybody holding a range of positions, both public and private. That oath was really a past-loyalty-requirement, requiring people to swear that they had not supported the confederacy or [185] See generally Anthony Dick, The Substance of Punishment Under the Bill of Attainder Clause, 63 Stan. L. Rev. 1177 (2011).

---

[186] U.S. Const. amdt. XXII. But see Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277, 320 (1866) ("Disqualification from office many be punishment, as in cases of conviction upon impeachment.").
[187] United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437 (1965); United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946).
[188] 71 U.S. 277 (1866).
[189] 71 U.S. 333 (1866).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the like.[190] The Court concluded that these requirements were effectively bills of attainder—and also ex post facto laws—and held them unconstitutional.

Even if one takes these precedents at face value it does not follow that Section Three would similarly be a bill of attainder. First, the "Ironclad Oath" laws had a broader scope than Section Three: Garland dealt with bar membership, and concluded that "exclusion from any of the professions or any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct can be regarded in no other light than as punishment for such conduct."[191] Similarly, the plaintiff in Cummings was a Catholic priest forbidden from preaching.[192] Neither case dealt with a more focused exclusion from constitutional office. Indeed, the majority opinion emphasized this fact, explicitly noting that neither case involved qualifications for public office.[193] Second, because both cases focused on the retroactive effect of the laws,[194] neither case's reasoning would seem applicable to Section Three in post-Civil-War insurrections and rebellions—which of course are the only insurrections and rebellions to which Section Three still applies.[195]

And in any event we doubt that one should take these precedents at face value. First of all, if we had to take sides, we might well be inclined to say that Garland at least may have been wrong, for reasons stated in dissent by Justice Miller (joined by three other justices, including, perhaps somewhat ironically given his later position in Griffin, Chief Justice Chase).[196] Second, and more fundamentally, if constitutional amendments can change the Constitution, a fortiori they can change judicial interpretations (and misinterpretations) of the Constitution. That is of course what Section One of the Fourteenth Amendment famously did with respect to Dred Scott, what the Eleventh Amendment did with respect to Chisholm, and so on.[197] In short, the Court's interpretation of the Bill of Attainder Clause was a stretch, and regardless, it does not stretch far enough to change or limit the meaning of Section Three.

B. Ex Post Facto Laws

---

[190] For much more detailed discussion of the federal "Ironclad Oath" see infra Part IV.A.4.b.i.
[191] Garland, 71 U.S. at 377.
[192] Cummings, 71 U.S. at 319.
[193] Garland, 71 U.S. at 378.
[194] Cummings, 71 U.S. at 327 ("They are aimed at past acts, and not future acts."); Garland, at 377 ("In the exclusion which the statute adjudges it imposes a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable at the time they were committed").
[195] See supra Part I.B.
[196] Garland, 71 U.S. at 382. Cummings presents a trickier case, as it might involve complicating questions of state power to interfere with religious liberty and church autonomy (albeit before ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment) and an especially weak case for the relevance of past loyalty to engaging in religious occupation.
[197] For a somewhat lighthearted explication of this principle – and a serious treatment of certain of its implications, see Michael Stokes Paulsen, Can a Constitutional Amendment Overrule a Supreme Court Decision? 24 Const. Comm. 285 (2007).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Article I also forbids both the state and federal governments from enacting an "Ex Post Facto" law.[198] An ex post facto law is generally thought to mean a legislative enactment that makes a past act criminal even though it was lawful at the time it was done. Once again, Section Three does not meet this description, being neither a legislative enactment (but rather a new constitutional provision) nor a legislative enactment defining a criminal offense.[199] True, as applied to actions done before 1868, Section Three has retroactive (non-criminal) constitutional legal effect. But as applied to actions done after 1868, the idea that Section Three might depart even from the "spirit" of the ban on ex post facto laws makes precious little sense.

So Section Three no longer produces any conflict—if it ever did—with the Ex Post Facto Clauses or with any Ex Post Facto Spirit that might be supposed to lurk behind them. And even if it did, Section Three would supersede both prior law and lurking spirit.

Indeed, we have this on especially good authority, as this very question has been asked and answered in the past. The Eleventh Amendment, as noted above, had the effect of cutting off jurisdiction previously recognized by Chisholm v. Georgia's interpretation of Article III. In Hollingsworth v. Virginia, the Court then confronted the question whether the Amendment was retroactive, cutting off suits pending when the Amendment became law. The plaintiffs argued in the U.S. Supreme Court against retroactivity, because "[t]he spirit of the constitution," forbade "the mischief of an ex post facto Constitution."[200] Indeed, this argument mirrored precisely the arguments for narrow construction we have seen above: "It is true, that an amendment to the Constitution cannot be controuled by those provisions; and if the words were explicit and positive, to produce the retrospective effect contended for, they must prevail. But the words are doubtful; and, therefore, they ought to be so construed, as to conform to the general principle of the Constitution."[201] But the Supreme Court disagreed emphatically—unanimously ruling the very next day that the Amendment applied retroactively, by necessary implication.[202] As with the Eleventh, so too for the Fourteenth: Had the Supreme Court ever been called upon to consider the question, the right answer surely is that the Fourteenth Amendment's rules immediately governed upon ratification and applied "retroactively" to prior actions covered by the revised constitutional rules.

---

[198] U.S. Const. art. I, §§9 & 10.

[199] To be sure, there are revisionist arguments that the Ex Post Facto clause itself extends to retroactive civil laws too. See Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel, 524 U.S. 498, 538-39 (1998) (Thomas, J., concurring). And as with bills of attainder, in the wake of the Civil War the Supreme Court held that Ironclad Oath requirements were ex post facto laws as well. Cummings, 71 U.S. at 326-332; Garland, 71 U.S. at 377-368. But as discussed in the text, even these principles do not ensnare Section Three going forward, on a non-ex-post-facto basis [200] 3 U.S. at 378-80 (arguments of counsel).

[201] Id.

[202] Id. at 382. See Baude & Sachs, Eleventh Amendment, supra note 9, at 626-627.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

C. Due Process of Law

The Constitution also forbids the deprivation of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law," which in many circumstances requires judicial process. Does Section Three's self-executing legal disqualification from office present any incompatibility with this requirement? Again, we think the two sets of provisions readily reconciled by giving the Due Process Clause no more than its due.

First of all, it is far from clear that the right to hold public office is a form of life, liberty, or property. It is a public privilege, a public trust, to be vested with the power of the people. And though it is a closer case, the same thing may be true even for those who already hold office at the moment that Section Three disqualifies them. Due process protects private vested rights from public deprivation. It does not protect public rights.[203] It has been argued that in England, offices were understood as vested rights of property, and occasionally early American courts said so as well.[204] But that was not the better rule in America. Treating offices as property did not fit well with republican principles,[205] and by 1900 the Supreme Court could rightly state: "The decisions are numerous to the effect that public offices are mere agencies or trusts, and not property as such."[206]

In any event, even if it were otherwise, and those who held offices were deprived of property by Section Three, what would follow? Nothing. Section Three would prevail. Consider once again the Thirteenth Amendment, which did directly interfere with private property rights—the right recognized in southern states to hold other humans in bondage. The Thirteenth Amendment instantly, self-executingly, eliminated those property rights, due process notwithstanding.[207] So too would Section Three.

Principles of due process might also animate a different objection—that imposing such harsh consequences on individual wrongdoing simply ought to involve fair notice and an opportunity to be heard. Perhaps this instinct motivates the argument against self-execution, as in Griffin's Case. But in our view this objection is sufficiently answered by the terms of Section Three itself. Perhaps the reason that Section

---

[203] Caleb Nelson, Adjudication in the Political Branches, 107 Colum. L. Rev. 559, 565-593 (2007); William Baude, Adjudication Outside Article III, 133 Harv. L. Rev. 1511, 1540-1547 (2020).

[204] Jed Shugerman, Freehold Offices vs. "Despotic Displacement": Why "Executive Power" Did Not Include Removal (July 25, 2023), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=4521119; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 NC 1 (1833).

[205] See Jane Manners & Lev Menand, The Three Permissions, 121 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 20 (2021) ("In revolutionary America, the idea of offices as property was roundly rejected"); Saikrishna Prakash, Removal and Tenure in Office, 92 Va. L. Rev. 1779, 1824 n. 157 (2006) ("A more republican conception of government meant a more republican conception of offices.").

[206] Taylor & Marshall v. Beckham, 178 U.S. 548 (1900).

[207] See supra notes 48-50 and accompanying text.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Three only applies to holding office and not voting, and only applies to prior office-holders, who have previously sworn a constitutional oath—indeed, these limitations are the only ways in which Section Three's scope was appreciably narrowed during the drafting process—is that we can expect once and future officials and oath-takers to be on particularly strong notice about the basic rules of the constitutional order. Section Three does not ensnare garden-variety crime or miscreance. It ensnares offenses against the authority of the system by those who have been and seek to be part of that system.

Similarly, so long as Section Three is applied through the established and customary procedures for determining qualifications for office, many due process objections would seem to disappear. As discussed above, in many scenarios, Section Three's disqualification would be enforced through administrative hearings, quo warranto suits, state and federal judicial review, congressional adjudications, and so on. Anybody who wishes to argue that his conduct is not covered by the substantive sweep of Section Three is free to litigate that point through all relevant channels.[208] Section Three is therefore not in conflict with any requirements of fair notice or an opportunity to be heard.

D. The Ominous Question: Section Three and the First Amendment

With respect to the Constitution's provisions on bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and due process, the harmonization of Section Three with prior constitutional law is easy and relatively unproblematic. There is little conflict between the two provisions, and to the extent there is, Section Three is plain enough that it must prevail. The interaction of Section Three with the First Amendment presents a more interesting, even troubling, question. Does Section Three partially revoke the right to political dissent?

This question begets more questions: What exactly is the relationship between Section Three's language imposing disqualification for having "engaged in insurrection or rebellion" and the First Amendment's protections of the freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and petition? Likewise, what is the relationship between the disqualification for having given "aid or comfort" to enemies of the United States and the First Amendment? As we have argued, Section Three in principle can supersede, qualify, or modify (or be deemed to "satisfy") prior constitutional requirements, rendering the provisions of the First Amendment essentially without independent constitutional force as limitations on the scope of Section Three. But how might the prior and important constitutional principles of the First Amendment affect the proper understanding of Section Three's meaning and scope? What exactly does Section Three effectuate, in relation to the First Amendment? Where do the usual protections of the First Amendment leave off and the legal disabilities imposed by Section Three take over, as a matter of the proper understanding of Section Three?

---

[208] See generally supra Part II.B.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

There are, crudely, three possible ways of describing the relationship. The first is to find Section Three (implicitly) limited by the First Amendment. The second is, in contrast, to view Section Three as properly understood as carving out a zone of exception to, supersession of, or satisfaction of First Amendment principles. The third, which we believe correct, lies somewhere in the middle: Section Three should be construed, to the extent fairly possible, consistently with the free speech principles memorialized in the First Amendment. But to the extent of a true conflict between them, Section Three must control.

To consider a not-so-hypothetical example, suppose that an officeholder covered by Section Three gives a speech to an assembled crowd encouraging them to engage in rebellious or insurrectionary conduct. (And suppose further that the crowd accepts the encouragement, rebelling against members of Congress carrying out a constitutional duty at the seat of government.) We will return to this example[209] but for now we consider: how do we judge such an example? Is this only a question of the constitutional definition of "engage in insurrection" and "aid or comfort"—of whether an encouraging speech to an insurrectionary crowd is covered by those terms? Or is it also a question of whether that speech is protected by freedom of speech, and under modern doctrine, that would mean the very stringent test of Brandenburg v. Ohio?[210] Or is it somehow both?

To a large extent, we think the conflicts between Section Three and free speech can be minimized—as Hamilton would counsel.[211] First, even under modern doctrine, free speech does not protect several categories of speech that overlap with Section Three. Second, Section Three's terms will not often reach pure speech.

To elaborate on the first point: Modern First Amendment doctrine leaves the government free to punish actual conspiracy and solicitation, direct incitement, and material support of unlawful activities such as insurrection, rebellion, and treason. (There are serious questions about how much modern First Amendment doctrine has exceeded the original protections of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, which we will largely put aside, but the point is that these exceptions are recognized even on today's liberal understandings.[212])

---

[209] See infra Part IV.C.2.

[210] 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

[211] Federalist No. 78, supra note 176 ("So far as they can, by fair construction, be reconciled to each other, reason and law conspire to dictate that this should be done.").

[212] For what it is worth, we do not in general dispute many aspects of modern First Amendment doctrine, which we believe often captures the original meaning of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, as applied to modern circumstances. See generally Michael Stokes Paulsen, Scouts, Families, and Schools, 85 Minn. L. Rev. 1917, 1919-1922 (2001). To get a sense of how one might construct a truly marvelous proof of this, which this margin is too narrow to contain, see for starters, Adam Griffin, First Amendment Originalism: The Original Law and A Theory of Legal Change as Applied to The Freedom of Speech and of The Press, 17 First Amend. L. Rev. 91 (2019); Jud Campbell, Natural Rights

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The First Amendment has long been held not to protect conspiracy to commit a crime or direct solicitation of unlawful activity, because this is "speech integral to criminal conduct."[213] And while one must use some caution about unduly expanding this category, conspiracy and solicitation are at its core.[214] Thus, efforts to steal elections, to pressure state officials to manufacture votes, to pressure other officials (like the Vice President) to violate their constitutional duties in service of a constitutional coup—would all be unprotected by the First Amendment. To the extent those efforts are swept up by Section Three, there would be no conflict.

More familiar may be the modern line of cases concerning "incitement." Over the course of the twentieth century, judicial doctrine increasingly gave greater protection to speech that could be seen as generally inciting unlawful activity, recognizing that earlier doctrine (such as the famous "clear and present danger" test) had too readily permitted suppression of disfavored political views. The modern rule, stated in Brandenburg v. Ohio in 1969, excludes from First Amendment protection only advocacy or expressive conduct (i) "directed to" (ii) triggering or inciting (iii) "imminent" lawless action (presumably including acts of insurrection or rebellion) and (iv) "likely" to produce such action.[215] That is a fairly strict standard, but not one that is impossible to satisfy. Importantly, it does leave open—even under the generous terms of modern First Amendment law—the prospect that some acts of advocacy and expression supporting insurrection or rebellion are simply unprotected by the First Amendment in any event, so that Section Three does not even need to have amended or superseded the First Amendment in order for its terms to be given their full legal effect.

The Supreme Court's relatively recent decision in Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project[216] recognized a further and more controversial limitation on subversive speech: it can be forbidden where it provides "material support" to a foreign organization engaged in or committed to terrorist violence against the nation. The Court concluded that because the "interest in combating terrorism is an urgent objective of the highest order," the Congress could forbid even speech—such as teaching and training—assisting such organizations, and even though the speech did not directly and the First Amendment, 117 Yale L. J. 246 (2017); Jud Campbell, The Emergence of Neutrality, 131 Yale L. J. 861 (2022). (We will cease further digression on this point.)

---

[213] United States v. Hansen, 599 U.S. __, at 18-19 (2023); United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 297 (2008); Giboney v. New Ice Storage, 336 U.S. 490 (1949); Eugene Volokh, The "Speech Integral to Criminal Conduct" Exception, 101 Cornell L. Rev. 981, 989-993, 1007-1008 (2016).

[214] Volokh, supra note 213, at 1011-1015.

[215] 395 U.S. at 447. This standard is elaborated in Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105, 108-109 (1973); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. 886 (1982). Additionally, Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966) rejected the idea that there is a lower First Amendment standard of incitement when a state legislature is excluding an elected member under state law, id. at 132-135; see also Communist Party of Indiana v. Whitcomb, 414 U.S. 441, 449 (1974) (same principle applies to ballot access).

[216] 561 U.S. 1 (2010).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

further terrorist conduct. While this decision is hedged by multiple limiting principles,[217] it illustrates another set of circumstances where the First Amendment would create no conflict with potential applications of Section Three.

In sum, while modern First Amendment doctrine is quite generous in its protection of speech, in many cases it would produce no conflict with the coverage of Section Three. We will elaborate on the second point—the scope of Section Three itself—more fully in Part IV, but for now suffice it to say that the occasions will be rare where speech alone is what qualifies one as having "engaged in insurrection" or provided "aid or comfort" to enemies.

That said, we will concede that the conflict between free speech and Section Three cannot be denied entirely. Consider the Civil War example of Clement Vallandigham, who was arrested and imprisoned by the military on the theory that "he was laboring, with some effect, to prevent the raising of troops; to encourage desertions from the army; and to leave the Rebellion without an adequate military force to suppress it,"— that he was "warring upon the Military."[218] It is conceivable (though we do not prejudge the point) that Vallandigham's anti-military efforts could be covered by Section Three. And yet it is also quite plausible that his efforts would be protected by free speech.

Or for a sharper example, even more on point, consider the case of Representative-elect John Y. Brown, who was excluded from the Fortieth Congress on the grounds that he had given aid and comfort to the Confederacy by writing to the Louisville Courier promising to resist the Union army "unto the death" and stating that anybody who volunteered for the Union army "ought and I believe will be shot down before he leaves the State."[219] This exclusion was part of the backdrop of Section Three's enactment and likely the kind of thing Section Three was intended to cover. But, argues one scholar of the incident, this pre-Section Three exclusion "was entirely unconstitutional" and "plainly violative of the First Amendment."[220] If that was so before Section Three's enactment, does Section Three make it otherwise?[221]

Finally and perhaps most explosively, consider the 1919 exclusion of socialist newspaper editor Victor Berger from the House. Berger was denounced by members of the House for having given "aid and comfort to the enemies of this country during [217] The Court emphasized that "only material support coordinated with or under the direction of a designated foreign terrorist organization" was banned; "independent advocacy" was "not covered." Id. at 31-32. Additionally, the law only applied to foreign organizations.

---

[218] President Abraham Lincoln to Erastus Corning and others (June 12, 1863), in Abraham Lincoln, Speeches and Writings, 1859-1965, at 454, 459 (Don Fehrenbacher, ed. 1989). See infra notes 269-277 and accompanying text.

[219] See infra notes 270-278, and 343-348 and accompanying text.

[220] Lynch, supra note 5, at 197-198.

[221] See Lynch, supra note 5, at 198 ("Had Section 3 been ratified by this point, these concerns would be assuaged.")

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

this Great War," and excluded in part on that basis.[222] (Indeed, Berger had also been convicted and sentenced under the Espionage Act, though the charges were overturned by the Supreme Court on grounds of judicial bias.)[223] Another scholar of the incident writes that "Under a good reading of the First Amendment, Berger's speeches and writings could not have been seditious; however under the interpretation prevailing at the time, they probably were."[224] What should we make of such an incident?

In the end, in a case where free speech principles conflict with the best original understanding of "engaged in insurrection" or "aid or comfort," we think that free speech principles must give way. We stress that we do not think that all or even most disloyal speech will rise to the level of triggering Section Three's disqualifications.[225] But where it does, where "it becomes a matter of necessity to give effect to one in exclusion of the other," it is the more recent Fourteenth Amendment that "shall be preferred" to the earlier rule.[226]

For those (like us) who value First Amendment liberties of speech, press, assembly, religion, and the right to dissent generally, might Section Three therefore be thought a little dangerous? Might Section Three, in the wrong hands or applied improperly, be used to suppress dissent in the name of excluding insurrectionists from office? Perhaps. We do not shy away from the point. But the supposed danger of a constitutional provision is not really an argument against its meaning. And the potential abuse of a constitutional power, privilege, or disqualification is not really a good legal argument against its existence. Section Three's exclusion could be thought to pose a danger; but insurrection and rebellion are dangers too—all too real dangers, as recent events have shown. Where exactly that line is drawn by the Constitution, and the extent to which that line changes the prior rules of the First Amendment, are ultimately questions of the meaning of Section Three's general terms triggering disqualification from future office—"insurrection," "rebellion," "engaged in," "given aid or comfort to"—and of who all is included under Section Three's ban. To that set of important questions we turn next.

IV. Section Three's Substantive Disqualification is Sweeping

---

[222] Chafetz, supra note 47, at 190; Lynch, supra note 5, at 211-213; 6 Cannon, supra note 18, at 52-63.
[223] Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22 (1921). During the initial exclusion, when Berger's conviction was on appeal, the House Committee announced "that it would not be governed by the action of the judge and jury at the Chicago trial," but would review the evidence and legal questions for itself. 6 Cannon, supra note 18, at 54. But curiously, after the convictions were reversed the House allowed Berger to sit in the sixty-eighth through seventieth Congresses. Lynch, supra note 5, at 213.
[224] Chafetz, supra note 47, at 191.
[225] In our view, for instance, the exclusion of Victor Berger went too far—not because the First Amendment makes an exception to Section Three, but because Berger's advocacy did not satisfy the original meaning of Section Three. See infra note 359.
[226] Federalist No. 78, supra note 176, at 439.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

We come at last to the heart of the beast: the substance of Section Three's prohibition. We begin (in Subpart A) with the most interesting and important set of issues—the types of misconduct that trigger Section Three. What deeds (and words?) amount to having "engaged in" "insurrection" or "rebellion" against the lawful authority of the Constitution and the system of government it establishes? What acts (or words?) amount to having given "aid or comfort" to "enemies" of lawful government under the Constitution?

These terms to some extent bear a range of meaning and fair construction. The events they describe are often exceptional and to some extent unique. Still, some applications will be clear and virtually indisputable, falling within the terms' core meaning—the center of the interpretive bullseye, so to speak. Such scenarios so clearly fall within Section Three that they may be said to be contained within the opposite of a safe harbor—a "sure shipwreck,"[227] to borrow Susan Morse's phrase—of unquestionably disqualifying conduct falling within the core of Section Three's meaning: for example, declaring unilateral secession from lawful constitutional government; or the taking up of arms against government (as in the waging of the Civil War). At the other end of the continuum, there will be situations that clearly lie in a safe harbor outside the legitimate range of meaning of Section Three's terms—ordinary expression of political dissent as well as even ordinary law violations. In between these markers, there is a zone of reasonable, fair construction of allowable interpretation and application in which government officials may make judgments that must be conceded to be within the range of what the Constitution permits—and where the decisions and actions of government officials exercising their constitutional powers consequently cannot be considered unlawful and thereby subject to judicial invalidation. Within that fair range of meaning, different interpreters legitimately can reach differing conclusions, all in accordance with the Constitution. We address all of these questions in subpart A.

We then turn more briefly (in subpart B) to the questions of what prior-office-holding, oath-taking categories of persons—persons who then subsequently engaged in insurrection or rebellion—are covered by Section Three's ban and (a similar but distinct question) what future offices are constitutionally barred to such persons. We conclude that Section Three's disqualification is sweeping, both in the substantive conduct that triggers such disqualification and in the office-holders and offices to which it applies. In particular, contrary to one recent revisionist view, we believe it applies to the Presidency.

Finally (in Subpart C) we will consider the attempted overthrow of the 2020 Presidential election. Did the incumbent president's willful, deliberate refusal to accept the outcome of the lawful constitutional election resulting in his defeat for re-election and, instead, his (and others') attempt to overthrow constitutional election results and install or maintain himself in office, by force, by fraud or by attempted de facto political coup d'etat against the regime of lawful constitutional government, constitute engaging in "insurrection or rebellion against the Constitution of the United States"? We think the answer is yes.

[227] Susan Morse, Safe Harbors, Sure Shipwrecks, 49 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1385 (2016).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Whether called a "rebellion," an attempted coup d'etat seeking to displace lawful government authority under the Constitution, or an "insurrection," instigating, inciting and encouraging a mob to engage in acts of forcible violence directed against the ability of Congress and the Vice President to carry out their constitutional duties—and then refusing to intervene—such conduct is covered by Section Three, and is disqualifying. If those are indeed the facts concerning Donald Trump's (and others') efforts to overthrow the election—and we think they are—such conduct triggers the disqualification rule of Section Three.

Whether other federal and state officeholders—members of Congress, state legislators, past or present state and federal executive and judicial officers—engaged in conduct constituting "insurrection" or "rebellion" (including meaningful action in deliberate furtherance of an attempted coup against lawful constitutional government), or gave "aid or comfort" (approval, encouragement, support) to enemies might sometimes involve more difficult questions of fact and judgment. But they are the questions Section Three compels us to ask, and to answer. Where such evaluations and judgments have been made by actors exercising legitimate authority to make them (as discussed in Part II) and fall within the fair range of Section Three's meaning, those judgments are entitled to full legal effect.

A. Section Three's Disqualifying Conduct: "Insurrection or Rebellion"; "Engaged In"; "Aid or Comfort" to "Enemies"

What is the proper, original public meaning of "insurrection" and "rebellion" as used in Section Three? Of having "engaged in" such conduct? Of having given "aid or comfort" to "enemies"?

Because the terms are capacious and the evidence is sprawling, we will start by proposing our working definitions for these terms. We then show how they are largely consistent with standard sources for discerning the meaning of constitutional text: contemporaneous definitions of these terms; usage elsewhere in the Constitution; and contemporaneous public, political, and legal usage of the terms. This last category, which is especially instructive, includes usages from President Lincoln, legislation adopted by the Civil War Congress (both the 1862 "Ironclad" oath and the Second Confiscation Act), and the significant mid-Civil-War decision of the Supreme Court in The Prize Cases. We also consider, albeit in somewhat more abbreviated fashion, statutes and usages leading up to the Civil War, including the Insurrection Act of 1795 as amended, and an important series of exclusions from Congress itself, as well as the relevant legislative history of Section Three, and a few scattered post-enactment applications of Section Three itself.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. Working definitions

We begin by offering working definitions of the terms insurrection and rebellion and of what might constitute "engaging in" such conduct or giving "aid or comfort" to enemies under Section Three.

Insurrection is best understood as concerted, forcible resistance to the authority of government to execute the laws in at least some significant respect. The term "insurrection" connotes something more than mere ordinary lawbreaking. It suggests an affirmative contest with, and active resistance to, the authority of the government. It is in that sense more than just organized resistance to the laws—more than just a protest, even one involving civil disobedience. Rather, it is organized resistance to the government. Insurrection is also more than mere "protest" in that it implies some element of forcible resistance. It is something more than a mere spontaneous, disorganized "riot."[228] Insurrection suggests at least some degree of coordinated, concerted action. The term also implies something more than acts of solitary individuals: to qualify as an insurrection the acts in question must involve some form of collective action, even if not an advance plan.

At the same time, insurrection may fall short of outright rebellion—even as the terms overlap and might bleed into each other—in that an insurrection might not seek to overturn, overthrow, or displace the government itself, in whole or in part (as a rebellion does). As the Supreme Court put it in The Prize Cases, in 1863: "Insurrection against a government may or may not culminate in an organized rebellion."[229]

Rebellion is thus closely related to insurrection, but perhaps not quite identical in meaning. A rebellion is arguably broader in its reach than an insurrection: rebellion implies an effort to overturn or displace lawful government authority by unlawful means. (In the case of secession, or a declaration of independence, the rebellion is an effort to free those engaged in rebellion from the authority of the existing lawful government.) Rebellion is something beyond mere resistance to government authority in a particular instance or set of instances. A rebellion seeks to replace the existing regime, not just resist its law-executing authority. Rebellion involves repudiation, to some degree or another, of the regime's authority, legitimacy, or validity. It is a challenge, direct or indirect, to the regime itself. The South's attempted secession was a species of rebellion—an attempt to overturn the authority of the Constitution and government of the United States by the states asserting the right to secede. Likewise, an attempted coup d'etat is arguably also a species of rebellion—an effort to displace, replace, upend, or overthrow the existing lawful regime and substitute different authority in its stead.

---

[228] 10 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 1296 (Statement of Madison) ("A riot did not come within the legal definition of an insurrection").
[229] 2 Black (67 U.S.) 635, 667 (1863).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The term rebellion can also imply a competing claim to legitimacy. "Rebellion" thus seems to carry a stronger political-claim-of-right valence than does "insurrection."[230] Crucially, however, the fact that an insurrection or rebellion claims political or moral legitimacy—as the American Revolution did; indeed, as the South's secession did—does not make it any the less an insurrection or rebellion. The fact that an attempted coup d'etat, or declaration of independence, or secession, is claimed to be a "vindication" or "restoration" of rightful governmental authority—or asserted to be a pre-emptive effort to thwart some other person's or group's alleged wrongful assertion of authority—does not immunize such action from the legal characterization of rebellion against the regime. If somebody in fact participates in an attempt to overthrow the government, it makes no difference that he might think himself in the right for doing so, see himself as an agent for preserving lawful government, or view his acts and intention not as "rebellion" but restoration. Mistake of law is no defense to a coup d'etat. The South offered a variety of constitutional legal theories in defense of the supposed lawfulness of secession as an act for the vindication of its believed rights.[231] That did not make its acts of rebellion any less acts of rebellion.

As to the overlap and distinction between insurrection and rebellion our working definition is more tentative. It is possible that a rebellion is simply a special case of an insurrection, in the way that a square is a special case of a rectangle. But it is also possible that the term rebellion is not necessarily limited to regime change by

---

[230] Though it is possible that this connotation is anachronistic. See infra note 252.

[231] For important accounts and discussion of Southern arguments for the constitutional propriety and validity of secession, on a variety of asserted grounds, see James M. McPherson, Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era 234-236 (1988) (summarizing Southern constitutional and political theories); Daniel Farber, Lincoln's Constitution 57-91 (2003) (emphasizing arguments of states' rights to interposition, nullification, and secession generally); Michael Stokes Paulsen, Lincoln and Judicial Authority, 83 Notre Dame. L. Rev. 1227, 1270-1277 (2008) (setting forth Southern leaders' constitutional arguments that Lincoln's stance against the Dred Scott decision, against judicial supremacy, and against extension of slavery violated the judicially settled constitutional rights of slaveholding persons and states); Kenneth M. Stampp, The Concept of a Perpetual Union, 65 J. Am. Hist. 5-53 (June 1978) (providing detailed history of constitutional and political arguments over the nature of Union and the validity of secession); David P. Currie, The Constitution in Congress: Descent into the Maelstrom 1829-1861, at 228-237 (2005) (discussing and evaluating the constitutional arguments for and against the validity of secession). For the case against the constitutionality of secession, see generally 2 Abraham Lincoln, Speeches & Writings, 1859-1865: Speeches, Letters, Miscellaneous Writings, Presidential Messages & Proclamations, at 217-218 (First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1861); id. at 254-258, 260-261 (Message to Congress, July 4, 1861); see also Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Civil War as Constitutional Interpretation, 71 U Chi. L. Rev. 691, 703-715 (2004) (reviewing Daniel Farber, Lincoln's Constitution) (distilling and building on Lincoln's arguments); Kesavan & Paulsen, West Virginia, supra note 130, at 303-311 (same). For further background, see generally William W. Freehling, The Road to Disunion: Secessionists at Bay 1776-1854 (1990), and for a comprehensive exposition of the Southern view, see Alexander M. Stephens, A Constitutional View of the Late War Between the States; Its Causes, Character, Conduct and Results (1867). As a clarification: we use the term "secession" here and throughout this article to refer to unilateral secession without the consent of the federal government, as in the Civil War, and do not discuss ways the federal government might lawfully consent to the independence of a state or territory.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

force—and thus may occupy some ground not covered by the word "insurrection" (which, we have suggested, must be forcible). There are such things as "bloodless coups": actions that effectively displace or upend the prior constitutional order without shots being fired, but that nonetheless are in unlawful defiance or repudiation of the existing legal order.[232]

To illustrate this hypothesized distinction between insurrection and rebellion: Imagine that the Southern attack on Fort Sumter in April 1861 had preceded any declared right to secession. The attack would have been an act of insurrection—an exercise of concerted, forcible defiance of the authority of the Union government—but not necessarily outright rebellion. Conversely, the ordinances of secession adopted by state conventions in the South in 1860 and 1861[233] preceded (mostly) any acts of actual forcible resistance to the authority of the United States to execute the laws. The secession ordinances might still immediately constitute acts of "rebellion," even before any accompanying violence. In short: Sumter without secession would have still been insurrection. Secession without Sumter was already rebellion. Put the two events together—acts of forcible insurrection and declarations of avowed rebellion frequently travel in pairs (as they obviously did with the Civil War)—and it becomes difficult to distinguish "insurrection" from "rebellion." The overlap of the two terms in theory becomes complete in practice.

In the end, however, we do not wish to make too much of the ways in which the terms differ in shades of color and in their implication. The coverage of the terms overlaps substantially. Sometimes, the terms, occupying much of the same ground, seem capable of being used almost interchangeably. Indeed, the bigger picture point for understanding Section Three is that "insurrection" and "rebellion," in tandem, cover pretty much the entire terrain of large-scale unlawful resistance to government authority.

So much for our working definitions of "insurrection" and "rebellion." What does it mean to have "engaged in" such conduct? We believe one has "engaged" in [232] Indeed, one might characterize the process of adoption of the U.S. Constitution, replacing the regime of the Articles of Confederation, as a peaceful political coup d'etat – an act of "rebellion" if judged by the pre-existing law, but morally and politically justified by the failure of the prior regime and Lockean notions of self-governance, and subsequently legalized by its own success. See generally Paulsen & Paulsen, supra note 30, at 3-8, 17-20; Stephen E. Sachs, Originalism as a Theory of Legal Change, 38 Harv. J. L. & Pub Pol'y 818, 821, 844, 850 (2015). But cf. Akhil Reed Amar, The Words that Made Us: America's Constitutional Conversation 1760-1840, at 164-165 (2021) (emphasizing the states' retention of sovereignty under the Articles and the idea that states might thus properly exit that regime, legally, on the theory that the Articles had become a breached treaty).

---

[233] The seceding states adopted their secession resolutions by state "conventions," purporting to parallel the process by which the states ratified the Constitution. See McPherson, supra note 231, at 234-284 (describing secession actions of ten states that purported to secede from the Union). The secession ordinances of the South were self-consciously styled after the Declaration of Independence, which was obviously an act of formal legal rebellion.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

insurrection or rebellion when one has been actively involved in the planning or execution of intentional acts of insurrection or rebellion; or when one has knowingly provided active, meaningful, voluntary, direct support for, material assistance to, or specific encouragement of such actions. Such planning, participation, support, assistance, or encouragement may be in the form of either words or deeds, as long as the person who has "engaged in" such activities embraced the objectives of the insurrection or rebellion in question and did things that contributed in a meaningful way to advancing those objectives.[234] (There is obvious overlap here with the closely related concept of having given "aid or comfort" to the nation's enemies, which we discuss presently.)

Of course, there are also important limits to how far the concept of having "engaged in" insurrection or rebellion extends. Mere passive acquiescence, resigned acceptance, silence, or inaction is not typically enough to have "engaged in" insurrection or rebellion. An exception to this limitation might exist where a person possesses an affirmative duty to speak or act. Further, mere abstract advocacy of, or theorizing concerning, the desirability of insurrection or rebellion, without more, is not the same as actually engaging in it. We think this is true even though the First Amendment does not formally constrain Section Three: it is simply the best understanding of Section Three's terms.

Then there is the related question of what constitutes having given "aid or comfort" to "the enemies thereof." This reads as a separate, independent ground for disqualification: Section Three is triggered by having engaged in insurrection or rebellion "or" having given aid or comfort to enemies. This language, of course, closely echoes the earlier constitutional language of the Treason Clause.[235]

In many cases, giving "aid or comfort" to enemies will be similar to the kind of conduct that counts as having "engaged in" insurrection or rebellion through intentional, active assistance. If there is a difference, it is that the term "aid or comfort" reinforces and emphasizes Section Three's coverage of indirect but material assistance. Such material assistance—possibly including expression supporting, encouraging, counseling, or promoting the enemy—might more naturally fall into Section [234] This working definition of having "engaged in" wrongful activity resembles familiar common law understandings of accomplice liability in the area of criminal law, which typically resulted from the combination of (1) assistance to unlawful conduct (with "assistance" including uttering words of encouragement to, or agreeing not to interfere with, such conduct) and (2) the intention to further such unlawful conduct). Federal criminal law today is to similar effect. 18 U.S.C. § 2(a) (2012) ("Whoever commits an offense against the United States or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces or procures its commission, is punishable as a principal."). We think it is also generally supported by background mens rea principles. See William Baude & Stephen Sachs, The Law of Interpretation, 130 Harv. L. Rev. 1079, 1108 (2017). That said, the context of the Civil War also suggests one important limitation: there is no mistake-of-rebellion defense. See text accompanying infra note 425.

---

[235] U.S. Const. art. III, § 3, cl. 1 ("Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.")

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Three's "aid or comfort" language, even where it might be debatable whether to characterize such conduct as directly "engag[ing] in" insurrection or rebellion.

Additionally, while Section Three uses some language paralleling that contained in the Treason Clause, Section Three is by no means limited to the constitutional crime of treason. "Insurrection" and "rebellion" are their own things, distinct from "treason." While some acts of insurrection and rebellion might also constitute treason they need not do so in order to be encompassed within Section Three. So even if "aid or comfort" in Section Three connotes the same type of assistance-and-embrace principles as "Aid and Comfort" in Article III's Treason Clause,[236] the relevant conduct to which such assistance is given might well differ. (And, as noted earlier, it is plain that Section Three requires no prior criminal-law conviction, for treason or any other defined crime, as a prerequisite for its disqualification to apply.)

Finally, aid or comfort to whom? "[T]he enemies thereof." Before the Civil War, some might have limited the term "enemies" to those owing allegiance to a foreign power,[237] but that is not plausibly true of Section Three. Rather, Section Three covers enemies both foreign and domestic. That now-familiar phrase ("enemies foreign and domestic") comes from the "Ironclad Oath," written into law in 1862, in the midst of the Civil War,[238] and it seems clear from the political context of Section Three that it likewise treats domestic enemies as enemies. Indeed, it is almost unthinkable that Confederate rebels would not have been thought "enemies" in the sense employed by the text.

What is less clear is how to define the foreign and domestic enemies covered by Section Three. The most straightforward option, which strikes us as the more likely one, is that "enemies" essentially cross-references the domestic rebels and insurrectionists just described earlier in the sentence (as well as more traditional foreign enemies, of course). On this straightforward reading, Section Three would cover a domestic officeholder who directly engages in insurrection or rebellion, or who gives aid or comfort to others who do so (or, of course, one who gives aid or comfort to foreign enemies). This straightforward reading is also consistent with the operation of another 1862 statute, the Second Confiscation Act.[239] That said, we cannot rule out another narrower possibility, that "enemies" is limited to those with whom the US are effectively at war, and thus excludes insurrections and rebellions that do not rise to the level of a civil war.[240] This would create a more complicated two-track system [236] See infra note 258.

---

[237] See Lynch, supra note 5, at 174 (discussing United States v. Greathouse, 26 F. Cas. 18, 22 (C.C.N.D. Cal. 1863) (No. 15,254)).

[238] See infra Part IV.A.4.b.i.

[239] See infra Part IV.A.4.b.ii.

[240] See Lynch, supra note 5, at 173-178 for more discussion.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

where Section Three covers all insurrections and rebellions, as well as "aid or comfort" to a more limited set of insurrections and rebellions. While it strikes us as less likely, we cannot definitively rule it out.[241]

Our sense of the whole—of Section Three's substantive terms triggering disqualification for those who have engaged in the conduct described—is that Section Three is quite sweeping, using overlapping terms to cover several different characterizations of major collective resistance to the authority of government under the Constitution. Whether it be called "insurrection" or "rebellion"; and whether a covered individual is thought to have "engaged in" such activity or given "aid or comfort" to "enemies," Section Three's disqualification is triggered. The language is not unlimited, to be sure. But the broad and overlapping terms are not intended to be hospitable to loopholes or artful, narrow, technical evasions.

Finally, let us reiterate one consequence of Section Three's breadth and capaciousness. Because Section Three's terms possess a range of meaning, both a determinate core and a fuzzier periphery, we need a second-order rule concerning the authority of decisionmakers to act on the basis of fair interpretations of indefinite terms. We think that the general rule of our constitutional order is that political officials may take actions premised on fair interpretations of indefinite terms, and that when they do so, their actions cannot rightly be held "unconstitutional" by the courts, precisely because they fit within the fair range afforded by the Constitution. Where the Constitution admits of a range of choice, political authorities may exercise choices within that range.

This is foundational to our constitutional law.[242] It is the premise of judicial review as set forth in Marbury v. Madison, which justifies setting aside the acts of [241] What is the referent of "enemies thereof"? Does "thereof" refer to enemies of the United States or enemies of the Constitution of the United States? We think this replicates the question of what "the same" refers to, earlier in the sentence, and presents the same issue of minor and seemingly inconsequential ambiguity. (Does "insurrection or rebellion against the same" refer to insurrection or rebellion against "the United States"?) On balance, we think that it probably makes little practical difference: rebellion against the United States and rebellion against the Constitution of the United States will often amount to the same thing; either one is capable of being considered an instance of the other. Whatever the answer, it should be the same for both—"against the same" and "thereof" refer to the same thing. Our best guess is that it is "the United States."

---

[242] See, e.g., Paulsen, Rules for Its Own, supra note 9, at 858 (arguing that where constitutional language states a general principle, "actions of government that fall within the scope of judgment or discretion admitted by the breadth with which that principle is expressed do not violate the Constitution, and are thus allowable"); Michael Stokes Paulsen, A Government of Adequate Powers, 31 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 991, 995 (2008) (arguing that "textual imprecision or generality often admits of a range of choices" and that the correct constitutional answer in such circumstances "is that the legislature must be permitted to choose from options within that range"; thus, "the more indeterminate or under-determinate the range of a constitutional provision, the broader the duty of the courts to defer to what the legislature has enacted"); Kesavan & Paulsen, Secret Drafting History, supra note 9, at 1129-30 n.54 (2003); Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Most Dangerous Branch: Executive Power to Say What the Law other branches only because, and only to the extent to, they deviate from the Constitution's meaning. It is classically illustrated by the Court's reasoning in M'Culloch v. Maryland,[243] which upheld Congress's power to create the Bank of the United States because a generation of political actors had acted within the fair range of meaning of constitutionally granted powers.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And this principle means, as a practical matter, that the breadth of Section Three's broad terms cannot be ignored, or artificially limited, by judicial construction. Where those charged with responsibilities that involve applying Section Three's terms have given that language its full legitimate sweep, that breadth must be honored.

We now canvass—perhaps too briefly and yet at too great a length—some of the evidence supporting these working definitions.

2. Contemporaneous Dictionary Definitions

As we have said, the task of ascertaining true constitutional meaning consists of seeking out the objective, original meaning of the words and phrases of the text: that is, the meaning Section Three's terms and structure would have had in the legal system at the time. A starting point for such an inquiry—though not the ending point—is to look at contemporaneous dictionary definitions. (We think that evidence of contemporaneous political and legal usage of words and phrases contained in the constitutional text is actually quite often stronger evidence of original, objective linguistic meaning: it can serve as a kind of operational, practical concordance that may "define" terms more precisely in their application than can a cold dictionary definition.)

Nineteenth century dictionaries contain definitions of "insurrection" and "rebellion" that substantially corroborate our working definitions. Webster defined "insurrection" as "[a] rising against civil or political authority; the open and active opposition of a number of persons to the execution of law in a city or state."[244] Rebellion was "[a]n open and avowed renunciation of the authority of the government to which one owes allegiance."[245]

Is, 83 Geo. L.J. 217, 333 (1994); Baude & Sachs, Law of Interpretation, supra note 234, at 1120 (describing "the presumption of constitutionality" as a rule of unwritten law); William Baude, Constitutional Liquidation, 71 Stan. L. Rev. 1, 35-36, 44 (2019). Again, we bracket any differences in emphasis between our respective views of the adjudication of ambiguities.

[243] 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819),

[244] 1 Noah Webster, American Dictionary of the English Language 111 (1828, photoreprint 1993) ("Insurrection"); see also Dr. Webster's Complete Dictionary of the English Language 702 (Chauncy A. Goodrich and Noah Porter, eds. 1864) (similar); 1 John Boag, A Popular and Complete English Dictionary 727 (1850) (similar).

[245] 2 Webster (1828), supra note 244, at 51 ("Rebellion"); see also Webster's (Porter 1864), supra note 244, at 1094 (similar); 2 Boag, supra note 244, at 319 (similar).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Importantly, Webster also noted several distinctions between these and other terms. In defining rebellion, he distinguished an insurrection as "a rising in opposition to a particular act or law, without a design to renounce wholly all subjection to the government," while a rebellion was a more categorical "attempt to overthrow the government, to establish a different one or to place the country under another jurisdiction."[246] And in defining insurrection, Webster noted that insurrection is "equivalent to sedition, except that sedition expresses a less extensive rising of citizens."[247] This suggests a spectrum from sedition (not covered by Section Three) to insurrection to rebellion (both covered).

At the same time, Webster also conceded some overlap in these terms, writing that "[i]nsurrection may be, but is not necessarily, rebellion"[248] and that despite these technical distinctions, "[i]nsurrection is however used with latitude as to comprehend either sedition or rebellion."[249] This suggests a great deal of potential breadth and overlap in these terms.

Along similar lines, a prominent mid-century legal dictionary, John Bouvier's Law Dictionary in its 1868 edition, contains detailed definitions of insurrection, rebellion, and aid and comfort. "INSURRECTION" was defined simply as "[a] rebellion of citizens or subjects of a country against its government."[250] "REBELLION" is correspondingly defined: "The taking up arms traitorously against the government. The forcible opposition and resistance to the laws and process lawfully issued."[251] Bouvier's thus treated "insurrection" and "rebellion" as nearly interchangeable terms, both involving some degree of concerted and forcible opposition to the authority of the lawfully constituted government but not clearly distinguishing between them.[252] [246] 2 Webster (1828), supra note 244, at 51 ("Rebellion"); see also 1 Boag, supra note 244, at 727; 2 id. at 319 (similar).

---

[247] 1 Webster (1828), supra note 244, at 111 ("Insurrection"). For comparison, Webster defined "Sedition" as: "A factious commotion of the people, or a tumultuous assembly of men rising in opposition to law or the administration of justice, and in disturbance of the public peace. Sedition is a rising or commotion of less extent than an insurrection, and both are less than rebellion . . ." 2 Webster (1828), supra note 244, at 66 ("Sedition").

[248] 2 Webster (1828), supra note 244, at 51 ("Rebellion"); see also 2 Boag, supra note 244, at 319 (similar).

[249] 1 Webster (1828), supra note 244, at 111. Daniel Hemel argues that "Webster's definition of 'insurrection' seems implausibly broad for Section 3 purposes." See Hemel, How-to Guide, supra note 5.

[250] "Insurrection" in 1 John Bouvier. A Law Dictionary, Adapted to the Constitution and Laws of the United States of America, and of the Several States of the American Union 729-730 (Philadelphia, G.W. Childs, 12th ed., rev. and enl. 1868).

[251] "Rebellion" in 2 Bouvier (1868), supra note 250, at 415 (emphasis added).

[252] See also Joseph Worcester, A Dictionary of the English Language 764, 1190 (1860) (generally equating insurrection and rebellion). Elsewhere in this edition, Bouvier drew a distinction in connotation between "REBEL" and "INSURGENT," suggesting that "rebel is always understood in a bad sense, as one who unjustly opposes the constituted authorities; insurgent may be one who justly opposes the

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Bouvier's dictionary also offers an instructive definition of "AID AND COMFORT" as "[h]elp, support, assistance, counsel, encouragement." The entry adds this discussion, noting the lack of U.S. judicial interpretation at the time but a generally accepted English background understanding of the term:

> The constitution of the United States, art. 3, s. 3, declares that adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort, shall be treason. These words, as they are to be understood in the constitution, have not received a full judicial discussion. They import, however, help, support, assistance, countenance, encouragement. The word aid, which occurs in the stat. Westm. 1, c.14, is explained by Lord Coke (2 Inst. 182) as comprehending all persons counselling, abetting, plotting, assenting, consenting, and encouraging to do the act ...[253]

This tends to confirm our broad construction of "aid or comfort" as encompassing many kinds of intentional support, akin to the common law.

3. Intratextualism

In some cases, the Constitution can also serve as its own internal dictionary. The meaning of a constitutional term in one part of the document can inform its meaning in another, either because of the complete (or near) copying of one constitutional text by another or by virtue of subtle contrast, refinement, or qualification in a term's usage. (Professor Akhil Amar has dubbed this method of interpretation "Intratextualism.")[254] Chief Justice Marshall, for example, famously employed this method in M'Culloch v. Maryland as part of his argument for the constitutionality of Congress's chartering of a Bank of the United States.[255] tyranny of constitute authorities," and thus that "[t]he colonists who opposed the tyranny of the English government were insurgents, not rebels." "Insurgent" and "Rebel" in 1 Bouvier (1868), supra note 250, at 729; 2 id. at 415.

---

In a much later edition, Bouvier's drew a distinction between insurrection and rebellion as two different varieties of "actual and open resistance to [government] authority." Insurrection was "an actual uprising against the government" while rebellion "goes beyond insurrection in aim" and attempts actually to overthrow the government authority in question. "Insurrection" and "Rebellion," in 2 Bouvier's Law Dictionary & Concise Encycl. (Rawles Rev., 1897). Lynch misstates the date of this edition as 1867, and thus mistakenly cites it as "contemporarily authoritative." Lynch, supra note 5, at 167 n. 80.

[253] "Aid and Comfort" in 1 Bouvier (1868), supra note 250, at 107.

[254] Akhil Reed Amar, Intratextualism, 112 Harv. L. Rev. 747, 748 (1999).

[255] M'Culloch, 17 U.S. at 413-414. In construing the scope of the legislative power conferred by the Necessary and Proper Clause, Marshall noted how the word "necessary" was used differently, and subjected to different qualifications, in other parts of the Constitution and found that those differences were useful in interpreting the clause at hand. For discussion of the prominence of intratextual and structural-logic, whole-text arguments in some of Chief Justice Marshall's most significant Supreme Court opinions, including Marbury and M'Culloch, see Paulsen, Marbury, supra note 66, at 2711; see also Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Plausibility of Personhood, 74 Ohio St. L. J. 13, 33 n. 72 (2013).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Might the Constitution's other usages of terms that also appear in Section Three serve as such markers of meaning for "insurrection" and "rebellion," and "aid or comfort" to enemies, as those terms are used in Section Three? A quick canvass suggests only limited help.

The word "insurrection" appears in the Militia Clause of Article I, Section 8 of the original Constitution: Congress is given the enumerated power to "provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions."[256] The word "rebellion" appears in the Writ Suspension Clause of Article I, Section 9: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or invasion the public Safety may require it."[257] In neither instance, however, does the context suggest any particular definition or explication of the term. They are thus of little direct assistance to the task of unpacking the meaning of Section Three.

As noted, the language in Section Three's alternative trigger—the giving of "aid and comfort" to enemies—borrows the nearly identical language of the Treason Clause of Article III. But once again, the similar language in Article III is not self-defining. Nor was there an established, settled, authoritative judicial interpretation of this language that might have been understood specifically to define "aid and comfort" as a constitutional term-of-art at the time of the framing of the Fourteenth Amendment.[258] Moreover, in the 1860s, the pairing of "aid" and/or "comfort" had be-

---

[256] U.S. Const. art. I, §8 cl. 15.

[257] U.S. Const. art. I, §9 cl. 2.

[258] Perhaps the most notable U.S. treason case to date was Ex parte Bollman, in which Chief Justice Marshall delivered an opinion for the Court granting habeas to two of the co-conspirators in Aaron Burr's plot to seize Spanish territory in the American (then-)southwest and attempt to form his own independent nation. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75 (1807). The opinion combined a relatively narrow construction of the substantive crime of treason (in part because of Article III's text ("only in levying war") with a relatively broad construction of complicity. Thus on one hand: "However flagitious may be the crime of conspiring to subvert by force the government of our country, such conspiracy is not treason," id. at 126, but on the other hand, "if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." Id. Ex parte Bollman was an early and prominent legal landmark supporting some key propositions that would have been familiar to lawyers during the Civil War era: first, that there are such things as conspiracies and plots to "overturn the government," in whole or in part, that though they might not qualify as treason, remain great and culpable legal wrongs; second, that the crime of treason specifically requires showing the existence of an armed assembly to employ force for a treasonable purpose; third, that one may be said to have engaged in (or provided "aid and comfort" to) treason where one is in league with the conspiracy and done any act, large or small, or played "any part," however remote, to further that plot. Whether or not Bollman's construction was sufficiently established to be read in to Section Three itself, it was cited occasionally in the 1860s Congress. See, e.g., 37th Congress 2nd Session Cong. Globe 414 (1862)

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

come ubiquitous in legal and public discourse as a general allegation of improper assistance, making it still less clear that it was perfectly coterminous with the law of the Treason Clause.[259]

Finally, the words "insurrection" and "rebellion" also appear elsewhere in the Fourteenth Amendment itself, but again in ways that give little external light on Section Three. A person's "participation in rebellion" is specified in Section Two as an allowable ground for denying the right to vote that does not trigger a reduction in a state's representation as a consequence.[260] Section Four of the amendment prohibits payment of debts or obligations "incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion."[261] These neighboring sections use slightly different phrases for the behavior they cover ("participation" and "engaged in"; "aid or comfort" and "in aid of"), but it is difficult to say if the variations are meaningful.

4. Contemporaneous Public, Political, Legal Usage

Perhaps the best evidence of the public meaning of the terms "insurrection," "rebellion," and "engaging in," as they came to be used in Section Three, consists of their common and frequent public, political, and legal usage in the 1860s—the years immediately surrounding the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment—by a variety of actors: by President Abraham Lincoln, in prominent speeches, messages, public letters, and proclamations; by Congress, in major acts of legislation; and by the Supreme Court, in the landmark decision in The Prize Cases. The consistent pattern of usage was to treat the actions of the South as being, legally, "insurrection" or "rebellion." A wide range of actions supportive of secession appears to have constituted "engaging in" or giving "aid or comfort" to rebellion or insurrection.

This leads us to what we think an obvious "sure shipwreck"[262] for understanding Section Three's terms. Whatever else "insurrection or rebellion" might embrace, they certainly embrace the cluster of actions with which Section Three was, historically, immediately and directly concerned: first, the attempted secession from the authority of the U.S. Constitution—the effort to displace the lawful authority of the United States in favor of the supposedly "seceded" state governments and their confederation into the "Confederate States of America"; and second, engaging in forcible resistance to the authority of the United States to execute the laws of the United States—armed resistance to the Constitution, specifically in the shape of waging civil war against the nation. Conduct participating in, advancing, supporting, or assisting

---

(statement of Sen. Sumner) (citing Bollman passage quoted above during the proceedings to expel Senator Jesse Bright for writing a letter to Jefferson Davis).

[259] See Harold Holzer, Lincoln and the Power of the Press: The War for Public Opinion 361 (2014) (referring to the phrase "aid and comfort to the enemy" (by the press) as "that catch-basin phrase again.").

[260] U.S. Const. amdt. XIV, sec. 2.

[261] U.S. Const. amdt. XIV, sec. 4.

[262] Morse, supra note 227.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

either secession or armed resistance to U.S. authority constituted "engaging in" or giving "aid or comfort to" the Union's enemies. Section Three encompasses all such actions in support of secession and civil war as included within its substantive trigger.

a. President Lincoln

An extremely important contemporaneous source for understanding the public constitutional meaning of "insurrection" and "rebellion" in 1860s public discourse is President Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln looms large in the public understanding of the day concerning the meaning of those terms. Lincoln consistently characterized secession and the Civil War as acts of insurrection or rebellion, avoiding wherever possible treating "secession" as if it were a separate legal category. Secession, for Lincoln, was a Southern euphemism for rebellion and treason. The Confederacy had no valid legal existence: what was going on with the Civil War was properly called insurrection and rebellion—the lawless attempt to overthrow the constitutional processes of the United States and displace lawful government with unlawful governments.

Lincoln was insistent and relentless—and very public and prominent—on this point, consistently so, across a range of contexts. For instance, the Civil War was emphatically not, in Lincoln's view, a "war" between the United States and another sovereign.[263] It was not subject to Congress's Article I, section 8, clause 11 power to "declare War," but was rather an illegal rebellion—a "giant insurrection"—to be suppressed by executive authority pursuant to Congress's Article I, section 8, clause 15 power to "provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions."[264]

Consider just a few prominent and illustrative statements: In his First Inaugural Address, on March 4, 1861, Lincoln, after setting forth arguments that "no State upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union," concluded that "acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States" are "insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances."[265] Following the attack on Fort Sumter, Lincoln's April 15, 1861 proclamation calling forth the militia

---

[263] On Lincoln's understanding of secession as unconstitutional and his resulting conception of the Civil War as, legally, a situation of insurrection or rebellion (not declared war) see sources cited in note 231. That does not exclude the existence of full constitutional Commander in Chief Clause powers in the situation of actual civil war, however. Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Emancipation Proclamation and the Commander in Chief Power, 40 Georgia L. Rev. 807, 814-823 (2006).

[264] Compare U.S. Const. art. I, §8, cl. 11 (Declare War Clause) with U.S. Const. art. I, §8, cl. 15 (power "to provide for calling forth" the Militia for law execution and to suppress insurrections"). Congress's exercise of this power – the Insurrection Acts of 1795 and 1807 – is discussed infra Part IV.A.5.a.

[265] Abraham Lincoln, First Inaugural Address (March 4, 1861), IV Complete Works of Lincoln ("CWL") 262, 265.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

similarly characterized the attack as fitting the statutory definition of insurrection.[266] And in his July 4, 1861 Message to Congress, Lincoln labelled the South's purported secession a "giant insurrection" and, vividly, as "rebellion ... sugar coated." The "so-called 'Confederate States'" had formed an "insurrectionary government."[267] In the same July 4 Message, Lincoln used the nature of secession as rebellion to justify suspension of the writ of habeas corpus as authorized by the terms of Article I, section 9, clause 2 of the Constitution, which used exactly that language of "rebellion."[268] Lincoln's use of terms was significant and pulled no punches: efforts to displace lawful government authority with unlawful government—no matter how labelled by their perpetrators, no matter how deluded participants might be as to the lawfulness or propriety of their actions—were insurrectionary; such declarations and actions constituted rebellion.

Two years later, at the height of the war, Lincoln returned to the characterization of the South's actions as "rebellion" (and the constitutional question of power to suspend habeas corpus) in a notable incident testing the limit of Union military suppression of anti-war and disloyal speech. In a June 12, 1863 public letter, nominally addressed to Erastus Corning, Lincoln defended the military arrest of former Ohio Congressman Clement Vallandigham, a notorious racist and prominent "Copperhead" pro-South, anti-Union northerner, who had made a public speech vehemently condemning the Emancipation Proclamation and the propriety of the Union's war effort.

Lincoln distinguished law enforcement arrests from detentions in cases of rebellion. Wrote Lincoln: "Ours is a case of Rebellion—so called by the resolutions before me—in fact, a clear, flagrant, and gigantic case of Rebellion." And that, Lincoln concluded, was what allowed suspension of habeas corpus.[269] In the course of his argument, Lincoln described rebellion as "sudden and extensive uprisings against the government."[270] This is a useful description that supports our working definition: Rebellion is an "uprising." It is something more than mere protest. It is, often, "sudden." It is "extensive." It is directed "against the government." Rebellion is something more than ordinary law violation and that is why it is treated differently by the Constitution.

How did Vallandigham's actions associate him with the rebellion? Lincoln made a forceful case that even pure speech might constitute assistance to rebellion—if it were advocacy producing direct, material effects benefitting the rebel enemy

---

[266] Abraham Lincoln, Proclamation Calling Militia and Convening Congress (April 15, 1861), IV CWL 331, 332.
[267] Abraham Lincoln, Message to Congress in Special Session (July 4, 1861), IV CWL 421, 427-428, 432-437.
[268] Id. at 429-431 (emphasis added).
[269] U.S. Const. art. I, §9, cl. 2.
[270] Abraham Lincoln, To Erastus Corning and Others (June 12, 1863), VI CWL 260, 264 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

cause, by tangibly harming the military authority engaged in trying to suppress that rebellion. In the Corning Letter, Lincoln wrote that, "under cover of 'Liberty of speech,' 'Liberty of the press,' and 'Habeas corpus,'" rebel sympathizers "hoped to keep on foot amongst us a most efficient corps of spies, informers, supplyers, and aiders and abettors of their cause in a thousand ways."[271] Claims of freedom of speech could improperly furnish a shield or cloak for wrongful conduct; they supplied "cover" for, and thus assisted, rebellion and insurrection.

Lincoln expanded these arguments in yet more arresting ways. He suggested that, in some circumstances, a person's refusal to speak out against rebellion might be tacit support for such rebellion: a "man who stands by and says nothing, when the peril of his government is discussed, can not be misunderstood. If not hindered, he is sure to help the enemy." He also hinted at regret that he had not earlier arrested prominent oath-breaking officers now "occupying the very highest places in the rebel war service," such as John Breckinridge, Robert E. Lee, Joseph Johnston, and John Magruder: "I think the time not unlikely to come when I shall be blamed for having made too few arrests rather than too many."[272] Lincoln's position seems clear, if perhaps a bit unsettling: claims of freedom of speech did not invariably prevail over the imperative constitutional necessity of suppressing rebellion; where words fueled insurrection, or thwarted its suppression, or signaled disloyalty, the speaker was aiding the enemy. Such expression was not necessarily privileged.

This is not exactly an expansive conception of First Amendment rights. Lincoln fully recognized the difficulties with his stance. He did not ignore the tension between his conclusions and peacetime free speech principles but argued that the tension could be reconciled.[273] In a colorful metaphor, Lincoln ventured:

> I can no more be persuaded that the Government can constitutionally take no strong measures in time of rebellion, because it can be shown that the same could not be lawfully taken in time of peace, than I can be persuaded that a particular drug is not good medicine for a sick man, because it can be shown not to be good food for a well one. Nor am I able to appreciate the danger apprehended by the meeting that the American people will, by means of military arrests during the Rebellion, lose the [273] In several respects, Lincoln anticipated later judicial free speech doctrines and decisions, such as those distinguishing pure speech from speech linked to prohibited conduct; recognizing limits on speech posing a danger of inciting to crime or lawlessness; recognizing "compelling interest" overrides in exceptional circumstances, including for reasons of national security or military secrecy; finding that government's motives and purposes for a particular action may matter to its lawfulness; and noting where an incidental limitation on expression leaves open alternative channels for expression of the same message. See Paulsen, Civil War, supra note 231, at 698-702 & n.23 (noting how Lincoln anticipated many of the issues and exceptions contemplated by later judicial doctrine concerning the First Amendment's freedom of speech).

---

[271] Id. at 263.

[272] Id. at 265.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> right of Public Discussion, the Liberty of Speech and the Press, the Law of Evidence, Trial by Jury, and Habeas Corpus, throughout the indefinite peaceful future, which I trust lies before them, any more than I am able to believe that a man could contract so strong an appetite for emetics during temporary illness as to persist in feeding upon them during the remainder of his healthful life.[274]

Lincoln also stressed a distinction between speech directed at criticism of the government's political policy—fully protected by the freedom of speech—and expression more or less directly aimed at harming the military's recruitment and war effort. If Vallandigham had been arrested merely because he was "damaging the political prospects of the administration" or "the personal interests of the general," that would be one thing, Lincoln observed. "[I]f there was no other reason for the arrest, then I concede that the arrest was wrong." But as Lincoln understood it, the arrest "was made for a very different reason"—that Vallandigham was "laboring, with some effect, to prevent the raising of troops, to encourage desertions from the army, and to leave the rebellion without an adequate military force to suppress it." Vallandigham was, in short, "warring upon the military." He who "dissuades one man from volunteering, or induces one soldier to desert, weakens the Union cause as much as he who kills a union soldier in battle." Desertion was punishable by death, of course. In a famous line, Lincoln asked, rhetorically "Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wiley agitator who induces him to desert?"[275] Lincoln's answer was no: "I think that in such a case, to silence the agitator, and save the boy, is not only constitutional, but, withal a great mercy." [276]

Lincoln continued: "If I be wrong on this question of constitutional power," he added, "my error lies in believing that certain proceedings are constitutional when, in cases of rebellion or Invasion, the public Safety requires them, which would not be constitutional when, in absence of rebellion or invasion, the public Safety does not require them -- in other words, that the constitution is not in it's application in all respects the same, in cases of Rebellion or invasion, involving the public Safety, as it is in times of profound peace and public security."[277]

Lincoln thus embraced the view that material assistance to insurrection or rebellion could in some cases take the form of effective advocacy of unlawful conduct that, if engaged in by substantial numbers, would materially advance the rebel cause or harm the military prospects of the Union. The fact that such assistance to rebellion came in the form of words did not furnish any constitutional privilege to such action.

---

[274] Letter to Corning (June 12, 1863), VI CWL at 267. (Emetics referred to a medicine or substance used to induce vomiting.)
[275] Letter to Corning, VI CWL at 266.
[276] Id. at 266-67.
[277] Id. at 267.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Where rebellion threatens public safety or public security, the Constitution permits restriction on advocacy furthering, supporting, or assisting such rebellion.

To be sure, one might well conclude that Lincoln went too far in his arguments in the Corning Letter or in some of his actions during the war. That is an interesting and difficult question—and not our point here. Our point is that Lincoln's view was a prominently expressed contemporaneous understanding—and on the issues of insurrection, rebellion, and complicity, it was consistent with his longstanding and oft-repeated views. This does not directly answer the question whether or to what extent such thinking specifically informed general public understanding of Section Three. But Lincoln's thinking, articulated in such a public context, may well have informed the potential reach of the terms "insurrection or rebellion," and what constitutes engaging in or aiding such conduct, as those terms came to be employed in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.

At all events, Lincoln made clear and prominent the position that declaring secession, engaging in forcible opposition to the constitutional authority of the Union, and materially assisting others in such conduct, all constituted forms of support for and participation in "insurrection" or "rebellion." And this stance continued throughout the war, even as the nation began to look to the war's conclusion and to questions of the post-war status of persons who had participated in that rebellion—questions at the core of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.[278]

b. Congress

President Lincoln was not the only public figure grappling with concepts of insurrection and rebellion during the Civil War. Similar themes can be found in the statements and actions of Congress and the Supreme Court.

Start with Congress: We think two specific enactments of Congress during the Civil War are especially probative of the understandings of "insurrection" and "rebellion" and of what conduct was publicly understood to constitute having "engaged in" or given assistance to rebellion. First, there is the so-called "Ironclad Oath," adopted

[278] Lincoln's characterization of Southern secession as rebellion continued throughout the war. His December 8, 1863 Message to Congress referred to the Confederacy as "the rebellion." Annual Message to Congress (Dec. 8, 1863), VII CWL at 51 In his accompanying offer of amnesty and pardon, in the Amnesty Proclamation of December 8, 1863, Lincoln referred, repeatedly, to the "rebellion" that "now exists whereby the loyal State governments of several States have for a long time been subverted" (id. at 53), to "said rebellion and treason" (id. at 54), to "said rebellion" (id.) and to persons who had provided "aid" to the "rebellion" in various forms. Interestingly, Lincoln excepted from his offer of forgiveness – in language that would seem to presage the similar terms of Section Three – "all who have left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion" and "all who resigned commissions in the army or navy in the United States, and afterwards aided the rebellion." Id. at 55. Lincoln also left to the respective houses of Congress the exclusive judgment "whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats."

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

on July 2, 1862 as the oath one must be able to swear in order to hold federal office.[279] Second, there is the "Second Confiscation Act," adopted that same month, on July 17, 1862, to authorize legal forfeitures of property and slaves, and also to enforce disqualifications from federal office, by persons who had engaged in specified activities constituting "rebellion" or "insurrection."[280] These two enactments, and their implementation to exclude former insurrectionists and rebels from future office, say much about the terms they employed.

i. The Ironclad Oath

Congress adopted The Ironclad Oath in the thick of the Civil War and it was required of most federal officeholders from 1862 to 1884.[281] The text of the Oath sets forth the types of misconduct regarded as disqualifying an individual from eligibility for federal office because he had been engaged in supporting the rebellion—an inquiry very closely parallel to that contained in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, proposed by Congress just a few years later.

The Ironclad Oath required that prospective officeholders swear or affirm that they had not done any of several things. In that sense it did not function like a traditional oath of office—a promise of future behavior—but much more like a disqualification for past misbehavior.[282] It did indirectly what Section Three was soon to do directly. That makes the Ironclad Oath's list of never-have-I-evers particularly instructive. Here's the oath, with its most-relevant-to-Section-Three features and phrases italicized (and with bracketed numbers inserted):

> I . . . do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never [1] voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have [2] voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have [3] neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have [4] not yielded a

---

[279] 12 Stat. 502.

[280] 12 Stat. 589 (1862). 12 Stat. 627 (1862).

[281] 23 Stat. 21 (1884). There was an important exception. In 1868, Congress provided that anybody who had received amnesty from two-thirds of each house of Congress under Section Three was exempt from the Ironclad Oath and need only swear future loyalty, 15 Stat. 85 (1868), and in 1871 it added that anybody "who is not rendered ineligible to office by the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution" yet would otherwise "not be able on account of his participation in the late rebellion to take" the Ironclad Oath, could take the forward-looking oath instead, 16 Stat. 412 (1871). These two provisions effectively equated the Ironclad Oath to Section Three from 1871 on.

[282] For this reason, Lincoln famously wrote: "On principle I dislike an oath which requires a man to swear he has not done wrong. It rejects the Christian principle of forgiveness on terms of repentance. I think it is enough if the man does no wrong hereafter." Endorsement of Abraham Lincoln in Letter from R.M. Edwards to Edwin Stanton, February 5, 1864, 7 Lincoln Papers 169.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto.

While not using the words insurrection or rebellion, the Ironclad Oath's list of never-have-I-evers would seem strongly suggestive of how Section Three's triggering language likely would have been understood in public usage at the time. The Ironclad Oath is not a definition of Section Three's constitutional terms, of course. But it would appear an apt descriptive specification of the kinds of misconduct included within those terms. Under the oath, disqualifying behavior included: (1) fighting against the United States; (2) aiding or encouraging such armed hostility; (3) accepting office under a hostile authority (or "pretended authority"); and—a highly evocative phrase—(4) "yield[ing]" one's "voluntary support" to "any pretended government, authority, power or constitution . . . hostile or inimical" to the United States.

The content of this oath's requirement establishes a useful, historically prominent marker for the scope of Section Three: What the Ironclad Oath understood to be disqualifying for federal office, Section Three likely embraced as constitutionally disqualifying conduct for the far broader sweep of offices to which it extended.[283]

ii. The Second Confiscation Act

Barely more than two weeks after adopting the Ironclad Oath, the Civil War Congress enacted what is popularly called the "Second Confiscation Act." Its full title spoke explicitly in terms of insurrection and rebellion: "An Act to suppress Insurrection, to punish Treason and Rebellion, to seize and confiscate the Property of Rebels, and for other Purposes."[284]

This Second Confiscation Act was a very prominent piece of legislation. It imposed sweeping penalties, forfeitures, and disqualifications on anybody who had engaged in or assisted the rebellion.[285] The Second Confiscation Act was long and vigorously debated in Congress, much discussed in the press and in public discourse, objected to by many on constitutional grounds, and nearly vetoed by President Lincoln.[286] Enactment of the Second Confiscation Act gave rise to very public pressure

---

[283] The extensive overlap between the meaning of the Ironclad Oath and the Section Three disqualification is confirmed by Congress's own interpretation and application of the oath to its own members, during and after the enactment of Section Three. These applications are detailed infra Part IV.A.5.b.

[284] 12 Stat. 589 (1862). See also 12 Stat. 627 (1862) ("explanatory" joint resolution).

[285] An earlier act had provided for forfeiture more specifically of property or slaves actually used in service of rebellion. 12 Stat. 319 (Aug. 6, 1861).

[286] See generally David P. Currie, The Civil War Congress, 73 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1131, 1185-1195 (2006). Among many noteworthy twists and turns in the road to enactment, President Lincoln came close to vetoing the bill, preparing a veto message with his objections and signing the bill only after Congress passed an "explanatory" joint resolution (which Lincoln signed together with the bill). Lincoln nonetheless appended his original draft veto message setting forth his objections. For discussion of the constitutional objections of Lincoln and others to various aspects of the bill, and his unusual course of

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

on President Lincoln to take aggressive action against slavery in rebel states—pressure that helped spur Lincoln to issue his Emancipation Proclamation as an executive military order. The Second Confiscation Act was a big deal. [287]

The Act itself was a complicated and somewhat confusing hodgepodge of distinct provisions, combining property confiscation, emancipation, a new federal crime, and disqualification from office. But the terms it used are especially evocative, visiting legal consequences on persons who "engaged in," "incite[d]," "set on foot," or "assist[ed]" "rebellion" or "insurrection" or who had "given aid or comfort" to rebellion or done acts "aiding and abetting" rebellion. The Act is practically a glossary of the terms used in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment proposed by Congress just four years later.

Specifically: Section 2 made it a new crime, distinct from treason, to "incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof" or to "give aid or comfort thereto" or to "engage in, or give aid and comfort to," any "existing rebellion or insurrection."[288] It is worth pausing to parse the linguistic resemblances to Section Three, and the ways in which like terms are used and explained. Following Lincoln, secession and civil war are equated with "rebellion or insurrection." Those terms are described as involving acts "against action in signing it but nonetheless appending his objections, see id. at 1193-1194; Burrus M. Carnahan, Act of Justice: Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation and the Law of War 105-106 (2007) (noting Lincoln's initial concern that the act would violate Article III's limitations on the punishment for treason and the objections of others that the act was a bill of attainder); Eric Foner, The Fiery Trial: Abraham Lincoln and American Slavery 215-217 (2010). For Lincoln's July 17, 1862 message to Congress, detailing his objections, see V Complete Works of Lincoln 328-331.

---

[287] A month after the Act had been adopted, Horace Greeley published a scathing editorial titled "The Prayer of Twenty Millions," in which he demanded that Lincoln "EXECUTE THE LAWS" faithfully with specific reference to the Second Confiscation Act. Greeley condemned Lincoln's "mistaken deference to Rebel Slavery" and his failure to rebuke his generals for having "habitually disregarded" the Confiscation Act. Lincoln replied to Greeley, equally prominently, within days, in a famous public letter dated August 22, 1862, published in a rival newspaper and "widely reprinted," defending his course of action. V Complete Works of Lincoln 388-389; see Holzer, supra note 259, at 400-401. One month later, Lincoln issued his Preliminary Emancipation Proclamation of September 22, 1862, in which he noted and quoted provisions of the Second Confiscation Act (without invoking the statute as actual authority for his proclamation). V Complete Works of Lincoln at 434-435 (stating that "attention is hereby called to" provisions of the act but relying for authority on his powers as executive and military Commander in Chief). See also Foner, Fiery Trial, supra note 286, at 215 (noting that "the Second Confiscation Act embodied a major shift in national policy").

[288] 12 Stat. 589, 590. (emphasis added). Section 2 provided penalties for conviction, which included confiscation of slaves. A modified version of this provision remains a crime today, and continues to incorporate the Confiscation Act's disqualification from federal office, id., as well. 18 U.S.C. §2383 ("Whoever incites, sets on foot, assists, or engages in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or gives aid or comfort thereto, shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both; and shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States."). Needless to say, a prosecution under Section 2383 of Title 18 is neither a prerequisite to nor preclusive of the self-executing application of Section Three of the Constitution.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof" (a formulation closely conforming to our working definitions). Section 2 imposes criminal liability on persons who "incite" such acts; who "set on foot" such acts; who "assist" such acts; who in any other way "engage in" such conduct; or who "give aid and comfort to" such conduct. All of these terms have close parallels in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Section 3 of the Act then imposed a sweeping disqualification from future officeholding—a kind of proto-Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment: "every person guilty of either of the offences described in this act shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States."[289] Section 5 directed the President to seize rebel property belonging to a long list of confederate officers plus anyone in a loyal state who "shall hereafter assist and give aid and comfort to such rebellion."[290] Officeholding in a rebel government or military was per se blameworthy participation; but general giving of assistance or aid or comfort also qualified as participation in rebellion. Section 6 provided a further authorization for seizure of the property of any person not already mentioned who, "being engaged in armed rebellion against the government of the United States, or aiding or abetting such rebellion," and, after sixty days' notice issued by the President, did not "cease to aid, countenance, and abet such rebellion, and return to his allegiance to the United States."[291] Section 7 and Section 8 provided for in rem proceedings against property "found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or who has given aid or comfort thereto," in which case it "shall be condemned as enemies' property."[292] And Section 9 famously emancipated slaves of persons "who shall hereafter be engaged in rebellion" against the Union or who "shall in any way give aid or comfort thereto."[293] Throughout these sections, one can see the recurrent use of terms and concepts, and synonyms for such terms, that would reappear in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment: "engaged in," "rebellion," "aid or comfort," "abet," "countenance," "enemies."

Unlike the Ironclad Oath, the Second Confiscation Act did not give rise to many opportunities for immediate application and further interpretation. In part, this was simply due to the exigencies and realities of Civil War at the time. For example, the civil forfeiture provisions contemplated in rem judicial proceedings against persons in the district where property was located. At the time, such property was often located in areas of rebel control. Often, the federal courts were not even functioning those areas.[294] Similarly, as a practical matter, criminal prosecutions of rebels for [289] 12 Stat. 589, 590.

---

[290] Id. (emphasis added.)
[291] Id. at 591.
[292] Id.
[293] Id.
[294] See McPherson, supra note 231, at 500 (noting confusing aspects of the Second Confiscation Act and the requirement of "in rem proceedings by district courts that were of course not functioning in the rebellious states"); Foner, Fiery Trial, supra note 286, at 215 ("For most property, [the Act] established a cumbersome judicial process that helps to explain why little land was actually seized and sold treason and insurrection had to await Union military success. (And after success came, President Andrew Johnson ultimately pardoned a great many offenders.)[295] The Lincoln administration, focused on other matters, showed little interest in bringing legal actions to enforce the Act's specific policies. The administration, according to one scholar, "chose not to implement the law vigorously."[296] Attorney General Bates "exerted no more than a minimal effort to make the first and second confiscation acts work."[297] And the Act's section authorizing limited military emancipation section was rapidly overtaken—superseded in practical effect—by President Lincoln's far more comprehensive Emancipation Proclamation, issued pursuant to his constitutional Commander in Chief power.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But in some ways the lack of enforcement cases is beside our point here, which concerns the Act's prominence in national discussions and its pervasive use of terms, phrases, and concepts—rebellion, insurrection, engage in, aid or comfort—that would reappear in only slightly different form in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. Like the Ironclad Oath, the Second Confiscation Act employed terminology nearly identical to that employed in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. The usage of the terms in this landmark legislation we think helps explicate the meaning, in public legal context, of the language in the amendment. In the context of 1860s public legal usage, engaging in or giving aid or comfort to rebellion and insurrection extended to a broad range of activity advancing or furthering efforts to unlawfully upend the lawful operation of the U.S. constitutional regime. This strongly supports the conclusion that Section Three's terms can fairly be read quite expansively, as embracing a broad range of conduct directed against the authority of government under the Constitution.

c. The Supreme Court's decision in The Prize Cases

The most important constitutional decision of the U.S. Supreme Court during the Civil War was The Prize Cases.[298] There, the majority upheld the constitutionality of Lincoln's unilateral military order, made very early in the Civil War, imposing a blockade on Southern ports. In a truly landmark decision, the Supreme Court held that the President's war powers (including the power to impose a blockade) were triggered immediately, as soon as the South's rebellion took the form of organized military resistance to the authority of the U.S. government. The President's power to under its provisions."). See also Silvana R. Siddali, From Property to Person: Slavery and the Confiscation Acts, 1861-1862, at 238 (2005) (remarking that "[t]he confiscation bill that finally emerged was neither sweeping nor enforceable" though opining that "if the law had not been hobbled by its own internal inconsistencies, it might have affected the lives and property of a large majority of southerners.").

---

[295] See Eric L. McKitrick, Andrew Johnson and Reconstruction 141-152 (1960).

[296] John Syrett, The Civil War Confiscation Acts: Failing to Reconstruct the South 55 (2005).

[297] Id. at 72; see also James G. Randall, Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln 288-292 (1926) (describing minimal enforcement of the Second Confiscation Act).

[298] 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1863).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

wage civil war against rebel forces derived from his delegated statutory power to employ force to suppress rebellion, the Court held. A congressional declaration of war was neither a prerequisite nor legally appropriate for this type of use of force: "This greatest of civil wars was not gradually developed by popular commotion, tumultuous assemblies, or local unorganized insurrections" but "sprung forth suddenly ... in the full panoply of war. The President was bound to meet it in the shape it presented itself, without waiting for Congress to baptize it with a name."[299]

The Court's decision in The Prize Cases is today regarded as the leading judicial exposition of the Constitution's allocation of war powers. At the time, the case had other hugely consequential implications: the principles set forth in the decision essentially endorsed in advance (but of course without addressing the question directly) Lincoln's constitutional justification for the Emancipation Proclamation, which he had issued earlier that year.[300] The decision of The Prize Cases was a very big deal indeed.

Of special interest for our purposes is the Court's usage and explanation—in a highly prominent legal context—of the terms insurrection and rebellion, and their relationship to war and the war powers of the national government: "Insurrection against a government may or may not culminate in an organized rebellion, but a civil war always begins by insurrection against the lawful authority of the Government," the majority said.[301] A civil war "becomes such by its accidents—the number, power, and organization of the persons who originate and carry it on."[302] Where a rebellion has come to possess certain military characteristics, the "party in rebellion" might come to be treated as a belligerent for law-of-war purposes, even though a domestic rebellion stands on different constitutional legal ground than war with a foreign nation. "It is not the less a civil war, with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an 'insurrection' by one side, and the insurgents be considered as rebels or traitors."[303]

In a nutshell: insurrection or rebellion were forms of active resistance to the lawful authority of the government. An insurrection might be something short of outright rebellion. But an insurrection against government authority sometimes grows into full-on "rebellion." A rebellion, in turn, need not take the form of civil war in order to be a rebellion. But sometimes it does. At all events, rebellion seems its own distinct, more general legal concept of repudiation or attempted overthrow of the lawful constitutional regime by unlawful means.

---

[299] Id. at 668-669; see also Stephen I. Vladeck, Emergency Power and the Militia Acts, 114 Yale L. J. 149, 177-180 (2004).
[300] Paulsen, Emancipation, supra 263, at, 814-823.
[301] 67 U.S. at 666 (emphasis added).
[302] Id. at 666
[303] Id. at 668.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Prize Cases also held that persons engaged in insurrection or rebellion could be treated as "enemies" (as well as traitors) for legal purposes. Further, the war power, such as imposition of a blockade, could lawfully affect the legal property rights of persons engaged in "commerce" that "supplies" rebels or insurrectionists—and could do so irrespective of the supposed loyalties of the property owner. Even "neutral" powers' shipping could be seized when it violated a blockade: "Whether property be liable to capture as 'enemies' property' does not in any manner depend on the personal allegiance of the owner. 'It is the illegal traffic that stamps it as "enemies' property."'"[304]

The Prize Cases' treatment of the concepts of insurrection and rebellion, of who constituted "enemies," and of what actions constituted support for rebellion, would have been very much part of the legal culture of the day and provides important legal background as to how these terms would have been understood at the time of the drafting of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, just a few years later. Insurrection and rebellion involve varying degrees of concerted resistance to "the lawful authority of the Government," with insurrection being the arguably somewhat lesser form and rebellion the somewhat greater. A rebellion or insurrection need not involve acts tantamount to levying war. (War is sometimes a feature of rebellion but does not define it.) The Civil War was an outgrowth of insurrection or rebellion. But the fundamental act of rebellion remains the attempt to displace the lawful authority of government by unlawful means. And those who give material assistance to the enemy may also suffer legal consequences.

We find the overall evidence of prominent 1860s political and legal usage of the same concepts and language as would soon be employed by Section Three—"insurrection," "rebellion," and what it meant to "engage in" or provide "aid or comfort" to enemies—highly probative of Section Three's original public meaning. President Lincoln, repeatedly and insistently; Congress, pointedly and consistently; and the Supreme Court, decisively, used these terms in connection with secession, forcible resistance to the legal authority of the Constitution, and participation to varying degrees in efforts to overthrow, subvert, or undermine the authority of lawful government. These usages were public, prominent, legal, and essentially undisputed within the Union. While the specific circumstances of secession and civil war gave rise to these formulations, they did not define or limit the terms' meanings, which were more [304] Id. at 674 (quoting 3 Wash. C.C.R. 183). That said, the Court also cautioned that " 'enemies' property" was "a technical phrase peculiar to prize courts, and depends upon principles of public policy, as distinguished from the common law." Id. at 674. The point that, in a military context, property could be treated as "enemies' property" irrespective of the allegiance of the owner was important to the lawfulness of the Emancipation Proclamation: even though Lincoln's proclamation purported to free the slaves of all persons in rebel-controlled territory – including slaves held by persons claiming to be loyal to the Union – such "property" constituted a resource assisting or supplying the rebellion and thus could be declared seized, confiscated, and liberated as a matter of the military law of war. See Paulsen, Emancipation, supra note 263. See generally John Fabian Witt, Lincoln's Code (2012).

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

general. Secession, and civil war, were species of insurrection and rebellion—organized, group resistance to the authority of government to execute the laws and attempts to substitute an unlawful legal regime for the lawful, constitutional one. But insurrection and rebellion were the broader categories. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that these 1860s Civil War usages of terms carried over into the meaning of Section Three.

5. Other Extant Statutory Sources and Notorious Examples

a. The Insurrection Acts (and Insurrections Generally)

What about the Insurrection Acts themselves—the statutes that comprised the statutory authority supporting Lincoln's use of military force to suppress secession? These statutes implemented Congress's power "To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions" as well as its other war powers over the army and navy. The central statute was enacted in 1795 (superseding a similar enactment in 1792) and was amended in 1807 and 1861. These statutes—the conduct they were understood to reach; the forms and degree of opposition to government authority that were believed to trigger the statutes' application; and the circumstances in which they had been invoked and applied in the past—also would have been part of the background understanding of the term "insurrection" as it came to be incorporated into Section Three.

The 1795 act explicitly recited that it was enacted in part to carry into execution the power to "suppress insurrections." But it also applied to repel invasions and to enforce federal law. Together, these were the three circumstances where Congress had the power to provide for calling out the militia.[305] Section One of the Act allowed the President to call forth the militia "whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe," as well as, upon request of state authorities, "in case of an insurrection in any state against the government thereof."[306] Section Two allowed the President to call forth the militia "whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act."[307] Section Two encompasses insurrections against the United States.[308] (Section One specifically deals only with insurrections against a state government.)

In 1807, Congress supplemented this power with the power to call out the army and navy in similar circumstances: "in all cases of insurrection, or obstruction to the [305] U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 8, cl. 15.

[306] 2 Stat. 424 (1795), sec. 1.
[307] Id. sec. 2. (emphasis added).
[308] That said, because Section Two is supported by both Congress's power to "suppress Insurrections" and its power "to execute the Laws of the Union," U.S. Const. art. I, sec. 8, cl. 15. it could encompass instances of law enforcement that do not rise to the level of a constitutional "insurrection."

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

laws, either of the United States, or of any individual state or territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary ..." The 1807 act thus carried forward and repeated the 1795 act's understanding of insurrection.[309]

Finally, on July 29, 1861, Congress amended the trigger again to specifically describe "rebellion." It allowed the President to call forth the militia "whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President of the United States, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States . . ."[310]

The various versions of the Insurrection Act illustrate a common theme: insurrection is more than ordinary law violation; it entails "combinations" or "assemblages," acting together, to "oppose[s]" or "obstruct" the ability of government to "execute" the law, in numbers "too powerful" to be suppressed by the usual means of law enforcement.[311]

Moreover, several famous instances in which this statutory authority had been (or might have been) invoked provide additional informative context for understanding "insurrection" or "rebellion." Consider just a few.

The "Whiskey Rebellion" was one famous such instance. In 1794, acting under the 1792 predecessor statute, President George Washington personally led militia forces into western Pennsylvania to suppress a large uprising against the government spurred by resistance to the enactment of a federal tax on distilleries. Notably, the Whiskey Rebellion involved armed mobs, organized and employed for the purposes of intimidating and threatening federal officers, keeping them from performing their [310] 12 Stat. 281 (1861).

---

[309] 2 Stat. 443 (1807).

[311] Myles Lynch has written that there can exist no insurrection within the meaning of the Insurrection Acts unless the President proclaims that an insurrection exists and, further, that as a consequence, there can exist no insurrection or rebellion within the meaning of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment unless the President proclaims that such an insurrection exists. Lynch, supra note 5, at 168, 214-215. This seems plainly wrong. If the Insurrection Act defines insurrection, it is defined as concerted and powerful obstruction of the execution of the laws by government. It is no part of this definition that an insurrection exists only if the President declares it to exist. The President's proclamation is a statutory prerequisite to the use of military force, not part of the definition of insurrection. The President can use force if he proclaims that there is an insurrection; but it is not an insurrection only because he proclaims it one.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

duties under the law, and preventing others from assuming federal office (or inducing them to renounce their authority).[312]

We believe the "Whiskey Rebellion" would have been regarded in the nineteenth century as a classic illustration of what was meant by the terms insurrection and rebellion.[313] Indeed, by the time of the drafting of Section Three, it seems to have been regularly referred to in precisely those terms.[314] In commonplace usage, as well as in political, and legal discourse, the Whiskey Rebellion was a familiar illustration of an "insurrection" or "rebellion."

"Fries Rebellion," in 1799, was another well-known anti-tax revolt, this time in eastern Pennsylvania.[315] President John Adams invoked the 1795 Act to suppress the "insurrection," as he called it,[316] which had involved threats, intimidation, and violence directed at federal tax assessors by organized bands of persons designed to prevent the assessors from performing their duties, and further such acts directed against the ability of the government to arrest tax resisters. In at least one instance, armed opponents of the government successfully freed prisoners from federal custody. The Adams administration's suppression of the insurrection led to widely publicized treason prosecutions[317] of leaders and instigators of the unlawful resistance, including John Fries. As with the Whiskey Rebellion, Fries Rebellion was characterized by [312] See generally Elkins & McKitrick, The Age of Federalism 461-474 (1993) (detailing actions of organized resistance, intimidation, and threats preventing federal officials from performing their duties – including tarring and feathering, whipping, surrounding of officials' homes by armed mobs, and kidnapping and coerced repudiation of federal authority); see also Ron Chernow, Alexander Hamilton 468-478 (2004) (similar); Robert W. Coakley, The Role of Federal Military Forces in Domestic Disorders, 1789-1878, at 43-68 (1988) (documenting the resistance and military response).

---

[313] To be sure, one scholar of the Acts suggests that "[i]t may have been dubious whether actions of the Whiskey Rebellion farmers truly rose to the level of insurrection," and that Washington may have treated it as law-obstruction rather than insurrection. Vladeck, at 161 n. 46; see also Coakley, supra note 312, at 67 (suggesting that to "characterize the . . . affair as a 'riot' and the participants as 'rioters'" is "far closer to the truth"). But later sources called it at least an insurrection, see infra note 314, and this goes to show that an "insurrection" in the legal sense did not necessarily have to rise to the level of an attempt to take over or displace the government.

[314] See 1 Francis Wharton. State Trials of the United States during the Administrations of Washington and Adams 102-184 (1849) (describing "The Trials of the Western Insurgents"); Townsend Ward, The Insurrection of the Year 1794, in the western counties of Pennsylvania (J.B. Lippincott 1858); H.M. Brackenridge, History of the western insurrection in western Pennsylvania: commonly called the whiskey insurrection (W.S. Haven, 1859).

[315] Coakley, supra note 312, 69-77.

[316] John Adams, Proclamation on Insurrection in Pennsylvania, 12 March 1799, https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Adams/99-02-02-3377.

[317] These prosecutions also occasioned a widely-cited jury charge from Circuit Justice Chase, in which he repeatedly discussed "insurrection," describing it as a "rising of any body of the people" and arguing that it qualified as treason because "an insurrection to resist or prevent, by force, the execution of any statute of the United States, has a direct tendency to dissolve all the bands of society, to destroy all order and all laws, and also all security for the lives, liberties and property of the citizens of the United States." Case of Fries, 9 F. Cas. 924, 930 (C.C.D. Pa. 1800). See also 1 Wharton, supra note 314, at 458-609 (describing these proceedings as "The Trial of the Northampton Insurgents").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

concerted acts of forcible interference with federal officials' ability to perform their duties under law.[318]

Nat Turner's Rebellion, a violent slave revolt in 1831, did not lead to a presidential invocation of the Insurrection Act.[319] But it surely would have been a classic illustration of at least an "insurrection" and perhaps even a "rebellion"—a concerted uprising seeking forcibly to overturn the legal order and thwart government's ability to execute the law. A published report of Turner's own account called it both an insurrection[320] and in one instance an "open rebellion."[321] This example, too, likely would have formed part of the background understanding of the terms insurrection or rebellion at the time they were employed in Section Three.

More broadly, slavery and anti-slavery produced other prominent incidents that would have been classed as small or large insurrections against government—instances that went beyond individual instances of legal disobedience, or of resistance to the laws themselves, and rose to the level of active, concerted, unlawful resistance to the authority of government to execute the laws. Specifically, revolt against the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 sometimes took the form of slave liberation in open defiance of government authority. For example, in Boston in 1850 and 1851, a local vigilance committee invoked "the 'higher law' doctrine" to openly harbor freed slaves to the point that President Millard Fillmore "threatened to send in federal troops."[322] In Christiana, Pennsylvania in 1851, a Quaker community took up arms (!) to defend fugitive slaves, shooting several slaveowners who had arrived from nearby Maryland. This was denounced as an "act of insurrection," and this time President Fillmore did call out federal troops.[323] In Wisconsin in 1859, resistance to federal authority became so widespread as to prefigure the coming of the Civil War.[324] And of course John

---

[318] As with the Whiskey Rebellion, these events show that an "insurrection" in the legal sense did not necessarily have to rise to the level of an attempt to take over or displace the government. See also Elkins & McKitrick at 696-700 (questioning "whether the circumstances really called for military force of any kind").

[319] Federal troops were used to suppress this and other slave rebellions, but "without following the legal procedures laid down in the statutes of 1795 and 1807." Coakley, supra note 312, at 92-94. Coakley suggests that this the failure to go through the Insurrection Acts reflected "the universal dread of slave revolts" at the time and the fact that "t]he slaves had no political constituency." Id. at 94.

[320] See The Confessions of Nat Turner, The Leader of the Late Insurrection in Southampton, VA, as fully and voluntarily made to Thomas R. Gray, at 3, 5, 7, 20, 22 (1831) (calling it "insurrection"); see also Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Nat Turner's Insurrection, 8 Atlantic Monthly 173 (1861)

[321] See Turner, supra note 320, at 3 ("The late insurrection . . . is the first instance in our history of an open rebellion of the slaves") (emphases added).

[322] See McPherson, supra note 231, at 81-84; Cf. Coakley, supra note 312, at 130-131 (noting debate about whether this disturbance in Boston was sufficiently great to trigger the insurrection acts).

[323] McPherson, supra note 231, at 84-85. See also Thomas Slaughter, Bloody Dawn: The Christian Riot and Racial Violence in the Antebellum North (1991); and cf. id. at ix ("The line between riot and rebellion was shifting during the antebellum period.").

[324] See generally H. Robert Baker, The Rescue of Joshua Glover: A Fugitive Slave, the Constitution, and the Coming of the Civil War (2006) (describing resistance, in the mid-to-late1850s, in Wisconsin to federal legal authority to execute the Fugitive Slave Act).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Brown's fateful raid on Harper's Ferry in 1859 was an explicit act of insurrection and rebellion: a quixotic and ill-prepared attempt to foment a massive slave insurrection and to overthrow the power of proslavery governments in the South.[325] These rebels and insurrectionists were fighting deeply unjust laws, but there is no question that they committed many acts of insurrection nonetheless. Rebellion for a good cause is still rebellion.

Another prominently identified insurrection or rebellion would have been Dorr's Rebellion, in Rhode Island, in 1841-1842 which led to the Supreme Court's 1849 decision in Luther v. Borden.[326] There, a cabal claiming to constitute the new, lawful government of Rhode Island engaged in forcible resistance to and sought to overturn the authority of the prior, lawful state government (the "charter" government that traced its authority to Rhode Island's original colonial charter). The federal government did not invoke the Insurrection Act to intervene, but it well might have. When the Supreme Court ultimately adjudicated the case—through the vehicle of a trespass suit by a member of one faction, against members of the other—the Court held that the question of which government constituted the lawful government of the state was a political question committed to the judgment of Congress and the President and that the judiciary lacked authority to interfere with the political branches' actions (and inactions), which had tacitly supported the charter government. The practical result of the decision—relevant to our inquiry– was that the losing side in the struggle (the faction headed by Mr. Dorr) legally could be treated by the prevailing side (the charter government) as having engaged in "insurrection" against the rightful state government. The Court noted, and seemingly accepted, the charter government's characterization of plaintiff and others having "assembled in arms . . . for the purpose of overthrowing the government by military force"[327] and as having attempted "to assert the authority of [the Dorr government] by force,"[328] as amounting to having "engaged in the insurrection."[329] The Court also referred to the government's actions as having been designed to suppress that "insurrection."[330] The Court appeared to equate with "insurrection" the Dorr group's attempts to displace or supersede the existing government and forcibly assert its own claimed authority as a replacement.

Finally, several notable invocations of the Insurrection Act occurred during the period of Reconstruction during the presidency of Ulysses S. Grant.[331] While these [325] McPherson, supra note 231, 202-208. Federal troops helped suppress this insurrection and rebellion too. See Coakley, supra note 312, at 193 ("This intervention was, as in the case of Nat Turner's Rebellion, an emergency measure undertaken without the usual formalities.").

---

[326] Luther v. Borden, 58 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849). On Dorr's Rebellion generally and the federal response, see Coakley, supra note 312, at 119-127.

[327] Luther, 58 U.S. (7 How.) at 8.

[328] Id. at 37

[329] Id. at 46

[330] Id. at 45.

[331] By this time, the Act had been amended yet again. See 17 Stat. 13, 14-15 (1871), §§ 3-4.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

events occurred after ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment (and thus could not have formed any part of the subjective understanding of the drafters and ratifiers of the meaning of Section Three), they nonetheless deserve mention as roughly contemporaneous evidence of the objective meaning of "insurrection" as displayed by important usage within a few years of adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. Briefly summarized: In South Carolina in 1871, Grant twice invoked the Insurrection Act (as well as suspending habeas corpus, among other actions) to secure order in dealing with the Ku Klux Klan.[332] In Louisiana, in 1872, a contested gubernatorial election spawned efforts by white supremacists to overthrow the elected pro-Reconstruction Republican government, culminating in the infamous "Colfax Massacre" of April 13, 1873, in which a white mob attacked and massacred perhaps 150 black citizens who had been defending a courthouse in Colfax, Louisiana and, more broadly, the Reconstruction Republican government. President Grant invoked the Insurrection Act as authority to suppress the insurrection that sought to overturn the election result.[333] Later, in 1874, Grant again invoked the Insurrection Act in Louisiana, this time to suppress a white supremacist coup d'etat that had overthrown the Republican governor by force.[334] Federal troops reinstated the lawful government, but the insurrectionists established a rival state government that effectively controlled much of Louisiana outside of the capital—New Orleans at the time. (The conflict lasted until 1877, when Reconstruction was abandoned by the national government and white supremacists took full control of the state.) In Mississippi, in 1874, white supremacists fabricated criminal charges against the newly elected black sheriff, Peter Crosby, and deposed him by mob action.[335] Black citizens organizing an effort to reinstate Crosby were attacked by white mobs, resulting in the massacre of as many as 300 black citizens. Again, President Grant invoked the Insurrection Act and sent federal troops to reinstate Crosby and prevent further violence. Also in 1874, in Arkansas, Grant invoked the Insurrection Act to quell violence in an ongoing dispute over the 1872 gubernatorial election results.[336] And in 1876, in South Carolina, Grant invoked the Insurrection Act to protect the gubernatorial election process from white supremacist groups.[337] Common to each of these instances during the Grant administration was [332] Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 197, Law and Order in the State of South Carolina (Mar. 24, 1871); http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/?pid=70253; Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 200, Law and Order in the State of South Carolina (Oct. 12, 1871); for background see Michael Bahar, The Presidential Intervention Principle: The Domestic Use of the Military and the Power of the Several States, 5 Harv. Nat'l Sec. J. 537, 613-14 (2014); Lou Falkner Williams, The Great South Carolina Ku Klux Klan Trials, 1871-1872, at 39-49 (1996).

---

[333] Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 213, Law and Order in the State of Louisiana (May 22, 1873) http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/index.php?pid=70364

[334] Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 220, Law and Order in the State of Louisiana (Sept. 15, 1874) http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/index.php?pid=70422

[335]Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 223, Law and Order in the State of Mississippi (Dec. 21, 1874), http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/?pid=70459.

[336] Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 218, Law and Order in the State of Arkansas (May 15, 1874) http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/?pid=70420.

[337] Ulysses S. Grant, Proclamation No. 232, Law and Order in the State of South Carolina (Oct. 17, 1876) http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/?pid=70542.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the idea that concerted efforts to overturn lawful popular election results by mob action, force, violence, and intimidation constituted "insurrection" against government.

It is difficult to evaluate precisely the probative force of all of these incidents, and application of federal authority to suppress "insurrections," for understanding Section Three. But they were unquestionably part of the picture, contributing to the background for understanding Section Three's terms. They were very much part of a common historical vocabulary of "insurrection" and "rebellion" and culpable participation in the same, familiar to those who drafted and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment: The Whiskey Rebellion, Shays' Rebellion, Nat Turner's Rebellion, Dorr's Rebellion, the insurrections against the Fugitive Slave Act in the 1850s, John Brown's raid on Harper's Ferry in 1859—all of these incidents would have informed the general understanding of what constitutes "insurrection or rebellion" and what actions amount to having "engaged in" or perhaps given "aid or comfort" to such uprisings. They all tend to support our working definitions of Section Three's terms. Even President Grant's post-1868 invocations of the Insurrection Act, to combat attempts to overthrow election results or displace lawful state authority, may shine some interpretive light backward on Section Three's meaning. If an uprising of similar nature to these events were to occur, it seems to us that it likely would have been understood as an insurrection or rebellion within the coverage of Section Three.

b. The Congressional Exclusion Debates

As noted above, the federal Ironclad Oath adopted during the Civil War closely paralleled the requirements and consequences of Section Three. These parallels are drawn more sharply by a series of cases where both houses of Congress enforced the oath to exclude their own prospective members from being seated. As one scholar has put it, these debates "were littered with relevant concepts, and we can judge the Fortieth Congress's reception to those similar arguments as indicative of their expectations as to Section 3's application."[338] Moreover, several of these proceedings occurred right around the time of the proposal and ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. In some cases after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, Congress applied Section Three itself, further demonstrating continuity and overlap with the Ironclad Oath.

The familiar source compiling the houses' debates on such matters of internal administration is Hinds' Precedents, which we rely on here.[339]

---

[338] Lynch, supra note 5, at 196. Lynch ably and accurately describes the most important such cases. See id. at 196-201, 207-210. We find little or nothing to disagree with in his account and analysis of these disputes and are indebted to Lynch's research and analysis.

[339] See generally 1 Asher C. Hinds, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States, ch. 14, pp. 431-486 (1907).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

First, Kentucky: In 1867, Kentucky submitted eight members-elect to the House, seven of whom were challenged as ineligible on the ground that they had given aid or comfort to the Confederacy, during the Civil War. The Committee on Elections concluded that "no person who has been engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, or who has given aid and comfort to its enemies during the late rebellion," ought to be sworn or seated.[340] A subsequent report determined that such charges needed to be "proved by clear and satisfactory testimony" and establish more than mere lack of active support for the Union or passive sympathy for the rebellion but that "the claimant has by act or speech given aid or countenance to the rebellion."[341] Such acts or speech need not rise to the level of constitutional treason, but they "must have been so overt and public, and must have been done or said under such circumstances, as fairly to show that they were actually designed to, and in their nature tended to, forward the cause of the rebellion."[342]

On this standard, the committee found that four of the challenged members-elect were not proved to have either "engaged in armed hostility" to the Government or provided "aid or comfort" to its adversaries. These four were admitted to their seats. Three others—John Y. Brown, John D. Young, and Lawrence Trimble—posed more serious difficulty, however. The House ultimately refused to seat either Brown or Young but admitted Trimble. The facts of these cases are instructive explorations of the boundaries between free speech and "aid or comfort."

The House addressed the John Y. Brown case first. "This election case," Hinds' reports, was "the first of its kind since the formation of the Constitution, and recognized by the House as of the highest importance."[343] It also involved an incident of pure speech as disqualifying a member-elect from office: John Y. Brown had explicitly embraced and advocated violent resistance to the Union in Kentucky. Indeed, he had gone so far as to urge the shooting of any man who volunteered for service in Union forces. Brown's disqualifying conduct consisted solely of such acts of speech. The committee relied on a letter Brown had written to the Louisville Courier in 1861 in which Brown had gone to great lengths to affirm his support for the rebellion in unequivocal terms:

> Editors Louisville Courier:
>
> My attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in your paper of this date:
>
> "JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.– This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm,

[340] Id. §448 at 442.
[341] Id. at 443 (emphasis added).
[342] Id.
[343] Id. at 445.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South—

'I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks.'"

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the Confederate States! What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders, we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought and I believe will be shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered public and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.[344]

The House concluded, on the strength of this letter alone, that Brown had supported the rebellion and therefore voted to exclude him. This became a precedent for the House's subsequent actions in other cases. The standard applied—whether the facts, "proved by clear and satisfactory testimony," showed that an individual had, by an "act or speech ... overt and public ... done or said under such circumstances, as fairly to show that they were actually designed to, and in their nature tended to, forward the cause of the rebellion"—had been satisfied by Brown's letter.[345]

Similarly, in March 1868, the House excluded John D. Young under this standard. Young's case also involved speech. The Young case involved numerous expressions of support and sympathy for the South and against the Union, and the committee explicitly took the position "that 'aid and comfort' may be given to an enemy by words of encouragement, or the expression of an opinion" by a person (like Young, a county judge) in an "influential position."[346] But Young's case was overdetermined, because there was also testimony that Young had provided material assistance to Confederate troops, by giving them food and provisions and assisting in the capture by Confederate troops of a Union soldier. According to the committee, Young's "expressions and admissions" of sympathy for the enemy, "taken in connection with the open acts of 'aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States,'" established that he could not "'honestly and truly take the oath,'"[347] and the full House agreed.

---

[344] Quoted in id. at §449, p. 445.
[345] Id. at §449, pp. 443, 448.
[346] Id. at §451, p. 452 (quoting House Report 40-29 (1868)) (emphasis added).
[347] Id. at §451, p. 452 (quoting House Report 40-29 (1868)) (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The contrasting case of Lawrence Trimble, however, showed that mere political opposition did not establish disloyalty. Aside from some overly vague allegations that he had traded with the enemy, the core of the case against Trimble were his political speeches. Trimble had been the Union candidate for Congress in 1861 and "made Union speeches in that canvass throughout the district." Trimble opposed Lincoln's war policies after the Emancipation Proclamation, asserting that the North was waging "an abolition war" and reportedly was opposed to "voting any more men or money to aid in carrying it on." These views and statements, however, were not materially different from other members' statements in Congress opposing the administration's policy. The committee (and House) considered Trimble's "loyalty unquestioned" and found no case for disqualifying him.[348]

Next consider Tennessee: Tennessee supplied two interesting membership cases, one in the House and one in the Senate. Both involved undoubtedly pro-Union men who nonetheless had held state office under Tennessee's secessionist regime and sworn oaths under it, while seemingly using their positions to support Union interests and resist the secession government. This presented a distinct problem under the Ironclad Oath, which required its swearer to disaffirm that he had ever accepted or exercised office under a pretended government hostile to the United States. What to do? In each case—Senator-elect David Patterson, who had served as a state court judge in the eastern region of Tennessee during the Confederate regime; and Representative-elect R.R. Butler, who had retained his seat in the state legislature during secession, while opposing it—the respective house ultimately admitted the applicant to his seat and permitted him to take a modified oath omitting the never-held-office-under-a-hostile-regime sentence.[349]

A potentially broad understanding of "aid or comfort" also surfaced in the exclusion of Maryland Senator-elect Philip Thomas in 1867.[350] What had Thomas done to support the South in its rebellion? Apparently, he had permitted his minor son, a member of his household, to join the Confederate army, and given his son $100 on the way out the door. The Senate debated whether Thomas had done anything more by way of counsel or encouragement of his son's taking up arms against the United States and it is not clear how the senators evaluated such evidence. Some seemed to have thought Thomas's treatment of his son disqualifying. Others focused instead on allegations that Thomas had resigned as President Buchanan's Treasury Secretary because he disagreed with the President's decision to send federal reinforcements to [348] Id. at §453, p. 459.

---

[349] Id. at §453, 455, pp. 459-461, 462-465. In Butler's case, two-thirds of both houses voted him amnesty. Id. at 464-465. In Patterson's case, the Senate tried to pass a bill altering the oath for Patterson, but the House tabled it, id. at 46, but perhaps that is okay, if application of the Ironclad Oath, to members of Congress, is a function of each house's separate power to make rules governing its proceedings. U.S. Const. art. I §5.

[350] Hinds' at §§457, 458 at pp. 465-470.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Charleston Harbor.[351] Either theory of Thomas's exclusion suggests that "aid or comfort" to rebellion was understood to sweep broadly and possibly include conduct of a somewhat more passive or quiescent nature—allowing one's son to become a rebel soldier, under circumstances where such permission (and financial assistance) might have been withheld; opposing, or resisting, measures to suppress insurrection and defend national institutions and personnel, and resigning office in protest against such measures.

Cases like these continued in the House and Senate after Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment had taken effect. By this point, the basic principles were more established, and the cases were sometimes more factbound or less illuminating, but they further confirm the continuity between Section Three and the Ironclad Oath, and illustrate the understanding of Section Three very shortly after its adoption.

To recount them very briefly: In 1868, John Christy had received the most votes for Congress in Georgia's sixth district, but the House committee found that Christy, by his own admission, had given "aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement" to persons in armed hostility against the Union and therefore, "in accordance with the precedent in the case of John Y. Brown," was disqualified by the Ironclad Oath, and he was not seated.[352] In 1869, the House sat John Rice from Kentucky despite a divided House committee's conclusion that he was disqualified by Section Three.[353] The pages of the Congressional Globe reveal a debate about whether Rice had in fact joined the Confederate Army, which turned on the dubious credibility of two witnesses.[354] In 1870, the House allowed Representative George Booker of Virginia to keep his seat, despite subsequent charges that he had directly supported the militia of the rebel government in his role as justice of the peace. But Booker made an apparently persuasive case that he had been loyal all along, even as he worked within the Confederacy, and as a practical matter he had already been seated. For one reason or the other, the House ultimately voted to table the issue, leaving Booker in office.[355] Also in 1870, the House allowed Representative Lewis McKenzie of Virginia to sit, despite various votes he had taken as a member of the Virginia house of [351] Hinds' at §459, pp. 470 (reporting that Senator Sumner withdrew a resolution focused on Thomas's son "it being urged that Mr. Thomas's conduct as a Cabinet officer in 1860 afforded more certain grounds for action."). See also Cong. Globe 40th Cong. 2nd Sess. at 1260-1262 (Feb. 19, 1868).

---

[352] Hinds' at §459, pp. 470-472. Interestingly, the Governor of Georgia had concluded that Christy was disqualified under Section Three while the House committee relied on the Ironclad Oath "independently of any question as to ineligibility under the fourteenth amendment," id.

[353] Hinds' at §460, pp. 472-473.

[354] Congressional Globe, 41st Cong, 2nd Sess. pp. 5442-5447 (July 11, 1870). Rice had also been in the Kentucky legislature and voted for a resolution against the coercion of the southern states; but everybody agreed this was not enough to count as aid or comfort, because it was only in January 1861: "No war exist[ed] at the time" and it was before "the policy of the Government had been announced." Id. at 5443 (Butler); see also id. at 5445 (Garfield). Nor could Rice be excluded solely because of his politics. See id. at 5445 ("[T]his man was a Democrat. That is a political sin, but it is not a crime under the law. He is a Democrat yet. I think he is very wrong in being that, but yet it is not a crime.") (Logan).

[355] Hinds' at §461, pp. 474-475.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

delegates in 1861—votes pledging Virginia's commitment to "unite her destiny with the slaveholding States of the South" should attempts to reconcile differences between North and South fail, supporting Virginia's willingness to fight, and to provision Virginia fighters. Because all of these votes occurred before voter ratification of Virginia's secession ordinance on May 23, 1861, and because McKenzie remained "an outspoken Union man" after secession and throughout the war, the House concluded he had neither engaged in rebellion nor given it aid or comfort.

Finally, in 1871, the Senate declined to seat Senator-elect Zebulon Vance from North Carolina.[356] The exclusion of Vance was a particularly easy case. After serving in Congress, he had led Confederate troops in battle against the Union and then became the wartime governor of Confederate-regime North Carolina.[357] If anyone had engaged in rebellion and given aid or comfort to the Union's enemies, it was Vance. He was clearly barred by both Section Three and by the Ironclad Oath. He could be seated only if Congress chose to exercise amnesty, which it did not do until later.[358]

These congressional seating challenges suggest some rough lines as to what Congress thought was "aid or comfort" to the Confederacy. On one hand, direct material support for the rebel cause—providing supplies or working with enemy forces—was clearly aid or comfort. On the other hand, disfavored political beliefs and pre-war political stances were clearly not. In between lay contested territory. But there was no bright line, for instance, protecting all speech or political activity. In some situations, speech alone could be disqualifying. A sufficiently clear and unequivocal statement of disloyalty in the form of proposed active resistance to Union authority or encouragement to violence against Union forces appears generally to have been thought disqualifying. Voluntarily holding confederate office or advocating resistance to the Union also could be enough to disqualify. We do not suggest these individual applications—many of which were contested and complicated—are strictly binding. But they provide useful concrete evidence for how parts of Section Three may well have been understood and thought to work.[359]

---

[356] See generally Hinds' at §463, pp. 478-486.

[357] See generally Richard E. Yates, Zebulon B. Vance: as War Governor of North Carolina, 1862-1865, 3 J. Southern Hist. 43 (1937).

[358] Vance ultimately had the last laugh. Vance was excluded from the 1872 amnesty statute because he had served in the thirty-sixth Congress, Act of May 22, 1872, ch. 193, 17 Stat. 142; https://bioguide.congress.gov/search/bio/V000021. Cf. Franklin Ray Shirley, Zebulon Vance, Tarheel Spokesman 71 & 152 n. 36 (1962) (claiming that Vance had been waiting for the 1872 amnesty until his opponent Abbott had somehow engineered the amendment to the 1872 act that excluded Vance), but Congress then passed a private bill granting him individual amnesty. 17 Stat. 691 (June 10, 1872). Thanks to Gerard Magliocca for this source. Vance subsequently returned to the North Carolina governorship, and then to the Senate until his death in 1884. Magliocca, Amnesty, supra note 5, at 111 n. 126.

[359] Finally, though it occurred long after this period, there has been one additional congressional exclusion under Section Three: the 1919 exclusion of socialist newspaper editor Victor Berger from the House. See supra notes 222-224 and accompanying text. The Berger episode of course has no probative value about the original meaning of Section Three, since it occurred more than 50 years after Section

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

6. Legislative History

There is only a little fruit to be gleaned from the legislative history of the Fourteenth Amendment—the records of the proposing Congress's debates over its various provisions and of state ratification debates. The Fourteenth Amendment's legislative history is famously voluminous, and Section Three—like the other "forgotten" sections of the Amendment (Section Two and Section Four)—was much more salient to the debates then than it is to today.[360] As briefly noted above, the legislative history supports the key propositions we have advanced earlier in this article—that Section Three was designed to be general and prospective, and not limited to the situation of the Civil War and Reconstruction; that Section Three's disqualification was seen by proponents and opponents alike to be self-executing and automatic; and that Section Three was understood to supersede (or satisfy) prior constitutional limitations.[361]

Perhaps somewhat surprisingly, however, we have found relatively few interpretive insights about the scope of conduct triggering disqualification under Section Three. What evidence there is generally confirms the understanding that the provision would have sweeping consequences: there appears to have been substantial agreement—by both opponents and proponents—that the provision would cover a broad range of activity supporting or assisting the South's efforts to throw off the authority of the Union and the Constitution. The original proposal would have excluded all such persons from voting, not just officeholding and, further, would not have been limited in its coverage to former oath-swearing federal and state officeholders. However, the language concerning what conduct triggered disfranchisement (and, as later revised, disqualification from officeholding) was carried forward throughout the discussion. Opponents of what eventually became Section Three thought the range of what was included in disability-triggering conduct (that is, when one might be said to have "engaged in" insurrection or rebellion or given "aid or comfort" to it) was hugely broad in its reach, sweeping in nearly everybody in the rebel South—and viewed the proposal as regrettable on account of such breadth. Significantly, proponents of the amendment did not disagree with its opponents concerning the breadth of the description of disability-triggering conduct. The proponents simply thought such breadth appropriate, necessary, and valuable.[362]

As things proceeded, Congress narrowed the provision in two specific respects. Congress backed away from complete disfranchisement to disqualification from holding office. And relatedly, it narrowed Section Three to cover only those who had sworn a prior oath of loyalty to the U.S. Constitution as federal or state officeholders. Rather

---

Three was enacted. In our view, the House's decision was mistaken—an overzealous reading of the law, the facts, or both.

[360] See generally Graber, Volume 1, supra note 8.

[361] See supra notes 12, 59, & 184.

[362] See generally Graber Section Three manuscript, supra note 12.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

than disenfranchising pretty much the entire white South, it would disqualify from future office those who had held constitutional office and then rebelled.

But what did not change was the broad description of the conduct that triggered disfranchisement (in the earlier proposal) or disqualification from office (in the proposal eventually agreed to).[363] As noted, there is not a great deal of explication of what this conduct was, exactly. But the overall tenor of the debates over what became Section Three suggest that all meaningful connection with, support for, or aid to the Confederacy—officeholding, military service (whether voluntary or not), political support or endorsement, provision of material assistance to rebellion or rebel forces—was regarded by the proposing Congress as covered. The legislative history of Section Three—such as it is—supports a broad understanding of the prohibition contained in its language.

7. Early Applications of Section Three

A final set of evidence comes from the handful of cases applying Section Three shortly after its adoption. Once again, because these examples come after the provision was adopted, they do not provide direct evidence of its original public meaning, but they still can be informative.[364] Section Three came up in a range of procedural and institutional situations; each of these situations further confirms Section Three's broad substantive sweep.[365]

For instance, the 1867 Military Reconstruction Act—which imposed provisional governments on the southern states until they obtained readmission to representation in Congress by enacting new, republican, Reconstruction-compliant constitutions—directly incorporated Section Three of the proposed (but not yet ratified) Fourteenth Amendment as a restriction on those governments. Persons disqualified

---

[363] Congress also rejected a series of proposed amendments to Section Three that would have narrowed or limited the conduct or persons to which the language would apply – e.g., only to persons who joined the Confederacy while still holding prior office under the U.S. Constitution; only to persons who had sworn oaths to the Constitution since 1851; only to persons who had not received presidential pardons; and only to persons who had voluntarily served the confederacy. Republican defenders of Section Three successfully opposed these proposed limitations on Section Three's scope, arguing that limiting the ban to persons who still held office under the Constitution when they joined the Confederacy would indulge the pretext that resignation from office before engaging in or assisting rebellion absolved one of any prior duty of loyalty to the United States Constitution. Cong. Globe, 39th Cong. 1st Sess. p. 2770 (statement of Sen. Howard). Republicans likewise rejected the proposed limitation to persons who had "voluntarily" assisted or participated in rebellion, because it would raise unnecessary and difficult proof problems and permit spurious claims of involuntary participation. Indeed, one senator noted that Alexander Stephens, Vice President of the Confederacy, had testified before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction that he "never entered into the rebellion voluntarily"! Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. p. 2918 (statement of Sen. Willey).

[364] See, e.g., Baude, Liquidation, supra note 242, at 61-62; Paulsen, Most Dangerous, supra note 242, at 293, 303.

[365] Additionally, some of Congress's application of the Ironclad Oath to its own members also entailed the application of Section Three, see supra Part IV.A.5.b.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

under Section Three could not hold office under the provisional governments, nor could they serve in—or even vote for those who would serve in—the state's constitutional convention.[366]

Andrew Johnson's attorney general, Henry Stanbery, published a two-part opinion in 1867 setting forth his interpretation of the Act and thus, indirectly, of Section Three.[367] Stanberry's opinion is explicitly slanted toward a narrow construction of Section Three, because of his concerns that it would be punitive and ex post facto in this context.[368] Even so, Stanberry's opinion found Section Three's definition of what constituted participation in rebellion to be quite broad:

> "All those who, in legislative or other official capacity, were engaged in the furtherance of the common unlawful purpose, or persons who, in their individual capacity, have done any overt act for the purpose of promoting the rebellion, may well be said, in the meaning of this law, to have engaged in rebellion."[369]

As to individuals, Stanberry also reiterated several times that any voluntary support, even if not violent, was covered and culpable. He found "it to be clear, that in the sense of this law persons may have engaged in rebellion without having actually levied war or taken arms,"[370] and added that "wherever an act is done voluntarily in aid of the rebel cause . . . it must work disqualification under this law."[371]

Subsequent cases took even broader positions. For instance, in the 1869 decision of Worthy v. Barrett, the North Carolina Supreme Court concluded that a state sheriff was disqualified under Section Three for holding basically the same office as a sheriff when his state was in rebellion. The court's reasoning on this issue was succinct but clear:

> What will amount to having engaged in the rebellion?
>
> (1st.) Holding any of these offices under the Confederate government.

---

[366] An Act to provide for the more efficient Government of the Rebel States, 14 Stat. 428, 429, sec. 5-6 (March 2., 1867).
[367] Henry Stanbery, The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 141 (1867); Henry Stanbery, The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 182 (1867).
[368] 12 Op. Att'y Gen. at 159-160. But see supra Part III.A-B (explaining why the constitutional ex post facto and attainder principles do not apply to Section Three, especially as applied to new insurrections and rebellions).
[369] Id. at 161-162 (emphasis added)
[370] Id. at 161.
[371] Id. at 165.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> 2d Voluntarily aiding the rebellion, by personal service, or by contributions, other than charitable, of any thing that was useful or necessary in the Confederate service.[372]

That is, the North Carolina Supreme Court embraced Stanberry's view that almost any voluntary assistance to the rebel cause was a form of engaging in rebellion, but also held that holding any office, even an ordinary non-military office far from the front lines, was a form of engaging in rebellion covered by Section Three.[373]

Shortly after this—and shortly after Chief Justice Chase's unsound and unfortunate decision in Griffin's Case had held that Section Three required congressional legislation in order to be put into operation – Congress enacted federal procedures to directly enforce Section Three in federal court. The 1870 Enforcement Act, also known as the First Ku Klux Klan Act, authorized district attorneys of the United States to bring quo warranto actions to remove officials holding office "contrary to the provisions of the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution" and to bring criminal prosecutions against person who "shall hereafter knowingly accept or hold" office in violation of Section Three.[374] In proceedings brought under both enforcement sections of the Act, in the short period between 1870 and 1872, the scope of Section Three's prohibition was interpreted broadly. (Recall that in 1872 Congress removed Section Three's disqualification as to most former rebels.)

Consider first a notable criminal prosecution under the 1870 Act. In North Carolina again, this time in federal court, the government brought criminal charges against Amos Powell, for accepting an appointment as county sheriff despite being covered by Section Three.[375] Powell's alleged act of rebellion was having "furnished a substitute for himself to the Confederate army," and Powell's defense was that this was involuntary, because he was about to be involuntarily conscripted himself.[376] This gave the federal court, through Judge Hugh Lennox Bond, occasion to instruct the jury on the relevance of voluntariness to Section Three:

> [T]he word "engage" implies, and was intended to imply, a voluntary effort to assist the Insurrection or Rebellion, and to bring it to a successful termination; and unless you find the defendant did that, with which he is charged, voluntarily, and not by compulsion, he is not guilty of the indictment. But it is not every appearance of force nor timid fear that will

---

[372] Worthy v. Barrett, 63 N.C. 199, 203 (1869). The court also applied the Worthy rule to the even easier case of a county attorney who "took part in th[e] rebellion by serving in the Confederate army, voluntarily." In Re Tate, 63 N.C. 308 (1869).

[373] By contrast, Stanberry had concluded that officers who "discharged official duties not incident to war, but in the preservation of order and the administration of law, are not to be considered as thereby engaging in rebellion." 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 162.

[374] 16 Stat. 140, 142-143, sections 14 & 15. See supra note 54.

[375] United States v. Powell, 27 F. Cas. 605 (C.C.D.N.C 1871).

[376] Id. at 607.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> excuse such actual participation in the Rebellion or Insurrection. Defendant's conduct must have been prompted by a well grounded fear of great bodily harm and the result of force, which the defendant was neither able to escape nor resist. And further, the defendant's action must spring from his want of sympathy with the insurrectionary movement, and not from his repugnance to being in an army, merely.[377]

In other words, only great duress and pure heart would be a defense if one's conduct otherwise provided material support to the rebellion. Section Three's disqualification for having "engaged" in insurrection covered a wide swath of voluntary participatory acts supporting or assisting rebellion, some bordering on near-passive acquiescence.

Meanwhile, in Tennessee. the U.S. Attorney brought dozens of federal enforcement actions, including against three members of the Tennessee Supreme Court.[378] Many of those charged were unquestionably covered by Section Three because they had fought in the Civil War, for the Confederacy. But some were charged for more remote participation. For instance, Thomas Nelson, one of the Tennessee Justices, had been a unionist during the war, and indeed at one point a prisoner of the Confederacy. His participation in the rebellion appears to have been limited to being elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from Tennessee, after Tennessee's purported secession, and traveling to Washington to attempt to represent the state in Congress.[379] While these Section Three claims were never adjudicated, the fact that they were brought in the first place is consistent with the broad sweep of Section Three.[380]

The other scattered discussion of Section Three we have found are more ambiguous, but still consistent with these broad interpretations of Section Three's substantive disqualification—broad interpretations of insurrection, rebellion, "engaged in," and so on. Recall, for instance, that in Griffin's Case, it was essentially taken as given that Judge Hugh Sheffey would be disqualified by Section Three (if it applied) because he was "a member of the legislature of Virginia in 1862 during the late Rebellion, and as such voted for measures to sustain the so-called Confederate States in their war against the United States."[381] Other cases are consistent with similarly [377] Id. Additionally, Powell had served as a justice of the peace under the Confederate government, but the federal court held this not to qualify, for reasons similar to those articulated by Attorney General Stanberry. Id.

---

[378] Sam D. Elliott, When the United States Attorney Sued to Remove Half the Tennessee Supreme Court: The Quo Warranto Cases of 1870, 49 Tenn. B.J. 20 (2013); see also Magliocca, Amnesty, supra note 5, at 109-110.

[379] For one fawning account of Nelson, see Oliver P. Temple, Notable Men of Tennessee From 1833 to 1875. at 166-215 (1912).

[380] Justice Nelson resigned while these actions were pending, and the rest of the actions were abandoned with the passage of the 1872 Amnesty Act and a change in the federal attitude towards Section Three. Elliott, supra note 378.

[381] In re Griffin, 11 F. Cas. 7, 22 (C.C.D.Va. 1869).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

broad assumptions.[382] We have found none that took a substantially narrower view of Section Three, and even if some exist, they would seem to be the minority and inferior construction.

The application of Section Three immediately after its enactment is consistent with what the text, structure, context, and history of Section Three all tell us: to have "engage[d] in insurrection and rebellion," or given "aid or comfort" to "enemies" was understood to embrace an incredibly broad sweep of voluntary conduct that provides support, material assistance, or specific encouragement to such actions.

In the end, the sum total of evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three—contemporaneous dictionary definitions; parallel constitutional use of the same or similar language; the inferences that fairly may be drawn from the legislative history of Section Three's drafting; the especially strong evidence from 1860s Civil War era political and legal usage of nearly the precise same terms (in prominent presidential statements, congressional enactments and their implementation, and a landmark Supreme Court constitutional decision employing the same terms); the general legal backdrop of eighteenth century Insurrection Acts and the myriad and familiar historical incidents of "insurrection" and "rebellion" to which they applied; and finally early practice enforcing Section Three—points in a consistent direction: toward a broad understanding of what constitutes insurrection and rebellion and a remarkably broad understanding of what types of conduct constitute engaging in or perhaps giving aid or comfort to such movements.

B. What Prior Officeholders are Covered? What Future Offices are Barred?

The next step in the analysis of Section Three is rather more tedious than difficult. But it is important to get it right: Holders of what prior offices or positions are covered by Section Three's disqualification from future office if they engaged in insurrection or rebellion? And from what future offices or positions are they thereby disqualified? The text of Section Three takes up these points in reverse order (and so we shall too) and uses slightly different language for each category.

First, the offices or positions from which a disqualified person is barred:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or an elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State … [383]

[382] Sands v. Commonwealth, 62 Va. (21 Gratt.) 871, 873, 885–87 (1872). There is reason to think there were hundreds of other Section Three actions brought during this time period, but few records of the specifics of the cases. Magliocca, Amnesty, supra note 5, at 109-110.
[383] U.S. Const. amdt. XIV, sec. 3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Second, the offices or positions previously held, and for which an oath to the Constitution was taken, that trigger Section Three's disqualification:

> … who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States … [384]

We begin with a few observations.

First, the language of these provisions should be read in as straightforward and common-sense a manner as possible. The text must be read precisely, of course, but also sensibly, naturally and in context, without artifice or ingenious invention unwarranted by that context. Some constitutional provisions embody precise terms of art that must be attended to. But a reading that renders the document a "secret code" loaded with hidden meanings discernible only by a select priesthood of illuminati is generally an unlikely one.[385] Keep this in mind as we proceed: we think readers should be wary of any interpretation of Section Three that would impute to the text a hyper-technical set of hidden distinctions not fully warranted by the language. Where the simplest and most plausible explanation of minor textual differences is merely stylistic or accidental variation, that explanation should not lightly be cast aside.

Second, it appears that the list of disqualification-triggering offices tracks closely, but not identically, the listing of positions for which the original Constitution imposed an oath requirement. Article VI of the Constitution dictates that "Senators and Representatives . . . Members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution."[386] Article II, overlapping this general oath mandate, prescribes a specific oath for the President, who swears both that he will "faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States" and

---

[384] Id.

[385] See Michael Stokes Paulsen, Captain James T. Kirk and the Enterprise of Constitutional Interpretation: Some Modest Proposals from the Twenty-third Century, 59 Albany L. Rev. 671, 674-76 (1995). For instance, consider the story, passed down from Albert Gallatin to Max Farrand to William Treanor, that Gouverneur Morris slyly attempted to replace a comma with a semicolon in Article I in order to convert the "General Welfare" Clause from a limitation on the tax power into a freestanding power of regulation. William Michael Treanor, The Case of the Dishonest Scrivener: Guverneur Morris and the Creation of the Federalist Constitution, 120 Mich. L. Rev. 1, 20-24 (2021). Putting aside whether this story is really true, David S. Schwartz, Framing the Framer: A Commentary on Treanor's Governeur Morris as Dishonest Scrivener, 120 Mich. L. Rev. 51, 69-73 (2022), a sensible approach to constitutional interpretation should obviously resist such antics. Even if Morris had succeeded in smuggling in the semi-colon, that maneuver should not be decisive in interpreting the Clause. See Kesavan & Paulsen, West Virginia, supra note 130, at 338-339 & n. 151.

[386] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl.3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"'to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.'"[387]

Section Three's listing of triggering positions largely tracks the substance (and to some extent even the sequence) of the all-offices-legislative-executive-judicial-federal-and-state oath mandates. Section Three's list of positions from which a covered person is disqualified builds on this list. All positions that trigger disqualification are disqualified-from. In addition, the disqualified-from list includes, notably, presidential electors, who are not listed in the Constitution as persons required to swear an oath to the Constitution. The wording also appears designed to clarify that the ban extends to "military" offices—including state military offices—whether or not they would be considered "executive" offices under state law or Article VI. Thus, in general: If the original Constitution required an oath for a position, Section Three treats having held such a position as the trigger for Section Three's application. And if a person who once held any such position is disqualified under Section Three for engaging in or supporting insurrection, that person is barred (absent congressional relief) from holding any of those same positions plus disqualified from being an elector for President and Vice President. That seems to be the basic structure of the provision.

Our third observation is related. It appears to us that the text's overall project of office-listing, in both clauses, was designed to be reasonably comprehensive, covering the waterfront: both taking care not to accidentally leave out anything considered important—including everybody who was constitutionally required to have sworn an oath—and adding positions where appropriate, as with adding the category of electors to the list of positions from which a covered person is disqualified.

With these principles in mind, it appears to us that the two clauses—describing what past positions trigger disqualification and what future positions fall within the scope of that disqualification—can and should be read, together, in a straightforward manner. First, as to the persons to whom the provision applies (the second, "triggering" clause): Section Three's disqualification attaches to persons who previously swore an oath to support the Constitution as:

> [i] a "member" of Congress, or as > [ii] an "officer of" the United States, or as > [iii] a "member" of any State legislature, or as > [iv] an "executive or judicial officer of" any State.[388]

---

[387] U.S. Const. art. II, §1, cl. 8. On the Presidential Oath Clause generally, see Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Constitution of Necessity, 79 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1257, 1260-1267 (2004); on "to the best of my Ability," see William Baude, Signing Unconstitutional Laws, 86 Ind. L.J. 303, 310 (2011).
[388] U.S. Const. amdt. XIV, sec. 3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

These four categories are then closely paralleled (with differences noted) in the description of offices from which covered persons are excluded (the first clause). Covered insurrectionists, rebels, and aid-and-comforters are disqualified from being:

> [i] "a Senator or Representative" in Congress (paralleling "member," a seemingly purely stylistic variation) or > [ii] an elector for President or Vice President (a new exclusion from a position that is not an oath-required triggering position); or > [iii] holding "any office, civil or military," "under" either federal or state government (paralleling "officer" of the United States or of any State, respectively, in the second and fourth triggering categories above—with the noted clarification of the inclusion of "military" officers).

The description "civil" office, in the disqualified-from list seems designed to embrace the categories of "executive or judicial" officer in the triggering list. Though somewhat more awkward, we think an elected office in a state legislature also qualifies as a "civil" office within the language and design of Section Three, reading the word "office" in this context in an ordinary, non-technical sense.[389]

The overall result is a broad list of disqualification-triggering positions covering essentially every major federal or state legislative, executive, and judicial office; and a list of barred-from positions embracing all of the above plus electors for president and vice president (and clarifying "military"). The legislative positions in question are the relevant elected offices—members of the legislature, whether a state legislature or the federal Congress—and do not embrace unelected staff positions. The executive positions embrace anyone in the executive branches of federal or state government who holds an "office" within that branch.

To be sure, there might be ancillary questions concerning what federal executive and judicial positions qualify as an "office," held by an "officer"—as opposed to non-officer, non-"office"-holding employees. That is: exactly how far down the organizational chart does the list of triggering and disqualified-from positions go?[390] Like-[389] Hemel, How-to Guide, supra note 5 (setting forth arguments why state legislative offices are included within the general catch-all category of excluded-from "civil" offices.); contra John Randolph Tucker, General Amnesty, 126 N. Am. Rev. 53, 54 (1878). None of this in our view affects the question whether a Member of Congress may properly be designated as an "Officer" to whom the duties of the office of President may devolve upon presidential and vice-presidential death, resignation, or inability, which turns on different considerations. Compare Akhil Reed Amar & Vikram David Amar, Is the Presidential Succession Law Constitutional?, 48 Stan. L. Rev. 113 (1995) with John F. Manning, Not Proved: Some Lingering Questions About Legislative Succession to the Presidency, 48 Stan. L. Rev. 141 (1995).

---

[390] Serious scholarship has explored those questions with respect to the Appointments Clause. Jennifer L. Mascott, Who Are "Officers of the United States"?, 70 Stan. L. Rev. 443 (2018). We do not address that somewhat peripheral question here, but leave such issues for another day.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

wise, for the federal judicial branch, Article III judges and justices are plainly covered. (Other officers in the judicial branch, such as the clerks in Ex Parte Hennen,[391] are presumably covered as well—as well as perhaps bankruptcy judges, magistrate judges and the like.)[392] Non-office-holding employees, again, would not be covered. And of course there might be similar residual questions as to what state government positions constitute state executive "office" held by "officers" (thus, perhaps, the special need for designation "military," to be sure state military positions are included), and what state judicial-branch positions constitute a judicial office. But in the main, the description of who all is covered by Section Three and what offices such person, if disqualified, is excluded from holding strikes us as fairly straightforward.

The only challenge anyone has raised concerning this general description is the argument by professors Josh Blackman and Seth Tillman that a person who has served as President (and the same argument is made as to Vice President), while perhaps having held an office "under" the United States, is not properly classified as an "officer of" the United States.[393] On this view, disqualified persons might be barred from being President or Vice President—the authors are somewhat non-committal about this[394]—but having been President or Vice President, and engaged in insurrection or rebellion, does not trigger disqualification of an individual from anything! On this argument, the President and Vice President—alone among constitutional oath-takers—are exempt from Section Three's consequences.

We do not buy it, for many reasons: First, it adopts precisely the type of "secret code" hidden-meanings hermeneutic we think should be viewed extremely skeptically. Moreover, the code has a facially implausible consequence: an insurrectionist President is not covered by Section Three's disqualification (though nearly every other federal or state officeholder is); the President is (perhaps?) a disqualified-from office but not a disqualification-triggering office. This makes little sense.[395]

---

[391] 38 U.S. 230, 258 (1839) ("[T]hat a clerk is one of the inferior officers contemplated by [the Appointments Clause] cannot be questioned"). To be clear, Hennen dealt with the clerk of court, not what we would now call a term judicial law clerk.

[392] That said, to the extent that one maintains that magistrate judges and bankruptcy judges cannot lawfully exercise judicial power or executive power of their own, see William Baude, Adjudication Outside Article III 133 Harv. L. Rev. 1511, 1554-56, 1574-75 (2020), one might question whether they are truly "officers" at all. Again, we leave this issue for another day.

[393] Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Is The President An "Officer of the United States" For Purposes of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment?, 15 N.Y.U. J. L. & Liberty 1 (2021).

[394] See, e.g., id. at 6, 17, 21.

[395] To be sure, faithful readings of the Constitution sometimes yield counterintuitive outcomes. See Michael Stokes Paulsen, Someone Should Have Told Spiro Agnew, 14 Const. Comm. 245 (1997); (suggesting the possibility that a straightforward reading of the constitutional text yields the "stupid" – and surely inadvertent – result that the Vice President would be the presiding officer over his own impeachment trial in the Senate and that this is a result to be rectified); Baude & Sachs, Grounding, supra note 9, at 1468. But that does not mean we should close our eyes to plausibility and common sense, especially when the proposed textual reading is such a stretch. See also Paulsen, supra, Nothing But the Text, supra note 10, at 1439-1440 (noting cautions concerning use of the "absurdity" canon to

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Second (and relatedly), the argument rather implausibly splits linguistic hairs. No one denies that the President is an executive branch officer holding executive office. At the risk of belaboring the obvious: Article II refers to the "office" of President innumerable times. It specifies the length of term for which the President "holds his Office," certain minimum qualifications for eligibility "to that Office," what happens upon the President's removal "from Office," or inability to discharge "the Powers and Duties of said Office," and the oath he shall take before entering "on the Execution of his Office."[396] If the Presidency is not an office, nothing is.

So the argument must rely instead on the fine parsing of prepositional phrases. The President (perhaps?) holds an "office under" the United States but is not an "officer of" the United States? This seems to defy textual common sense. Far more sensible and straightforward to conclude, we think, that the officeholder holding the office of President is an officer "of" the United States who holds office under the authority of the United States. The minor textual difference between the triggering clause ("officer of") and the positions-disqualified clause ("office under")—a choice between prepositions—appears to be of no significant substantive consequence in Section Three, much as other minor textual variations in or among constitutional provisions often do not support differences in meaning.[397] Indeed, one far simpler and more straightforward explanation for the Constitution's use of "office under" and "officer of" in Section Three and elsewhere is that "office" and "officer" simply take different prepositions: the Constitution uses "of" when referring to an officer and "under" when referring to an office.

Finally, even if a plausible argument can be constructed that the difference might have once been thought capable of sustaining a term-of-art distinction with respect to different prepositional phrases in the original Constitution—surmounting the presumption against "secret code" interpretation—there is no evidence of such a distinction in Section Three and little logic to such a distinction either.[398] deny plain textual meaning, but noting how the canon is a sometimes useful tool in discerning actual textual meaning.).

---

[396] See generally U.S. Const. Art. II.

[397] For instance, consider the differently phrased, but seemingly identical enforcement clauses of the Reconstruction Amendments. U.S. Const. amdt. XIII, sec. 2 ("Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."); id. amdt. XIC, sec. 5 ("The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."); id. amdt. XV, sec. 2 ("The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."). Or consider the Constitution's "gratuitous (one could also say strange) punctuation marks." Kesavan & Paulsen, West Virginia, supra note 130, at 348 (giving examples).

[398] One of us has previously complimented Tillman's prior scholarship that attempts to prove such a systematic term-of-art/secret code in the original Constitution. William Baude, Constitutional Officers: A Very Close Reading, JOTWELL (Jul. 28, 2016) https://conlaw.jotwell.com/constitutional-officers-a-very-close-reading/. But the very pieces of evidence that are most arresting in that context also confirm extensive linguistic drift or changing understandings in the decades after the founding. Compare id. (foreign gifts to Washington) with Seth Barrett Tillman, The Original Public Meaning of the Foreign

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Third, a variant of the Blackman-Tillman argument was explicitly made and explicitly refuted in the congressional debates proposing Section Three. Senator Reverdy Johnson of Maryland charged that the language employed was defective because the offices of President and Vice President had inadvertently been omitted from Section Three. The amendment "does not go far enough," Johnson averred.[399] "I do not see but that any one of these gentlemen may be elected President or Vice President of the United States, and why did you omit to exclude them?"[400] Johnson was complaining that these two officers should be included in Section Three and there was no good reason to omit them. Whereupon Senator Morrill of Maine interrupted: "Let me call the Senator's attention to the words 'or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States.'"[401] Senator Johnson promptly, and somewhat sheepishly, retreated: "Perhaps I am wrong as to the exclusion from the presidency; no doubt I am; but I was misled by noticing the special exclusion in the case of Senators and Representatives."[402]

The Blackman-Tillman argument is not quite the same, but it is the mirror image of Johnson's concern. Johnson's inquiry was whether a covered, insurrectionist nonetheless might become president. The Blackman-Tillman argument is that an insurrectionist president is not an "officer of" the United States whose prior position triggers Section Three's restrictions on future office. The Johnson-Morrill colloquy does not specifically address that reverse-image argument. But it certainly suggests that the framers of Section Three were not parsing it as a secret code with facially implausible consequences. The question whether Section Three applied to former Presidents and Vice Presidents does not appear to have been raised again, by anyone.[403] Nor did anybody else involved in drafting or ratifying Section Three suggest that the mirror-image question would be any different. Subject to all the usual reservations about the use of legislative history (and legislative silence) in determining Emoluments Clause: A Reply to Professor Zephyr Teachout, 107 Nw. U.L. Rev. Colloquy 180, 190 (2013) (contrary practice by Presidents Van Buren, Tyler, and Jackson); compare Baude, supra this note (Hamilton's list) with Seth Barrett Tillman, The Reports of My Death Were Greatly Exaggerated, at 20-21 https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=3037107 (describing a scrivener's "condensed" version of this document likely made "circa 1830" that may reflect a different understanding of the constitutional terms); cf. Blackman & Tillman, supra note 393, at 24-31 (acknowledging, and arguing against, the possibility of linguistic drift). In other words, such secret code (if any) turns out to have been written in disappearing ink.

---

[399] Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st sess. at 2899 (1866)

[400] Id.

[401] Id.

[402] Id.

[403] Former President John Tyler of Virginia subsequently sided with the Confederacy and was elected to the Confederate Congress (but died before assuming office). And former Vice President John Breckinridge subsequently served as a Confederate general and, later, as Confederate Secretary of War. See Blackman & Tillman, supra 393, at 45-46 (acknowledging this). While Tyler and Breckinridge had served in other disqualification-triggering posts, if the text really had failed to include the offices of President and Vice President as triggering disqualification these incidents would have shown that to be a glaring and dangerous omission.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

textual meaning, this further confirms the more natural reading. The only time anything like the question was raised, the point was answered by a proponent of Section Three, clearly and unequivocally, and the questioning Senator accepted the answer as correct.

Fourth and finally, in an additional piece of prepositional jujitsu, Blackman and Tillman tellingly equivocate about whether the President holds "office under" the United States as well. (If he does, Section Three stops covered insurrectionists from becoming President, and if not, not.) Blackman and Tillman do not deny this possibility, but they do not confirm it either. The difficulty for them is that both answers show the implausibility of their position.

If Blackman and Tillman maintain that the President does not hold "office under" the United States, then they must fly in the face of the directly on point discussion between Senators Johnson and Morrill. They must claim to understand Section Three better than its framers. This seems unlikely. But if they confirm that the President does hold "office under" the United States, then they must maintain a sharp and crucial distinction between "office under" and "officer of." As Mark Graber has observed, this distinction was also contradicted by Section Three's framers: "[T]he members of the Congress who framed Section 3 of the 14th Amendment often indicated—and sometimes explicitly stated—that all persons who held office 'under the United States' were officers 'of the United States.' During the debates over Section 3, no representative or senator alluded to the existence of a distinction between 'of' and 'under'. Representatives and senators often described the president as having an 'office under the United States' and being an 'officer of the United States.'"[404] If a secret code was really at work, it was an extraordinarily well-kept secret. The implausibility of both horns of the Blackman-Tillman straddle demonstrates the implausibility of their position.

In short, the ordinary sense of the text; the structure and logic of its provisions; the evident design to be comprehensive; the text's many references to the office of the Presidency as an "office"; the seeming absurdity of the prospect of exclusion of the offices of President and Vice President from triggering the disqualification fashioned [404] Mark Graber Disqualification From Office: Donald Trump v. the 39th Congress, Lawfare (Feb. 24, 2023). Professor Graber notes further that a "unanimous House select committee report issued barely a month after Congress sent the 14th Amendment to the states concluded that 'a little consideration of this matter will show that 'officers of' and 'officers under' the United States are 'indiscriminately used in the Constitution.'" In addition, "[t]he most comprehensive study of state ratification . . . does not point to a single example of any journalist or participant in a state convention who distinguished between 'officers under' and 'officers of' or who otherwise thought a president who participated in an insurrection could not be disqualified under Section 3.'" John Vlahoplus, Insurrection, Disqualification, and the Presidency, 13 Brit. J. Am. Legal Stud. (forthcoming), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=4440157; see also Lynch, supra note 5, at 158-160 (collecting authorities supporting the same point); Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 16 n. 48 ("My research . . . shows that President Andrew Johnson repeatedly referred to himself as "the chief executive officer of the United States").

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

by the Radical Reconstruction Congress that drafted the Fourteenth Amendment; the fact that the only legislative debate over the language discussing whether Section Three inadvertently omitted the offices of President and Vice President rejected any such suggestion; and the fact that no one ever suggested that the "under/of" difference meant the presidency was not a covered office triggering Section Three, all convince us that the natural conclusion is the correct one: Section Three includes in its coverage, or "triggering" language, insurrectionists who once served as President and Vice President. And Section Three excludes disqualified insurrectionists from subsequently holding the office of either President or Vice President.

C. The Attempted Overthrow of the 2020 Presidential Election

We come finally to the urgent question of the day: How does Section Three apply to the events of 2020-2021—the efforts by Donald Trump (and others) to overthrow the results of the 2020 presidential election and install Trump as president for another term, despite his loss to Joseph Biden?

Consider the overall package of events: the dishonest attempts to set aside valid state election results with false claims of voter fraud; the attempted subversion of the constitutional processes for states' selection of electors for President and Vice President; the efforts to have the Vice President unconstitutionally claim a power to refuse to count electoral votes certified and submitted by several states; the efforts of Members of Congress to reject votes lawfully cast by electors; and, finally, the fomenting and incitement of a mob that attempted to forcibly prevent Congress's and the Vice President's counting of such lawfully cast votes, culminating in a violent and deadly assault on the Capitol (and Congress and the Vice President) on January 6, 2021.

Taken as a whole, these actions represented an effort to prevent the lawful, regular, termination of President Trump's term of office in accordance with the Constitution. They were an attempt to unlawfully overturn or thwart the lawful outcome of a presidential election and to install, instead, the election loser as president. They constituted a serious attempt to overturn the American constitutional order. Does Section Three cover this conduct? Did these events constitute "insurrection" or "rebellion" within the meaning of the Constitution? And if so, who all might be said to have "engaged in" that conduct, or perhaps given "aid or comfort" to those who did? We will consider those questions in turn.

1. The Question of Coverage: Insurrection and Rebellion

We begin with the general legal question whether the attempted overturning of the result of the 2020 presidential election is covered by Section Three in any respect. Do such efforts, in part or in whole, qualify as insurrection or rebellion, disqualifying prior-oath-swearing persons who participated in such acts from future office? In our view, based on all the foregoing analysis, the answer is yes.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

There are multiple arguments for how Section Three would apply to the events of 2020-2021, but let us first focus on the events of January 6, 2021.[405] These include first the cluster of actions taken in assembling, encouraging, charging, and inciting an armed (in part) mob, producing the January 6, 2021 attack on the Capitol, Congress, and the Vice President. For some, importantly including Trump, these acts would also include subsequent deliberate inaction against the January 6 attack—by persons with duties and capacity to act to suppress, halt, or quell the insurrection in progress—that effectively facilitated, permitted, aided, and encouraged such insurrectionary violence.

Overall, it seems to us to be quite clear that the specific series of events leading up to and culminating in the January 6, 2021 attack qualifies as an insurrection within the meaning of Section Three: "concerted, forcible resistance to the authority of government to execute the laws in at least some significant respect."[406] The large group of people who descended upon, entered, and occupied the U.S. Capitol building used force to prevent a key step in the constitutional transfer of power. The group was in part coordinated, not merely a riot.[407] Some members of the group were armed,[408] and many used force to breach the Capitol, to overpower law enforcement there, and to effectuate their unlawful aim.[409]

Furthermore, it seems that, as a whole, the group's goal—to the extent the group had a specific objective in mind—was to disrupt the constitutional transfer of power, by disrupting a necessary formal step in the constitutional process.[410] The invasion of the Capitol on January 6 was not simply a violation of the law (though it was that of course). It was not merely a protest of a particular legal measure, but a forcible prevention and disruption of it. And it was not the disruption of just any legal measure, but of one that was itself central to the allocation of authority under our Constitution. If this is a fair description of what happened on January 6, then that

---

[405] In describing these events, we rely generally here and throughout on the public record assembled by the House January 6th Committee. Final Report, Select Committee to Investigate the January 6th Attack on the United States Capitol, H.R. 117-000 (117th Cong., 2nd Sess.). Of course, to the extent that a potentially disqualified officer wished to prove that this public record was inaccurate or incomplete as relevant to them, they could attempt to do so in the relevant proceedings and to the relevant decisionmaker. See generally supra Part II.B.

[406] Supra Part IV.A.1. The fact that President Trump may have supported the insurrection, see infra II.C.2.b, does not change this. In our system the President is not "the government," and especially not when Congress is carrying out a constitutionally mandated role in supervising the transfer of power.

[407] See, e.g., January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 499-502, 530-531.

[408] Id. at 640-642.

[409] Id. at 646-647, 651-659.

[410] Id. at 502-510, 521-530.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

day was something quite different from more common acts of protest, even disruptive protest. January 6 was an insurrection.

To be sure, the events of January 6 itself—the attack on Congress and the Capitol—did not remotely rival in overall magnitude, or in sheer carnage, the experience of the U.S. Civil War, where more than 600,000 people died. Still, considered as discrete events, it is notable that more people died, and many more were injured, as a result of the January 6, 2021 attack on the Capitol than died or suffered injuries as a result of the attack on Fort Sumter. The events of January 6 match, in their essential elements—concerted resistance to federal authority, serious attempts to frustrate execution of national law, attacks on government officials and facilities, intimidation and violence—and arguably exceeded in their seriousness, the events of the Whiskey Rebellion, Fries' Rebellion, and other more limited historical insurrections. And at all events, it is less the magnitude or degree of disruption occasioned by an insurrection than whether it fits within the broad meaning of Section Three, as illuminated by evidence of its original meaning and historical understandings. As the Prize Cases teach, not every insurrection or rebellion ripens into a full-fledged war.[411] Most of the time, the authority of the state can nip it in the bud. But it is still an insurrection.[412]

Our assessment of the events of January 6, specifically, as an "insurrection" confirms the judgment made by public authorities: An act of Congress, to "award four congressional gold medals to the United States Capitol Police and those who protected the U.S. Capitol on January 6, 2021,"[413] found that the events of January 6 constituted an insurrection. The text of the act contains an official finding: "On January 6, 2021, a mob of insurrectionists forced its way into the U.S. Capitol building and congressional office buildings and engaged in acts of vandalism, looting, and violently attacked Capitol Police officers."[414] Another finding noted the historic magni-

---

[411] See supra Part IV.A.4.c.

[412] What about other disruptive, disorderly, even violent protests during the same time period? For instance, the many such events that erupted during the summer of 2020 in the wake of the police killing of George Floyd? So far as we can tell, none of these were covered by Section Three. Of course mere protest is not insurrection. Some of these protests devolved into riots, but even a riot is not necessarily an insurrection. And even if some of them went further, amounted to "concerted, forcible resistance to the authority of government to execute the laws in at least some significant respect," and met the definition of insurrection, they would seem to be insurrections against the state governments, not the United States, and thus outside the scope of Section Three. But of course if there were any other insurrections against the United States, Section Three applies to them all.

[413] Pub. Law. 117-32 (Aug. 5, 2021), 135 Stat. 322.

[414] Id. sec. 1(1). In the state Section Three proceedings against Marjorie Taylor Greene, supra notes 68-73 and accompanying text, the hearing officer cited this statute to conclude "Congress has characterized the Invasion as an insurrection." Initial Decision, Rowan v. Greene, No. 2222-582-OSAH-SEC-STATE-CE-57-Beaudrot, at 9-10 (Georgia Office of State Administrative Hearings, May 6, 2022). The hearing officer found it unnecessary to decide for himself, however, "Whether the Invasion of January 6 amounted to an insurrection." Id. at 18.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

tude and symbolic importance of that insurrection against democracy: "The desecration of the U.S. Capitol, which is the temple of American Democracy, and the violence targeting Congress are horrors that will forever stain our Nation's history."[415] The impeachment charges brought against President Trump as a result of January 6 were equally explicit in concluding that the events of January 6 constituted an insurrection. A majority of the House of Representatives approved (232 to 197) an article of impeachment charging then-President Trump with "incitement of insurrection" for the events of January 6th.[416] The Senate's vote to convict Trump of this charge, while falling short of the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution's impeachment process, constituted a substantial majority (57 to 43) of the Senate endorsing the House's charge and characterization. Majorities of both houses of Congress thus determined—at least twice—that January 6th was an insurrection; and in the impeachment proceedings majorities of both houses determined that Trump was responsible for having incited that insurrection.[417]

Finally, there is an additional possibility that we should see the events of January 6, 2021, as just one part of a broader "rebellion" against constitutional government, much like secession—actions seeking unlawfully to displace or replace the authority of lawful constitutional government and substitute a constitutionally unauthorized governmental authority in its stead.

We acknowledge that applying the term "rebellion" to the events of 2020-2021 goes beyond the Civil War era dictionaries. The attempt to overturn the 2020 election was neither an "open and avowed renunciation of the authority of the government," as Webster would have it, nor (outside of the insurrection of January 6) "the taking up of arms" or "forcible opposition" as Bouvier would have it.[418] It is not a perfect fit.

Nonetheless, consider the argument that the term "rebellion" could be used more broadly to describe a coup d'etat seeking to overthrow the constitutional order—including a so-called "bloodless" coup d'etat (where no force is used) and a successful "self-coup" of the bloodless variety[419] (where the existing unlawful regime commands such force that it need not be used). Consider the following chain of logical steps: 1. A military coup d'etat upending lawful government by use of force surely qualifies,

---

[415] Pub. Law. 117-32, sec. 1(4).
[416] H. Res. 24 (117th Cong., 1st Sess. Jan 25, 2021).
[417] For what it is worth, other scholars have also agreed that January 6th was an insurrection. See Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 23 n.65; Vlahoplus, supra note 404, at 1; Farah Peterson, Our Constitutionalism of Force, 122 Colum. L. Rev. 1539, 1622-25 (2022); see also Hemel, How-to Guide, supra note 5; Mark A. Graber, Treason, Insurrection, and Disqualification: From the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 to Jan. 6, 2021, Lawfare (Sep. 26, 2022) at https://www.lawfaremedia.org/article/treason-insurrection-and-disqualification-fugitive-slave-act-1850-jan-6-2021.
[418] See supra Part IV.A.2.
[419] See generally Daniel J. Hemel, Self-Coup and The Constitution, 37 Const. Comm. (forthcoming 2023).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

constitutionally, as a "rebellion." It is literally an effort unlawfully to overthrow constitutional government, by force. 2. It follows that a military coup d'etat upending lawful government by show or threat of force should be treated the same way, even though force was not used. 3. A military coup d'etat by the existing regime—a "self-coup," would seem, legally, to be the same thing. In such a case the regime does not seize power, by show or threat of force; it retains power by show or threat of force. But it is logically identical to situations #1 and #2. 4. A "bloodless" self-coup against the lawful regime, where no force is used because none is needed, should be treated the same as #3. Indeed, it seems fair to say that situation #4 is merely an instance of situation #3. 5. The same self-coup attempt, but that styles itself as not renouncing but instead as restoring or maintaining, the constitutional regime—but that in truth seeks to overthrow or defeat that regime—logically should be treated the same as #4. If one accepts this chain of reasoning, one might then fairly conclude that the entirety of the course of conduct attempting dishonestly and unlawfully to overthrow the 2020-2021 election constituted a "rebellion," even though this might stretch somewhat the dictionary definitions of the term.[420]

Calling the events of 2020 and 2021 "insurrection" or potentially even "rebellion" might seem to some exaggerated or hyperbolic. It is not. It is simply being legally precise and not shying away from difficult or upsetting consequences that flow from legal precision. We believe it is important to call the events of 2020 and 2021 by their true legal names, their right names, unshielded by artful euphemism.[421]

2. The Question of Participation: "Engaged in" and "Aid or Comfort"

This brings us to the rubber-hits-the-road question: Who all, by virtue of their personal, voluntary conduct, can be said to have "engaged in" insurrection or rebellion in connection with the efforts to overthrow the result of the presidential election of 2020 and unlawfully maintain Donald Trump in office as President of the United States? Additionally, perhaps, who might be said to have provided "aid or comfort" to those insurrectionists and rebels?

As detailed at great—perhaps excruciating—length above, "engaged in" under Section Three is properly understood to embrace a broad range of willful participatory

---

[420] In similar fashion, we note that—at least at first—the purported "secession" of a state from the Union was not universally acknowledged to be itself an act constituting "rebellion" as a legal matter It too did not fit perfectly the standard dictionary definition (unless and until force was used or threatened). But the logic of the matter led Lincoln—and Congress, and the Supreme Court—to conclude that secession, in practical and legal terms, was a species of "rebellion" and legally to be treated as such. See supra Part IV.A.4. As set forth in the text, the same logic suggests that conduct tantamount to an attempted coup d'etat (including attempting to maintain a defeated incumbent president in office, dishonestly and unlawfully) may fairly be characterized, legally, as "insurrection or rebellion."

[421] For the sake of completeness, we add that we think the events of 2020-2021 probably do not rise to the level of "treason" or "levying war" against the United States, though of course it is possible that further investigation will reveal truly treasonous conduct that is not yet on the public record.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

conduct. This includes, certainly, deliberate acts in the nature of planning, promoting, encouraging, counseling, supporting, materially assisting, advancing, or facilitating activity or plots that can fairly be characterized, legally, as "insurrection" or "rebellion." And, as noted, in certain circumstances it might well include inaction supporting insurrection. Finally, giving "aid or comfort" arguably expands the range of acts of participation, support, and encouragement that qualify as triggering Section Three's disqualification.[422]

Who, then, engaged in such behavior?

a. General Principles Concerning Culpable Participation

Some applications of Section Three are factually straightforward. Others might involve potentially more difficult questions of fact and proof concerning the degree and nature of an individual's voluntary and intentional participation in (i) the overall plot and concrete efforts to overthrow the election and install Trump as president re-elect; (ii) the assembly, instigation, and incitement of a mob to attack the Capitol on January 6, 2021 to prevent certification of the election outcome; or (iii) the willful failure to take action to suppress the attack on Congress while it was in progress.

As discussed in Part II, above, judgments concerning the application of the legal standards of Section Three to specific individuals may and must be made by a variety of public actors—all those whose responsibilities call for application of the Constitution's criteria for eligibility to hold office. The ultimate judgment will rest with different actors and institutions in different circumstances: sometimes by state election officials; sometimes by presidential electors; sometimes by state and federal executive branch officials; sometimes by the respective houses of Congress or by state legislatures. In many cases, the judgment ultimately will fall to state and federal courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court. Everybody in such positions is bound to apply Section Three faithfully and enforce its commands rigorously.

That said, from our interpretation of Section Three's broad sweep, it is clear that at least two purported factual defenses are simply immaterial:

First, it is no defense that an individual might claim that his or her conduct does not constitute having engaged in or supported "insurrection" or "rebellion" because the election was in fact stolen—that is, that Trump in fact won the election—making it legitimate to "stop the steal." The problem is that the premise is simply false. Decisionmakers can and should act on the well settled factual understanding that Joe Biden won, and Donald Trump lost, the election of 2020.[423]

---

[422] See generally supra Part IV.A.

[423] See not only the January 6 Report, supra note 405, but also John Danforth, Benjamin Ginsburg, Thomas B. Griffith, David Hoppe, J. Michael Luttig, Michael W. McConnell, Theodore B. Olson &

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Second, it likewise is no defense that an individual believed (even if mistakenly) that the election had in fact been stolen, or believed that their insurrectionary conduct was somehow lawful. That one may have been deluded or deceived by disinformation does not excuse acts of insurrection or rebellion. And as the South's secession and the resulting Civil War illustrate, a bogus and unsuccessful constitutional theory does not excuse them either. In other words, there is no mistake-of-insurrection defense to Section Three.[424] Acts intentionally done as part of what is in fact and in law insurrection or rebellion are covered, irrespective of an individual's wrong subjective belief that no such insurrection or rebellion occurred, or the reasons for such wrong belief.[425]

b. Section Three Disqualifies Donald Trump from Future Office

The most politically explosive application of Section Three to the events of January 6, is at the same time the most straightforward. In our view, on the basis of the public record, former President Donald J. Trump is constitutionally disqualified from again being President (or holding any other covered office) because of his role in the attempted overthrow of the 2020 election and the events leading to the January 6 attack.

The case for disqualification is strong. There is abundant evidence that Trump deliberately set out to overturn the result of the 2020 presidential election result, calling it "stolen" and "rigged";[426] that Trump (with the assistance of others) pursued numerous schemes to effectuate this objective; that among these were efforts to alter the vote counts of several states by force, by fraud, or by intended intimidation of state election officials,[427] to pressure or persuade state legislatures and/or courts unlawfully to overturn state election results,[428] to assemble and induce others to submit bogus slates of competing state electors,[429] to persuade or pressure Congress to refuse to count electors' votes submitted by several states,[430] and finally, to pressure the

---

Gordon H. Smith, Lost, Not Stolen: The Conservative Case that Trump Lost and Biden Won the 2020 Presidential Election (2022), https://lostnotstolen.org.

[424] This is consistent with principles of mens rea that distinguish knowledge of what one is doing from knowledge of the proper legal characterization of what one is doing. See, e.g., Counterman v. Colorado, 600 U.S. ___, at 4 n.2 (2023).

[425] Now what if the shoe were on the other foot? What if Trump had somehow succeeded in unlawfully holding apparent office after January 20, 2021? Would comparable actions by Biden supporters have constituted "insurrection"? We think not. The true facts matter. A rebellion against lawful government is rebellion, but acts of counter-insurgency against an attempted coup d'etat are not.

[426] And not that it matters, see supra Part IV.C.2.a, but it also appears that Trump knew that these accusations were false. See January 6 Report, supra note 405, 100-01, 103-04, 203, 213, 789.

[427] Id. at 202-203, 263-265; see also id. at 223-231,

[428] Id. at 296-300.

[429] Id. at 341-354.

[430] Id. at 431.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Vice President unconstitutionally to overturn state election results in his role of presiding over the counting of electors' votes.[431]

Leading up to January 6, Trump repeatedly solicited, suborned, and pressured Vice President Mike Pence to prevent the counting of the electoral votes in favor of President-elect Biden.[432] Not only that: Trump assembled a large crowd to march on the Capitol and intimidate Congress and the Vice President into complying with his wishes and thereby prevent the official counting of the votes of electors confirming Trump's defeat. Trump had announced on Twitter a protest to be held on January 6, 2021: "Big protest in D.C. on January 6th. Be there, will be wild!"[433] According to testimony amassed by the House's January 6th Commission, Trump's supporters interpreted this as a call to arms, sometimes literally.[434]

Then there are the events of January 6 specifically. When January 6 arrived, Trump delivered an incendiary address at the White House Ellipse to the crowd of supporters he had effectively summoned to the Capitol to oppose what he had been calling the "steal" of the election. Trump reiterated his false claim that he had in fact won the election—"we won this election and we won it by a landslide"—but that the Democrats and the media had "stolen" the election and "rigged" a false outcome. "They rigged it like they've never rigged an election before," he charged. "Make no mistake, this election was stolen from you, from me and from the country. … This [is] the most corrupt election in the history, maybe of the world." The crowd was "gathered together in the heart of our nation's capital for one very, very basic and simple reason: To save our democracy." Trump called on the crowd to march on the Capitol. "Our country has had enough. We will not take it anymore and that's what this is all about. … We will stop the steal." He urged the assembled mass of thousands, some of whom Trump knew to be armed, to "fight like hell, and if you don't fight like hell you're not going to have a country anymore."[435]

Some might quibble that the speech is ambiguous.[436] Not all of Trump's rambling address called literally for the crowd to "fight." Some of his statements were

---

[431] Id. at 441-458.
[432] Id. at 441-458.
[433] Quoted in id. at 499.
[434] Id. at 499-540.
[435] For the quotations in this paragraph, see "Transcript of Trump's Speech at Rally Before US Capitol Riot," Associated Press, (Jan. 13, 2021), available at https://apnews.com/article/election-2020-joe-biden-donald-trumpcapitol-siege-media-e79eb5164613d6718e9f4502eb471f27. See also id. ("And again, most people would stand there at 9 o'clock in the evening and say, 'I want to thank you very much,' and they go off to some other life. But I said something is wrong here, something is really wrong, can't have happened, and we fight. We fight like hell, and if you don't fight like hell you're not going to have a country anymore.").
[436] See Michael Conklin, Capital Offense: Is Donald Trump Guilty of Inciting a Riot at the Capital?, 15 U. St. Thomas J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 483 (2022); see also Alan Z. Rozenshtein & Jed Handelsman Shugerman, January 6, Ambiguously Inciting Speech, and the Overt-Acts Rule, 37 Const. Comm. at 2-3, 20-21 (forthcoming 2023).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ambiguous and at one point he remarked that the crowd would be marching "peacefully and patriotically."[437] He never directly and literally called for attacking the Capitol or the Vice President. Much of what might be thought incitement to lawlessness was innuendo. Nonetheless, the general and specific message was that the election had been stolen; that a constitutional fraud of colossal proportions and cataclysmic consequence was in the process of being perpetrated on the nation; that the crowd needed to take "strong" and direct action to protect the country; and that immediate action was necessary to prevent Vice President Pence and Congress from ratifying the unconstitutional election of an illegitimate president and doing irreparable damage to the nation.

These ambiguities have given rise to a debate about whether Trump's speech did or did not cross the strict incitement threshold of Brandenburg v. Ohio.[438] It could well be that it did cross the line: Trump had deliberately assembled the mob of supporters, steeled them to action, knew that they were ready to take immediate action, and directed them to take it.[439] But the most important thing is that the Brandenburg question is beside the point. Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment does not enact the legal standard of Brandenburg v. Ohio. It enacts the standards of participation in and support for "insurrection or rebellion," and it qualifies, modifies, or simply satisfies the First Amendment to the extent of any conflict between these constitutional principles.[440] First Amendment or no, the speech was part of Trump's participation in and support for the insurrection.

Finally, as events unfolded and the violence began, Trump maintained silence—and indeed deliberate indifference bordering on tacit encouragement—for what had by that time clearly become a forcible insurrection. For three hours after learning that his supporters had attacked the Capitol, Trump took no action to urge them to leave, despite being begged to do so by his advisors and despite having a constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.[441] During this same period, while the insurrection was in progress and after the Capitol had been breached, he again condemned Vice President Pence for not "hav[ing] the courage to do what should have been done to protect our Country and our Constitution,"[442] a statement that the January 6th Commission concluded was "a statement that could

---

[437] Transcript, supra note 435.

[438] 395 U.S. 444 (1969); compare Conklin, supra note 436, with Alexander Tsesis, Incitement to Insurrection and the First Amendment, 57 Wake Forest L. Rev. 971 (2022); see also Rozenshtein & Shugerman, supra note 436, at 3 n.3 (citing these and other sources and describing this disagreement).

[439] As Rozenshtein and Shugerman also emphasize, "Trump's speech was accompanied by several overt acts in furtherance of inciting an attack against the Capitol," which they argue takes it outside of the Brandenburg framework for that reason. Rozenshtein & Shugerman, supra note 436, at 38.

[440] See supra Part III.D (arguing that Section Three is not limited by the free speech principles of the First Amendment).

[441] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 577-606.

[442] Donald J. Trump, Tweets of January 6, 2021, available at https://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/documents/tweets-january-6-2021

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

only further enrage the mob" and that in fact apparently did so.[443] Once Trump finally did—after several hours and with great reluctance—direct his supporters to leave the Capitol, they quickly dispersed.[444]

This culpable inaction—failing to intervene to stop an insurrection in progress, declining to act to arrest a violent uprising, despite having both the capacity and responsibility to intervene—is another crucial part of Trump's responsibility for the January 6 insurrection. Section Three reaches a broad range of conduct providing meaningful assistance to or support for acts of insurrection or rebellion performed by others, even quite passively.[445] Sitting by and doing nothing—declining to act to arrest a violent uprising, despite possessing the material capacity and legal responsibility to intervene—might qualify. Additionally and equally important, Trump's deliberate inaction renders his January 6 speech much more incriminating in hindsight, because it makes it even less plausible (if it was ever plausible) that the crowd's reaction was all a big mistake or misunderstanding.

Taking these events as a whole, and judging them under the standard of Section Three, it is unquestionably fair to say that Trump "engaged in" the January 6 insurrection through both his actions and his inaction. Officials—administrators, courts, legislators—whose responsibilities call upon them to apply Section Three properly and lawfully may, indeed must, take action within their powers to preclude Trump from holding future office,

Moreover, if one accepts the broader argument that the entire campaign to overthrow the results of the 2020 election was a form of constitutional rebellion,[446] then Trump's complicity is even more obvious—as the leader, motive force, and chief attempted perpetrator of that rebellion. Indeed, it would not be going too far to say that Trump, having previously sworn a constitutionally required oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States knowingly attempted to execute what, had it succeeded, would have amounted to a political coup d'etat against the Constitution and its system of elections and overturn the results of the constitutional process, in order to maintain himself in office as President contrary to law. If that itself constitutes "rebellion" against the Constitution, Trump's overall

---

[443] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 577.

[444] Even as he urged peace in a video to the insurrectionists ("we can't play into the hands of these people. We have to have peace") he continued to express affection for them ("So go home. We love you. You're very special.") and to reiterate that the "election was stolen from us." Donald J. Trump, Videotaped Remarks During the Insurrection at the United States Capitol, at https://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/documents/videotaped-remarks-during-the-insurrection-the-united-states-capitol. Later that night he tweeted: "These are the things and events that happen when a sacred landslide election victory is so unceremoniously & viciously stripped away from great patriots who have been badly & unfairly treated for so long. Go home with love & in peace. Remember this day forever!" Trump Tweets, supra note 442.

[445] Cf. notes 350-351 and accompanying text (describing the exclusion of Senator-elect Phillip Thomas).

[446] See supra notes 418-420 and accompanying text.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

course of conduct disqualifies him under Section Three, even apart from the specific incitement to storm the Capitol on January 6.

The bottom line is that Donald Trump "engaged in" "insurrection or rebellion" and gave "aid or comfort" to others engaging in such conduct, within the original meaning of those terms as employed in Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. If the public record is accurate, the case is not even close. He is no longer eligible to the office of Presidency, or any other state or federal office covered by the Constitution. All who are committed to the Constitution should take note and say so.

c. Beyond Trump

Donald Trump is at the top of the list of Section Three disqualifications, but the list does not end with him. The public record to date shows many others who are or may be connected to either the insurrection of January 6 or to a possible broader rebellion. These include government lawyers, executive branch officials, state officeholders, and even members of Congress. It is not for us to definitively say who all these may be—that, as we have said, is ultimately the responsibility and judgment of all those whose public duties call upon them to apply the Constitution's provisions concerning officeholder qualifications. But to see why this responsibility is urgent, consider the following categories:

Consider first those who marched with—who rose up with—the January 6 mob itself. Some of these folks, such as Couy Griffin of New Mexico, and Derrick Evans of West Virginia, have already been stripped of or resigned from their state offices, as Section Three contemplates.[447] They present the easiest case of "engag[ing] in . . . insurrection." Open and shut.

But many more cases follow. Consider those who were not part of the uprising itself, but who provided planning, encouragement, assistance, or other material support to those who rose up on January 6. Recent proceedings against U.S. Representatives Biggs, Gosar, and Greene, for instance, raise this as a serious possibility.[448] Pennsylvania State Senator Doug Mastriano—who is also a retired military officer and recent gubernatorial candidate—is said to have transported busloads of people to what became the insurrection and "was near the Capitol during the attack."[449] Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani worked extensively to overturn the election, and likewise riled the mob at the Ellipse on January 6.[450] Trump Chief of

[447] See supra notes 85-88, 114-116 and accompanying text.
[448] See supra notes 68-80 and accompanying text.
[449] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 294. Such a claim was brought against Mastriano in federal court but dismissed on jurisdictional grounds. See supra note 89.
[450] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 536, 577, 581, 593-594, 608; https://www.rev.com/blog/transcripts/rudy-giuliani-speech-transcript-at-trumps-washington-d-c-rally-wants-trial-by-combat

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Staff (and former legislator) Mark Meadows planned and organized parts of the January 6 rally and apparently also "directed that [Giuliani] be allowed to speak" to the crowd.[451] These current and former officeholders are also subject to serious challenge under Section Three.

And if one entertains the argument that the entire course of conduct to overthrow the 2020 election was a broader rebellion,[452] the list just grows longer and longer. According to the public record: Former National Security Advisor General Michael Flynn proposed a plan to seize voting machines, invalidate election results, and rerun the vote in swing states won by Biden.[453] Would-be Trump electors (some of whom came from state political offices covered by Section Three) met on December 14 even in states where Biden's electors had been chosen, thus laying the groundwork for Trump's schemes.[454] Assistant Attorney General Jeffrey Clark sought to use the power and authority of the Department of Justice to fraudulently upend state election results.[455] At least one member of Congress pressed for the removal of more senior Department of Justice officials who opposed Clark's scheme, and lobbied for the appointment of Clark as Acting Attorney General, thus providing aid or comfort.[456] These officials, too, would be subject to challenge.

We could go on, but we have made the point: All persons who betrayed their earlier constitutional oaths by subsequently engaging in conduct (in any of a number of forms) directed at overthrowing the result of a lawful presidential election or supporting an attack on Congress and the Capitol, should face serious inquiry under Section Three. If they try to hold, retain, re-obtain, or seek public office, their eligibility for such positions should be stringently scrutinized. That inquiry should be conducted by every relevant level of government, from state election officials to the halls of Congress, to the courts throughout the country. In many cases we may not yet even know the full extent of the participation and support for acts of insurrection or rebellion in 2020-2021. But we must find out.

Taking Section Three seriously as part of our nation's operative, ongoing fundamental law means that such inquiries are constitutionally necessary. Indeed, they are constitutionally required. Taking Section Three seriously, as binding constitutional law, means faithfully ascertaining and fearlessly applying the objective, original meaning of its words and phrases, understood in their historical context, whether we like that meaning or not, and tirelessly following the logic of the text's meaning to its fair conclusions. The upshot of doing so, we think—the consequence of adhering to constitutional principle—may well be the disqualification from public office of a

---

[451] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 533, 535-536.
[452] See supra notes 418-420 and accompanying text.
[453] January 6 Report, supra note 405, 222.
[454] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 352-353. Several of these would-be electors previously held state and local offices, and so are covered by Section Three.
[455] January 6 Report, supra note 405, at 50.
[456] Id. at 50 (discussing actions of Pennsylvania U.S. Representative Scott Perry).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

great many more individuals than is generally recognized. In many cases, the inquiry has not yet begun. It is past time to start the reckoning.

Conclusion

Despite its long slumber, Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is alive and in force. It remains fully legally operative. It is constitutionally self-executing—that is, its command is automatically effective, directly enacted by the Constitution itself. And it is sweeping: It sweeps over earlier and inconsistent constitutional provisions. It sweeps in a broad range of conduct attacking the authority of the United States. And it sweeps in a broad category of former oath-swearing officeholders turned insurrectionists or aiders and comforters of insurrection or rebellion. It is enforceable by anybody whose duties provide occasion for judging legal eligibility for office. Indeed, each of these actors has a duty to faithfully apply Section Three. All possess legitimate constitutional interpretive authority to construe and apply this constitutional prohibition, many of them independently of other actors, including courts.

All of this has obvious, important, and immediate legal implications.

We the People should honor and vigorously enforce this important provision of our Constitution. It should not be allowed to become a dead letter from disuse. Its purpose, while inspired by specific historical events, is one of general and continuing importance. The idea that men and women who swore an oath to support the Constitution as government officials, but who betrayed that oath by engaging in or abetting acts of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, should be disqualified from important positions of government power in the future (unless forgiven by supermajorities of both houses of Congress) remains a valid, valuable, and we think vital precept. Disqualifying candidates and officials from office is not something to be done lightly, but Section Three was not enacted lightly. Section Three remains part of our Constitution, part of our nation's fundamental law. If we honor the Constitution, we must honor Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment.

That means that those who possess the power and duty to apply and enforce Section Three have a constitutional responsibility to do so, fairly but vigorously. If state election boards or secretaries of state determine that a candidate for state elective office or a candidate seeking to represent that state in Congress is constitutionally disqualified from holding that office, those state authorities should exercise the state-law powers they possess to remove ineligible candidates from the ballot. If the House or Senate determines that a person elected to serve as a member of such body is constitutionally disqualified from holding such a position, they should refuse to seat or expel that person. And if a candidate for President, or an already-elected President, is constitutionally disqualified from office by Section Three, then that disqualification should be enforced by state election officials, by electors, by Congress through the impeachment process, and by the Vice-President, cabinet and, Congress in carrying out the Twenty-fifth Amendment. In any and all these situations, and more, where the enforcement of Section Three's constitutional disqualifications is properly presented to the judiciary in a case over which a court possesses jurisdiction, it is the constitutional duty, province, and responsibility of federal and state judges exercising the judicial power to faithfully apply and enforce Section Three according to its terms.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

No official should shrink from these duties. It would be wrong – indeed, arguably itself a breach of one's constitutional oath of office—to abandon one's responsibilities of faithful interpretation, application, and enforcement of Section Three. It is wrong to shrink on the pretext that some other officials may or should exercise their authority—as if one's own constitutional obligations cease to exist if others fail to act. And it is wrong to shrink from observing, and enforcing, the Constitution's commands on the premise that doing so might be unpopular in some quarters, or fuel political anger, or resentment, or opposition, or retaliation. The Constitution is not optional and Section Three is not an optional part of the Constitution.

Importantly, it is also wrong to shrink from applying Section Three on grounds of "democracy," whether on the premise that Section Three should be ignored or narrowly construed because it limits who voters may choose, or on the premise that only the voters should enforce Section Three. It is true, as we have said, that limiting democratic choice is not something to be done lightly, but it is something the Constitution does, and for serious reasons.[457] The Constitution cannot be overruled or disregarded by ordinary election results. (And we note that there is particular irony in invoking democracy to shrink from applying Section Three to the insurrectionists of 2020-2021, who refused to abide by election results and instead sought to overthrow them.)[458]

Finally, we believe it would be wrong for courts to refuse to decide cases, otherwise lawfully within their jurisdiction, concerning Section Three on the pretense that such matters are "political questions." Outside of certain exercises of power to exclude, expel, or impeach and try, committed to each House's judgment, Section Three is enforceable by the judiciary as well as by other officials.[459] Section Three's terms embody rules and standards, enforceable as any other constitutional provision

---

[457] See Magliocca, Foreground, supra note 62, at 14-24 (arguing at length that "the democracy canon is a seductive but mistaken way of reading Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment," and that it "elevates a background constitutional principle in a way that is inconsistent with the text, purpose, and history of Section Three").

[458] See William Baude, The Real Enemies of Democracy, 109 Cal. L. Rev. 2407, 2418-20 (2021) ("The real enemies of democracy, at a more fundamental level, are those who try to ignore the rules of the game after they have already lost it. This past election, that means the real enemies of democracy were President Donald Trump and those who fought for him.").

[459] Supra note 95.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

is enforceable. There is no freestanding judicial power to abstain from enforcing the Constitution whenever doing so might be difficult or controversial.

We think that if these constitutional duties are taken seriously, there is a list of candidates and officials who must face judgment under Section Three. Former president Donald Trump is at the top of that list, but he is not the end of it. As we have said, it is not for us to say who all is disqualified by virtue of Section Three's constitutional rule. That is the duty and responsibility of many officials, administrators, legislators, and judges throughout the country. Where they are called on to decide eligibility to office, they are called on to enforce Section Three, applying the Constitution's legal standard to the facts before them in a given instance. Our point is to emphasize Section Three's continuing force, and broad sweep.

At all events, if a President or former President of the United States; a current or former officer of the federal executive branch; a Member or former Member of Congress; a current or former state legislator or state executive official; or a current or former federal or state court judge, planned, supported, assisted, encouraged, endorsed, or aided in a material way those who engaged in the insurrection of January 6, or otherwise knowingly and willfully participated in a broader rebellion against the constitutional system, such persons are constitutionally disqualified from office. In such situations, Section Three's constitutional disqualifications can, should, and must be carried out.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751

Chase 364

Case No. 5,815, Chase, 364; 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U.S. Cts. 93; 8 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 358; 25 Tex. Supp. 623; 2 Balt. Law Trans. 433; 3 Am. Law Rev. 784 [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia.

GRIFFIN'S CASE.

May Term, 1869.

Synopsis

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia.

Caesar Griffin, a negro, was indicted in the county court of Rockbridge county, for an assault with intent to kill. He removed his case as under the law he had the right to do into the circuit court for that county, and was there tried by a jury which found him guilty and assessed his punishment at imprisonment for two years in the penitentiary. He was accordingly sentenced by the court to that imprisonment. While on his way thither, in the custody of the sheriff of Rockbridge county, he sent out this writ which was served on the sheriff. That officer produced the petitioner in the district court then in session in Richmond, and made return to the writ that he held him by virtue of the conviction and sentence of the circuit court for Rockbridge county, making the record of the trial and conviction there a a part of his return. This return the petitioner traversed, denying that there was any court or judge in Rockbridge county as pretended by said pretended record, and that the paper exhibited was any record as alleged. The state of Virginia appearing by the attorney-general, Mr. _____, Judge H. W. Sheffey, the judge of the circuit court for Rockbridge by Bradley T. Johnson, Esq., and the sheriff by James Neeson, Esq. they joined issue on this traverse. The petitioner then proved that Judge Sheffey had been a member of the house of delegates in 1849. That in 1862, he was speaker of the house of delegates, and that his votes were recorded for affording men, money and supplies to support Virginia and the Confederate States, in the war then flagrant with the United States. It was admitted that he was duly appointed on February 22, 1866, by the then government of Virginia, to be judge of the circuit including the county of Rockbridge; that he immediately entered on the duties of that office, and that he has ever since and still is discharging the functions of the same.

The cause was argued at great length in the district court, before the district judge in December, 1868, who ordered the discharge of the petitioner, whereupon an appeal was prayed by the sheriff under the habeas corpus act of 1867 [14 Stat. 385], to the circuit court, and the petitioner admitted to bail. Before the circuit court could meet other writs of habeas corpus were sued out by other parties convicted of felonies, two of them of murder, on the same ground as in this case, and the petitioners were discharged. A motion was then made by James Lyons, Esq. in the supreme court of the United States for a writ of prohibition against the district judge, to restrain him from further exercise of such power. The supreme court advised on the motion, and never announced any conclusion, but shortly afterward the chief justice opened the circuit court at Richmond, and immediately called up the appeal in Griffin's Case. This statement is necessary for a full understanding of the pregnancy of the chief justice's statement that the supreme court agreed with him as to the decision he rendered in this case. In consequence of the failure to oust the state officers disfranchised under the fourteenth amendment by these and similar judicial proceedings, congress in February, 1869, passed a joint resolution directing that all such officers should be removed by the military commanders of military districts into which the late Confederate States had been divided. Thus all the old officers of the state government of Virginia were removed except a very few, and new ones appointed not obnoxious to the denunciation of the federal bar—the supreme court of appeals of Virginia; the judges thereof having been removed by the major general commanding, he appointed as judges in their stead, a colonel of his staff, and two others, who had held or did then hold commissions in the United States army. The president judge of the court performed his functions and drew his pay as colonel and judge advocate on the staff, overlooking the execution of the laws of the military, and at the same time those of presiding judicial officer of the state.

West Headnotes (6)

[1] Constitutional Law ⇐ Effect and Consequences

A construction of a constitutional amendment, which must necessarily occasion great public and private mischief, must never be preferred to a construction which will occasion neither, or neither in so great degree, unless the terms absolutely require such preference.

[2] Constitutional Law ⇐ Retroactive Operation

Persons in office, by lawful appointment or election, before the promulgation of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, were not removed therefrom by the direct and immediate effect of the prohibition to hold office contained in section 3 of such amendment, U.S.C.A. Const., and they could continue to perform their official functions until congress should act.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law ⇐ Particular Provisions

Persons in office, by lawful appointment or election, before the promulgation of the fourteenth amendment, U.S.C.A., were not removed therefrom by the direct and immediate effect of the prohibition to hold office contained in section 3, and they could continue to perform their official functions until congress should act.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law ⇐ Adoption of constitution and amendments

The recognition by the national government of the government established at Wheeling, Va., after the secession of the state, as the lawful government of Virginia, is binding on the judiciary.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Habeas Corpus ⇐ Courts; judges, magistrates, or officers

A person convicted by a jury and sentenced in court by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, cannot be properly discharged upon habeas corpus.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[6] Statutes ⇐ Construction of Amendatory and Amended Statutes

Of two constructions, either of which is warranted by the words of an amendment of a public act, that is to be preferred which best harmonizes the amendment with the general tenor and spirit of the act amended.

Attorneys and Law Firms

*9 Mr. Bundy, for petitioner.

The first question to be met in the argument of this case, is the question of the power of this court of your honor as circuit judge, sitting at chambers, to interpose the arm of federal authority and grant us the relief which we ask: Whether, or not, this court would have a right, independent of any express grant of power in the statute, to interfere for the protection of citizens of the United States who were held in custody in violation of the constitution or laws of the United States, is a question which, happily for the patience of the court, we are relieved from considering at all by the act of February 5, 1867, under which this proceeding is brought, the important section of which is as follows: 'Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, that the several courts of the United States, and the several justices and judges of such courts within their respective jurisdictions, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus, in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the constitution or of any treaty or law of the United States, and it shall be lawful for such person so restrained of his or her liberty to apply to either of said justices or judges for a writ of habeas corpus, which application shall be in writing, and verified by affidavit, and shall set forth the facts concerning the detention of the party applying, in whose custody he or she is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known; and the said justice or judge to whom such application shall be made, shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it shall appear from the petition itself that the party is not deprived of his or her liberty in contravention of the constitution or laws of the United States. Said writ shall be directed to the person in whose custody the party is detained, who shall make return of said writ, and bring the party before the judge who granted the writ, and certify the true cause of the detention of such person within three days thereafter, unless said person be detained beyond the distance of twenty miles, and if beyond the distance of twenty miles and not above one hundred miles, then within ten days, and if beyond the distance of one hundred miles, then within twenty days. And upon the return of the writ of habeas corpus, a day shall be set for the hearing of the cause, not exceeding five days thereafter, unless the party petitioning shall request a longer time. The petitioner may deny any of the material facts set forth in the return, or may allege any fact to show that the detention is in contravention of the constitution and laws of the United States, which allegations or denials shall be made on oath. The said return may be amended by leave of the court or judge before or after the same is filed, as also may all suggestions made against it, and thereby, the material facts may be ascertained. The said court or judge shall proceed in a summary way to determine the facts of the case, by hearing testimony, and the arguments of the parties interested; and if it shall appear that the petitioner is deprived of his or her liberty in contravention of the constitution or laws of the United States, he or she shall forthwith be discharged and set at liberty. And if any person or persons to whom such writ of habeas corpus may be directed shall refuse to obey the same, or shall neglect or refuse to make return, or shall make a false return thereto, in addition to the remedies already given by law, he or they shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by either, according to the nature and aggravation of the case. From the final decision of any judge, justice, or court, inferior to the circuit court, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which said cause is heard, and from the judgment of said circuit court, to the supreme court of the United States, on such terms and under such regulations and orders as well for the custody and appearance of the person alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty, as for sending up to the appellate tribunal a transcript of the petition, writ of habeas corpus, return thereto, and other proceedings as may be prescribed by the supreme court, or in default of such, as the judge hearing said cause may prescribe, and pending such proceedings or appeal, and until 10 final judgment be rendered therein, and after final judgment of discharge in the same, any proceedings against such person so alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty in any state court, or by or under the authority of any state, for any matter or thing so heard and determined or in process of being heard and determined, under and by virtue of such writ of habeas corpus, shall be null and void.'

 © 2023 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

It will be observed that the statute is so framed as to exclude, so far as language is able, all doubt or cavil as to what is the legislative will. No restrictive or ambiguous words, no qualifying clauses, no circuity of language, are employed. The fullest and largest powers are conferred upon the several courts of the United States, and the several judges and justices thereof: and to leave nothing to doubt as to the powers granted being cumulative, and in enlargement of the powers heretofore vested therein, it reads, 'in addition to the authority already conferred by law shall have power to grant, &c.' The necessary effect of such general and inclusive language is to render inapplicable to this case much of the judicial authority which two centuries of adjudication and discussion have thrown upon the nature and use of this ancient and beneficent writ.

From 1627, when the first statute of personal liberty—that of Charles Second of England—was wrung from kingly prerogative, down through our own Revolutionary annals, and at intervals ever since, crises have occurred in our national affairs which have called for the enlargement of the powers of courts by means of this remedial writ of habeas corpus, and so necessary a part has it become of our judicature that it has not inappropriately been termed the 'water of life to redeem from death of imprisonment.' Although the constitution (article 1, § 9) declared 'that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it,' yet without an act of congress to give it 'life and activity' it would only exist as a bare right without the appropriate means and rules for its exercise: Hence the judiciary act of 1789, prescribed the jurisdiction of the federal courts and justices under this writ. The fourteenth section of this act provides—'That all the before mentioned courts of the United States (supreme court, circuit court, and district court), shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law, and that either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus, for the purpose of inquiry into the causes of commitment, provided that writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in jail, unless when they are in custody under and by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify.' This statute was deemed sufficient for all the purposes of security to personal liberty, until the year 1833, when the hostile attitude assumed by South Carolina towards the general government, became the occasion for the passage of the act of March 2, 1833 [4 Stat. 634], which has especial reference to commitments by the courts and magistrates of the several states. It provides as follows: 'That either of the justices of the supreme court, or a judge of any district court of the United States, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases of a prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined on or by any authority of law, for any act done or omitted to be done in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process or decree of any judge or court thereof, anything in any act of congress, to the contrary notwithstanding.' Again, in 1842, the arrest and trial of Alexander McLeod by the state authorities of New York, upon the charge of burning the steamer Caroline in the Niagara river, and the apparent insufficiency of the statute to enable the general government to maintain good faith towards foreign nations, where the jurisdiction of a state had first attached, forced congress to pass the act of August 29, 1842 [5 Stat. 539], by which power was given justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts of the United States to grant this writ, for the purpose of bringing before them all persons who are committed or confined, or in the 'custody of' the authority of any state, on account of any alleged order or sanction of any foreign state, the validity or effect whereof depends upon the law of nations. During the late war, the powers of the federal courts were again still further enlarged by the act of March, 1863, to extend to a class of offenders who had fallen into military custody, and who, but for this act devised for their relief, might languish in prison without a trial.

Next in the order of legislation by congress is the act of February 5, 1867, under which this proceeding is brought, and this act, like its predecessors, is sui generis, and expressly framed for the emergency that called it forth. What was that emergency? And what the proper scope and purpose of this act? Blackstone lays down the rule for the interpretation of statutes in his Commentaries (volume 1, marg. pp. 50–60) as follows: 'We must consider the cause that moved the legislature to enact the law. The fairest and most rational method of devising the will of the legislator is, by exploring his intentions at the time when the law was made by signs the most natural and probable, and these signs are either the words, the context, the subject matter, the effect and consequences, 11 or the spirit and reason of the law.' The same rule is laid down by the United States supreme court in Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 114. They say—'In interpreting a law the motives which must have operated with the legislature in passing it are proper to be considered.' With this rule for our authority, let us glance at the condition of the country, at the date of the passage of this act (Feb. 5, 1867), and therefrom seek for the motives of congress in passing it.

At the surrender of the armed forces of the Rebellion, the officers and soldiers were paroled to go home, there to remain free from molestation as long as they continued faithful to the laws of the land. Beyond this nothing was settled by the surrender. Over all the territory comprised within the ten states lately in arms, civil governments and all political institutions were completely demolished. The then incumbents of state and municipal offices had sworn to support the constitution of the 'Confederate States of America' against all enemies, and especially against the authority of the United States. The surrender of her armies left the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of each state, and of the central Confederate power, without the breath of life. Over the whole territory civil government was prostrate, and the inhabitants reduced to disorganized communities. Then followed two years of fruitless experiment with the 'policy' of the president. No power able to speak the dead to life had raised its voice until congress passed the series of reconstruction acts over the presidential veto by the constitutional majority of two-thirds, and then, for the first time, the disjointed parts of the framework of southern society began to come together, and the revolted states were put in train for re-admission to all the rights and privileges in states of the Union. The grounds upon which congress based its action are clearly set out in the preamble to that act, and are as follows: 'Whereas, no legal state governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel states of Virginia, &c.; and, whereas, it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said states until loyal and republican state governments can be legally established, Therefore, be it enacted, &c.' That act first sweeps away the debris of the civil wreck that occupied the territory of the rebel states, and supplies its place by a military establishment with the fullest powers over life, liberty and property, only limited by the conditions, 'that no cruel or unusual punishment can be inflicted,' and no sentence of death can be carried into effect without the approval of the president. So complete is the substitution of the military for the civil power by the scope and tenor of this act, that without the special discretion given the district commander in the third section, to 'allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of, and to try offenders,' it was foreseen that he would be deprived of a useful means, familiar to the people, for the prevention and punishment of crime. But this permission to the district commander to 'allow the local tribunals,' &c., in no degree relieves him from his official responsibility to the government for the faithful execution of the laws. These local tribunals act only by his permission, and their acts have no validity or effect except as he 'allows' and approves them. This being the character of the tribunals known as 'courts,' within this state—little more than ministerial agents or agencies of the military commander—it is plain that many of the presumptions and maxims of the law that obtain in communities where the structure of civil society has remained undisturbed for many years, and where courts exist not by the orders of a military officer, but proprio vigore, do not here apply; for example, under the latter conditions of society, there is a presumption of law, that a 'man acting in a public capacity is duly authorized so to do,' and that 'the records of a court of justice have been correctly made according to the rule 'res judicata pro veritate accipitur," that 'the decision of courts of competent jurisdiction are well founded, and their judgments regular and legitimate,' &c., yet these presumptions, resting upon the general principle that the continued existence and regularity of long-established institutions will be presumed until the contrary is shown, can have no proper force within the unreconstructed states. But no correct interpretation of this act is possible without taking into one view all the other acts constituting the series of reconstruction acts. The first in order of these is the civil rights bill, then the joint resolution of June 16th, 1866, submitting, for ratification, to the several states, the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article. Then follows the habeas corpus act, and lastly, the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 428], to 'provide for the more efficent government of the rebel states,' and the acts amendatory thereof. Of this series of reconstruction measures only two, the constitutional amendment, and the habeas corpus act, are permanent in their nature. The other two are mere scaffolding, to be removed when they have served their temporary purpose in building up the strong pillars of the constitutional amendment. Although a considerable period of time elapsed between the passage of the first and last of these laws, the congressional history of that period will show that they were under consideration by the national legislature at the same time, and each was passed in view to its mutual and combined operation with the others. In this relation, then, should they be interpreted by the courts.

The facts in this case, as set forth in the petition, are briefly these: Caesar P. Griffin was tried in September last upon a charge of felony, and thereof convicted by the circuit 12 court of Rockbridge county, Hon. Hugh W. Sheffey presiding as circuit judge. It is set out in the petition and fully proved upon the trial, that Hugh W. Sheffey falls within the class of persons who are expressly disqualified and forbidden by the fourteenth article of the amendments of the constitution from holding any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state. We claim, therefore, that being so disqualified to perform the functions of a judge, by constitutional prohibition, his acts as such judge are wholly null and void, and therefore, that the officer holding the petitioner in custody, having no valid authority in law for his detention, must be ordered by this court to discharge him. The return of the respondent merely sets out as his authority for holding the petitioner, the record of his trial, conviction and sentence: claiming for the court the authority of a de facto court, and for the record that it can not be disputed in any other court, whether state or national. The petitioner denies the truth of the return in toto, and reaffirms the allegations in his petition, thus putting squarely at issue both the legal validity and the authentication of the proceeding of the pretended court. The third section of the amendment provides that 'No person shall . . . hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of congress, or as an office of the United States, or as a member of any state legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state, to support the constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; but congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disabilities.' In the interpretation of this section of the amendment, it is important to know the proper and generally accepted meaning of the word 'hold'—as upon the signification of that word much of the force of the argument rests. Webster defines the word, to hold 'to stop, to confine; to restrain from escape; to keep fast, to retain,' and he remarks—'It rarely or never signifies the first act of seizing or falling on, but the act of retaining a thing when seized on or confined.'

I respectfully submit to the court the following propositions as applicable to this case, and as well founded in law. I. That the fourteenth article of the amendment acts proprio vigore, and without the aid of additional legislation to carry it into effect. II. That it is binding upon all courts, both state and national, and that every United States judge is required by his oath of office to take cognizance thereof. III. That the holding of the office of circuit judge by Hugh W. Sheffey, after the proper announcement that this amendment had been ratified, was a daily usurpation of office in open defiance of the highest law of the land. IV. That Hugh W. Sheffey being so disqualified and prohibited from holding any office, he was not in law a judge, either de jure or de facto, and his acts as a pretended judge have no legal validity whatsoever, but are simply trespasses. V. That the act of February 5th, under which this proceeding is brought, authorizes this court to inquire into the authority by which the petitioner is deprived of his liberty, and to determine whether that authority is exercised in contravention of the constitution of the United States, and in such case to grant the prayer of the petitioner.

It is sufficient in support of the first proposition to cite the proclamation of the secretary of state, of the date of July 28, 1868, reciting among other things the joint resolution of the two houses of congress declaring the fourteenth article of the amendments duly ratified and adopted as a part of the constitution of the United States, and following with his own official declaration in these words: 'And I do further certify, that the said amendment has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the constitution of the United States,' and the formal recognition of the same fact by the judiciary in the person of the chief justice of the supreme court, in his charge to the grand jury at Wheeling, West Virginia, in August last. The second proposition is supported by the constitution itself (article 6, § 2), which declares—'This constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.' The truth of my third proposition necessarily follows from the two former.

The first serious difficulty is met in the support of the fourth proposition. We are met at the threshold of the inquiry with the objection that whatever may have been the personal disqualifications of Hugh W. Sheffey, his official acts are those of a de facto judge, and as such, they are shielded by the law from question in any other court, except upon writ of error or appear. But this is to beg the whole question. Exactly what we are contending for, and have set up and proved in this case, is that Hugh W. Sheffey was not, on the day of the trial of the petitioner, a judge in any character, either de facto or de jure, being then expressly disqualified and prohibited from holding such office, and that his acts are purely trespasses. It will be observed that the objection is not that we do not go the right way about this inquiry, but that the petitioner can not make the inquiry at all. We will suppose that a subject of some foreign power had sat in Sheffey's place, and had been able by force or fraud to usurp the powers of a court for the time being, and had sentenced the petitioner to be hanged, and 13 this court had been called upon at the last hour to interfere by habeas corpus. Would it be a sufficient return to this writ to set out the record of his trial and conviction, attach thereto a seal, and under the protection of that seal, to claim for the court proceedings, whatever may have been their character, absolute immunity from investigation? and yet the objection must go so far as this or it is good for nothing; and this rule once adopted within the territory of Virginia, the habeas corpus act of 1867 becomes a dead letter, and there is absolutely no right of appeal to the federal courts in the very class of cases that this act was devised and intended to meet. Again, if this rule that we can not go behind a court record by this proceeding, is to prevail, what is to prevent Lynch law from overriding all legal authority: providing only, the 'regulations' can obtain a court seal with which to cover the record of their violence? Suppose Judge Lynch were to open his court at some four corners within this state for the trial of a band of horse-thieves. The 'jury' arraign the prisoners, hear the evidence, and condemn them to death; one of them has powerful friends who sue out a writ of habeas corpus in his behalf; he is brought before the United States circuit court, with the cause of his detention duly certified by the pretended officer, who sets out in his return that he holds the prisoner by virtue of a judgment and sentence of a 'court' (meaning Judge Lynch's court), which has found him guilty of horse-stealing. Would this court be debarred from inquiry into the jurisdiction of such a judge, and from discharging the prisoner, merely because the mob have proceeded under the forms of law? and hence are a de facto court? And yet such a tribunal has as much claim to power as the circuit court for Rockbridge county. Both are illegal tribunals for want of judicial authority; and the judgments of both, however righteous in themselves, are absolutely void; for such a court has no more power to render a just than an unjust judgment, and no power at all to render either the one or the other, because both tribunals are forbidden by the supreme law of the land. No human being in this country can exercise any kind of public authority, which is not conferred by law, and under the United States it must be conferred by the special words of a written statute. While it is true that I have not been able to find any adjudicated case that could be followed as a precedent in the case now before the court, the sufficient reason for that is found in the fact that no historical parallel for the political and civil condition of this state is known to exist. For certain purposes Virginia is a conquered territory, while for certain other purposes she is held never to have severed her relations with the Federal government as a state. But whatever may be the present practical relations of the state to the general government, the allegiance of the people comprised within her limits, was never successfully withdrawn. In the language of Chief Justice Chase, in Shortbridge v. Macon [Case No. 12,812], an opinion delivered in Raleigh, North Carolina in June, 1867, under the reconstruction act. 'On no occasion, however, and by no act have the United States ever renounced their constitutional jurisdiction over the whole territory, or over all the citizens of the Republic, or conceded to citizens in arms against the country the character of alien enemies, or to their pretended government the character of a de facto government.'

But independent of the habeas corpus act, there are many decisions of authority that stop but little short of the extent to which we contend this right of one court to inquire into the legal authority of another should be carried. The supreme court of the United States in Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 540, says: 'It is a well settled rule in jurisprudence, that the jurisdiction of any court exercising authority over a subject may be inquired into in every other court where the proceedings in the former are relied upon, and brought before the latter by a party claiming the benefit of such proceedings. The rule prevails, whether the decree or judgment has been given in a court of admiralty, chancery, ecclesiastical court, or court of common law, or whether the point ruled has risen under the laws of nations, the practice in chancery, or the municipal laws of states.' This court applied it as early as the year 1794, in the case of Glass v. The Betsey, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 7; again, in 1808, in the case of Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 241; afterwards, in 1828, in Elliott v. Piersol (in case of ejectment) 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 328, 340. In the last case it is said—'Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decisions be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court. But if it act without authority its judgment and orders are nullities; they are not voidable, but simply void.' See likewise, Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 499; Schriver v. Lynn, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 59; Lessee of Hickey v. Stewart, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 750; also, Serg. Const. Law, 286; U. S. v. Almeida [Case No. 14,433]; and Mead v. Deputy Marshal [Id. 9,372]; case of Ex parte Pleasants [Id. 11,225]; also case of Ex parte Randolph [Id. 11,558]. This right to inquire into the validity of a judgment has been so repeatedly exercised by all the states, that I do not deem it necessary to cite more than two or three cases. In Massachusetts the question was made in 1814. Com. v. Harrison, 11 Mass. 63. On the trial of this case, counsel for the defense cited the opinion of Kent, C. J., in Ferguson's Case, 9 Johns. 239, that the state courts have no jurisdiction in cases of this kind. The court answered very briefly, but emphatically—'This court has authority, 14 and it will not shun the exercise of it, on proper occasions, to inquire into the circumstances under which any person brought before them by a writ of habeas corpus is confined or restrained of his liberty.'

While upon this general subject, what defects will render judgment and process absolutely void, I will cite two leading cases, that of Brooks v. Adams, 11 Pick. 441, where it is held that jurisdiction may be shown to be defective in the organization of the court, and Slocum v. Simms, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 363, where it is held by Chief Justice Marshall that a judgment may be defective in respect to the qualification of the officer, where a magistrate was held incompetent to sit in the discharge of a debtor under the insolvent laws of Virginia, and the judgment of discharge rendered by magistrates, of which he was one, was declared to be wholly void: and this too when this decision was against personal liberty, and its effect the recommittal of the bankrupt to prison, where the law should receive a restrained construction. See, also, Hill v. Wait, 5 Vt. 124, and Bates v. Thompson, 2 D. Chip. 96, for the effect upon a judgment where the justice is related to one of the parties, and therefore disqualified by statute. But it is sometimes said that the judges in Virginia, holding their offices directly under the authority of the military district commander, they are not accountable to any civil tribunal. The answer we make to this, is, that we are not trying nor seeking to try Hugh W. Sheffey. We are merely trying the effect of this judgment, and that depends upon his legal authority to make it. If he had no such authority—if the usurped a jurisdiction which the law had forbidden him any longer to exercise, then his acts are absolutely void, and no military order from whatever source can make them valid; for says the supreme court in Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 120, 121, 'The constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances.' So that whatever may have been the right of the district commander to employ or 'allow' courts of this character to try offenders before the ratification of the fourteenth article, he certainly had no such right or authority after the ratification of that article, because it then became a law to him as well as to the courts. The language of the third section of the fourteenth article is, that 'no person shall hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any state.' This language is in the alternative, and if the officer in question be found to belong to either the one or the other of these classes, then the constitutional prohibition applies, and the incumbent who falls into the disqualified class of persons, was on July 28, 1868, divested of his judicial powers and authority, and became that day, in the fullest sense of the word, functus officio. But it is sought to break the force of these deductions by the suggestion, that the constitution has no application nor force in the unreconstructed states. If so, when was it withdrawn by the general government, or when was it thrown off by Virginia? Did congress, by the act of March 2, 1867, design to withdraw the constitution from the states to which that act applies? It is not denied that such an act might have been done by the law-making power, but certainly it is not conceivable that it would be done by a mere implication, without express words of solemn enactment. And that it was not done, is sufficiently evidenced by the notorious fact that the highest court of the nation had under consideration at its last session, and still has, undecided, the question of the constitutionality of this very act. But it is an indignity offered to this court to assert that it is now sitting for a judicial district that is situated without the pale of the constitution, unless forsooth that pleasant fiction of the law of nations that clothes our ambassadors to foreign courts with an atmosphere of our own nationality can be applied to our federal judges, and they can be said to reside 'near' the city of Richmond in the province of Virginia, as the former are said to reside 'near' the court of St. James and St. Cloud. But the judge must then fetch and carry the constitution with him, for it is his own 'vital breach,' and his coming and going would indeed mark the summer and winter solstice of this dreary blank in the republic.

If, then, the constitution of the United States is in force within this state, and 'is a law for rulers and people,' the plain infraction of its provisions, by Hugh W. Sheffey, in trying and committing the petitioner, furnishes the occasion for which the remedy provided by congress in the habeas corpus act of February 5, 1867, may be rightfully invoked; for that act empowers judges and courts 'to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty, in violation of the constituion of the United States.' The objections to this theory are variously stated, but they can mainly be resolved into two, one of which, at least, is founded in a misapprehension of the effect and nature of this remedy. It is said by those whose dependence upon the honor or profits of office, seems to have quickened their sensibilities to the dangers of any scrutiny into their qualifications, that we cannot attack the authority of a judge in such a collateral proceeding; that our proper remedy is by proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto, and they add, that this can only be carried on by the supreme authority of the state. This has already been answered by showing that the object had in view by us, is not to unseat Hugh W. Sheffey, and no judgment of this court can have that effect. The public discussion of this question will doubtless tend to call public attention to the effrontery of his pretension that he can continue to perform the functions of a judge in 15 daily defiance of the supreme law of the land. But the direct and avowed purpose sought by this petition, is the release of Caesar P. Griffin from unlawful imprisonment, and beyond this the court is neither asked nor expected to go.

The remaining objection to granting the prayer of the petitioner is found in the principle sought to be applied to this case, that the acts of a 'judge de facto, if within the rightful jurisdiction of the office he exercises, are as valid and binding as the acts of an officer de jure.' The term 'de facto' from being applied to officers acting colore officii, and with apparent authority of law, has in this argument been used to describe every species of pretender to official character, however disqualified or prohibited he may be by law. This is certainly a great latitude of interpretation, and must have the effect to obscure or destroy the original and true meaning of the expression. According to the argument upon the other side it seems only necessary, in order to establish for any man the character of a de facto judge, to prove actual manual possession of the bench, and control of the seal, no matter how obtained. This argument, if carried out, would give full faith and credit to judicial acts of a deposed judge, done after conviction of impeachment, or judgment of ouster in a proceeding by quo warranto, and provided only the pretender were bold enough, he might perpetuate his offical character. In the 1st volume of J. J. Marshall's (Ky.) Reports (pages 206, 207) may be found the case of Hildreth's Heirs v. McIntire's Devisee, where Judge Robertson discusses at length the proper limits to be given to the use of the term 'de facto' in a state that is under a written constitution. The case arose upon an attempt of the legislature of Kentucky to supersede the court of appeals, and to provide a new court in its place. Under the new law four judges were duly appointed, and organized by the appointment of a clerk. An appeal was taken from Bourbon county to the court of appeals, and by them dismissed, because the record was not filed with F. P. Blair, who was acting as clerk to them. A certificate of dismissal signed by Blair, as clerk of the court of appeals, was presented to the clerk of the court of Bourbon, and though objected to by the counsel of the appellants, was received and entered upon the record of the court, and thereupon a habere facias was qirected to issue to carry into effect the original decree, to reverse which the appeal had been granted. Says the court—'The only question presented for our decision is whether the court erred in obeying the mandate of Messrs. Barry, &c., certified by F. P. Blair, and a solution of this question depends on another, viz., whether Barry, &c., were judges of the court of appeals, and Blair its clerk. Although they assumed the functions of judges and clerk, and attempted to act as such, their acts in that character are totally null and void, unless they have been regularly appointed under and according to the constitution. A de facto court of appeals cannot exist under a written constitution which ordains one superior court, and defines the qualifications and duties of its judges, and prescribes the mode of appointing them . . . Where there is a constitutional executive and legislature, there cannot be any other than a constitutional judiciary. Without a total revolution, there can be no such political solecism in Kentucky, as a de facto court of appeals. There can be no such court whilst the constitution has life and power. There has been none such.'

With him, L. H. Chandler, U. S. Dist. Atty.; H. H. Wells, Military Governor of Virginia.

Bradley T. Johnson, for Judge Sheffey.

The petitioner in this case was regularly indicted, tried, and convicted in the circuit court for Rockbridge county, of a felony under the laws of Virginia, and sentenced, according to the verdict of the jury which tried him, to imprisonment for two years in the penitentiary. While on his way thither, in the custody of the sheriff of that county, in obedience to the mandate of the court and the requirement of the law, the steps of that officer are arrested by the writ of habeas corpus issuing out of this court on the petition of the party. He applies to be discharged from custody, alleging that he is detained under color of a pretended judgment—pretended to have been entered by a pretended court, presided over by a pretended judge. He then charges that Hugh W. Sheffey, who acted as judge on his trial, which took place since the adoption of the constitutional amendment, was in law no judge at all, he having been disqualified from acting after the adoption of the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article; Judge Sheffey having taken the oath to support the constitution of the United States, and acted in a legislative office in the state of Virginia, and afterwards aided the Rebellion. To the writ, the sheriff makes return, producing the prisoner, that he holds him by virtue of a conviction for felony, and sentence thereon, of the circuit court for Rockbridge county, and that he was on his way to take him to the penitentiary when the writ was served. He exhibits the record of trial, conviction, and sentence of the Rockbridge court as part of his return. The petitioner files a reply or traverse to this return, denying that there is any court as alleged, or any judge as alleged, or that the paper produced and exhibited as a record is any record as alleged.

On this traverse the state joins issue. The petitioner then offered evidence: 1. To prove that Judge Sheffey was a member of the house of delegates of Virginia in 1849; and, 2. That in 1862, beng speaker of the then house of delegates, he voted men, money, and supplies to support the state of Virginia and the Confederate States, in the war then waging 16 with the United States. To this evidence the state objected; but the court admitted it, and the state excepted. The petitioner then read from the journals of the house of 1849 and 1862 to prove these facts, and also by a former clerk of the senate who had been clerk since 1853, that it was the custom for members of the senate to produce to the clerk a certificate from a justice of the peace or other proper officer that such member had duly taken all the oaths required by the constitution to be taken. No evidence was offered that Judge Sheffey, as member of the house of delegates, took the oath to support the constitution of the United States. It was then admitted that the Hugh W. Sheffey mentioned in the journals of 1849 and 1862 was the same Hugh W. Sheffey who sat on the trial of the petitioner; and further it was admitted, that Hugh W. Sheffey was on the 22d day of February, 1866, duly appointed by the then existing government of Virginia to be judge of the circuit including the county of Rockbridge; that he immediately entered on the duties of that office, and that he has ever since, and still is, discharging the functions of the same. These are the facts on which the petitioner asks his discharge.

The proposition on which he bases his claim is this. That Judge Sheffey has been rendered ineligible as judge by the adoption of the constitutional amendment, and therefore all his acts since that period are void; in other words, that the acts of an officer illegally in office being void, the consequences of those acts are also void. A proposition so monstrous in its results, so extraordinary in its application to all the affairs of men, which strikes at the very foundation of civil society, deserves strick examination and careful investigation, if it be law. If it be not law, it must be peremptorily thrust out of a court of justice, branded with all the ignominy of judicial denunciation. If the acts of officers disfranchised by the constitutional amendment are void, and of no effect, then judgments rendered, decrees made, deeds acknowledged and recorded, wills proved, notes protested—all fall with the ineligible officer. If these acts of theirs are void, all acts are void; although qualified themselves, they may have been sworn into, appointed, or elected to office by disqualified officers. The source being corrupt, the whole stream of consequences partakes of that corruption. Disqualification from bribery, dueling, non-residence, age, citizenship, or alienage, all work the same result. If a judge is appointed by a legislature, some of whose members are disqualified from holding their seats, then his appointment, according to this argument, is void, and his acts are void. The legislature itself may all be eligible, but some members may have been elected by illegal votes. Therefore the acts of the legislature, being vitiated by the original taint of illegaility, all the consequences flow from it. If a constitution be adopted by illegal votes, then all officers under it become mere intruders and pretenders to official functions. The existence of this very fourteenth article itself may be attacked in precisely the mode the judicial functions of Judge Sheffey are sought to be invalidated. One of the state legislatures at least, adopted it by the votes of members who were afterwards declared ineligible, and their seats vacated; and under this theory of law, the inquiry might be pursued, until it was found that it had never received the assent of a sufficient number of legal legislatures composed of legal members duly sworn in by legal officers, and elected by legal voters. The statement of such a proposition is its own sufficient refutation. If it be true, no legal act, no legal existence anywhere is secure. All may be attacked by showing that somewhere, at some time, some person disqualified by law from holding office contributed by some official act to it. That established, the whole falls.

I propose to show that no such proposition has been sanctioned in any court for centuries of any such principle of law, and that an unbroken current of authorities in this country, and in England, against it, is never rippled by a dissenting or even objecting opinion from any court, any judge, or any law-writer. The writ of habeas corpus is the writ of right, say the fathers of the law; but it is in no case a writ of error, and it never had been used to review the decisions of other tribunals. From the earliest times down to later days it has been universally held that where the party applying for it appeared on his own application to be committed by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, the writ would be refused him, or that where such commitment appeared on the return to the writ, that such return was conclusive. This is the settled law of habeas corpus in England and here. Crosby's Case, 3 Wils. 188;3 Wils. 188; Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 45;Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506. The only inquiry that could be made was: 1. Had the court jurisdiction over the subject and the subject-matter? and, 2. Did that jurisdiction legally attach Sir William Chancey's Case, 12 Reporter [Coke] 82; Goldswain's Case, 2 W. Bl. 1207; Gardener's Case, Cro. Eliz. 821; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 15, § 78; People v. Cassels, 5 Hill, 164? And this was the law of the federal courts under the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], which authorized them to issue writs of habeas corpus, 'agreeably to the principles and usages of law.' In the course of time, however, collisions became inevitable between the concurrent state and federal jurisdictions.

Parties might be deprived of their liberty contrary to the laws of the United States. The slow process of writ of error from the state courts contemplated by the judiciary act was utterly ineffectual as a remedy for such wrong, and the writ of habeas corpus, 17 the return showing the party to be held by judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, could afford no relief. Besides, in many states the record on writ of error would disclose nothing contrary to federal laws and federal right. A party might be indicted, tried, and convicted for robbery, and the record would only show that charge, no bill of exceptions being allowed in criminal cases at common law, or in states adhering to common law. The appeal, therefore, to the federal tribunal would be vain, while in truth and fact the robbery for which the party was convicted was collection of federal taxes. To meet such cases, the jurisdiction in habeas corpus was extended by the act of 1833, which provided, that whenever any officer of the United States was in custody, for any act done or omitted to be done by federal authority, then the federal court might on habeas corpus inquire into all the circumstances of his committal or conviction, and vindicate his federal rights. This act extended over all officers of the Federal government, the perfect and complete panoply of the federal jurisdiction, and secured them perfect protection for all acts done by them in the execution of their office. Though passed to force South Carolina, attempting to nullify, it was never practically operative until applied to cases arising under those state laws which actually did, by personal liberty acts, nullify the laws of congress and the constitution of the United States. And the federal judges, without exception, applied the law, and protected officers of the United States in the discharge of their duties. They released them when held by state authority in definance of their federal rights. U. S. v. Morris [Case No. 15,811]; Ex parte Sifford [Id. 12,848]; Ex parte Jenkins [Id. 7,259]. After this, however, it was found that other cases might arise requiring federal intervention to protect other cases of violated right. McLeod committed a felony within the jurisdiction of the state of New York, and was tried for it by the state authorities. The government of Great Britain, whose officer he was, assumed the responsibility of his act, and under the law of nations, the agent should have been released, and the principal alone held responsible. New York, however, refused to release McLeod, and in consequence, the act of 1842 was passed, extending federal protection to all aliens held anywhere, by any authority, in violation of treaty rights, or those under the laws of nations. Treaty rights, created by federal authority, or international rights, recognized and guaranteed by federal authority. This law also was to intervene the federal authority to protect federal rights. The act itself is in the main a copy of the act of 1833, so far as those provisions go, which give the federal courts the right to inquire into the cause of commitment. By these two acts of congress, therefore, the aegis of the federal power was thrown around its officers and those aliens partaking of its hospitality. Those two classes alone were thus secured by this prompt and efficient remedy from any infringement of rights secured to them by the federal authority. They could not be obliged, when held to answer in a state court, to wait the slow process of trial there, appeal to the state supreme tribunal, and thence to the supreme federal court, with the certainty in many cases, as I have shown, of being unable to prove by the record in what manner their rights were injured. Whenever they were injured, habeas corpus afforded a remedy, simple and prompt. But no other person had such a right. A citizen of one state, going into another state, might there be molested in some mode contrary to his federal rights, and if his liberty was restrained, his only remedy was by process of appeal or writ of error. Prior to 1867, it was considered necessary to remedy this omission in the law. It was charged that many southern states, under the pretense of labor, police, and vagrant laws, were endeavoring to evade the force of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and were shaping their policy so as to restore the substance of involuntary servitude, under the name of penalty for crimes. Therefore the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 385], was passed, extending the habeas corpus to all cases where any person was restrained of his liberty, contrary to the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. It is a copy of those provisions of the acts of 1833 and 1842, as to the right of the court to examine into the cause of detention, whether by judgment of a court or otherwise, and in effect strikes out the provisions limiting the application of the act of 1833 to officers of the United States, and of 1842 to aliens, and inserts, instead of those provisions, the words, 'all persons restrained of their liberties, in contravention of the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.' The federal protection before extended only to federal officers and federal guests, i. e., aliens, was now made to embrace all persons, citizen and alien, officers, and those who wanted to be officers, of the federal government; in fact, all mankind. 'It brings within its scope,' says Chase, C. J., 'every possible case of privation of liberty, contrary to the laws, constitution, or treaties of the United States. It is impossible to widen the jurisdiction.' Ex parte McCardle, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 326.

The writ of habeas corpus, therefore, when issued by a federal court, embraces every case where a person is alleged to be deprived of his liberty in contravention of the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States. And the court issuing the writ is authorized in every case to go behind every return, and to pass upon the facts in every case, and if it appear that the party applying is injured in his federal rights, then such court is authorized to protect him by discharging him, whether committed on a charge of, or on a conviction for, crime. Therefore, it only remains 18 to this court to inquire if this person, the petitioner, is deprived of his liberty, contrary to the constitution, the laws, or the treaties of the United States? Has he, by state authority, been injured in his federal rights? The first question that presents itself is, What are his federal rights? 1. Those secured by treaty or under the laws of nations do not apply in this case. 2. Those enuring to federal officers to be protected in their functions are not involved here. 3. The federal rights secured by the constitution to all persons are: (1) The right of every citizen of a state to be secured in those rights in every other state, which provision is universally construed to mean civil rights as distinguished from political rights. (2) The rights of trial by jury as secured by the reservations in the original amendments to the constitution. (3) The right to be secured against involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime. (4) The right to a republican form of government. In this proceeding, this court is to inquire if this petitioner has been injured in any of these federal rights? Has be been denied any of them? If, on a full investigation of all the facts, without regard to the form of the record, it is found that he is denied federal rights, then he is to be discharged; if not, he is to be remanded.

No question as to form of government, or to involuntary servitude, or to the rights of citizens of different states enjoying all the civil rights of citizens of this state, arises in this case, and therefore the first, third, and fourth sub-divisions of rights have no application. The only question to be considered is whether the petitioner has been denied his right to be tried by a jury? The universal judgment of all courts, federal and state, heretofore has been that this right is only to secure a trial by jury in federal courts. But for the sake of the argument, we concede that every person within the United States, has a right to the trial by jury, according to the course of the common law. This is the extreme proposition in favor of the petitioner, and although against the law, we concede it for the purpose of this argument. This court is therefore to inquire, whether the petitioner has been deprived of his right to a trial by jury, according to the course of the common law? Admitting that this is a federal right, we are limited to the inquiry as to whether it has been infringed in this case. It is charged that, although tried by jury, under a law denouncing a penalty against a felony, equally applicable to all persons, triable and punishable in the same way as to all persons, citizens, aliens or officers, without regard to color, state or condition, still, nevertheless, the judge being disfranchised by the constitution of the United States from sitting as judge, that the trial was no trial; was contrary to that constitution, and that thereby the petitioner was deprived of his federal rights, and denied a trial by jury which implies the presence of a legal judge. That Judge Sheffey, being constitutionally ineligible from the moment of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, became eo instanti dead as a judge, and by no possibility could be author of a legal trial of any person.

I shall first admit, for the purpose of this argument in this place, that Sheffey was, by the adoption of the constitutional amendment on July 28, 1868, rendered ineligible for his office, and from that moment became, in law, incapable of holding it. This being admitted, for the sake of the argument, and also it being admitted in the cause, that he was appointed judge in 1866, and has ever since, and is now discharging the functions of judge, I shall prove: 1. That he was judge do facto when the judgment against petitioner was entered. 2. That the act of a judge de facto has precisely the same legal effect as that of a judge de jure. If one is binding, the other is, and that there is legally no difference between the acts of a judge de facto and of one de jure, except when those of a judge de facto may enure to his own advantage.

First. Was he a judge de facto? There is no better definition of an officer de facto than that laid down by Lord Ellenborough in the case of King v. Corporation of Bedford Level, 6 East, 368; 'An officer de facto,' says he, 'is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law.' And it plainly appears that Judge Sheffey was, and is, such an officer. No matter whether he be denounced by the constitutional amendment or whether he be disqualified by law, or ineligible to his assumed office, he was, and is, a judge de facto, having the reputation of being the judge he assumes to be, and yet, according to the assumption, is not a good officer in point of law. This, I think, is conclusive. At the time of this judgment he was judge de facto.

Next I will prove that as to the acts of an officer de facto and an officer de jure, there is no legal difference except where the acts of an officer de facto inure to his own benefit. Wherever they do, wherever they are tainted with selfish considerations, they are invalid, but whenever they inure alone to the benefit of the public, they are as good and binding as if done by a judge, anointed by oil which ever was poured on the head of a legitimate monarch by an archbishop consecrated through a line of a hundred predecessors.

It is a fundamental maxim, not of the law, but of civilized society, that the acts of officers de facto are valid. Without it, there would be no security for life, or liberty, or property. It took form and shape in a statute in the time of Edward as to the rights of a king de facto, but its foundation was beyond that. Without the rights of de facto governments, who would recognize the Norman titles against the Saxon barons? Who 19 the varying rights of York and Lancaster, or Tudor and Plantagenet, of king and commonwealth, and king again, of Stuart and Orange, or Stuart and Brunswick? Where would you find your resting place in the history of civilization? In the Roman empire? In its Gothic conquerors? In the house of Charlemagne? In that of Hugh Capet? In the Bourbon or the Buonaparte? The kingdom, the republic, the empire, the kingdom, the republic, the empire again. In 1789, in 1783, in 1800, in 1815, in 1848, or in 1852? When, where, and how, would you base your rights de jure? Brandenburgh rises on the ruins of other houses, as Hapsburg before it, and will fall again, as Hapsburg has done. The history of the world is the history of kingdoms and empires, and civilizations de facto, becoming de jure, because they are de facto.

Whenever a power, or a government, or an officer are able to maintain themselves in power, it becomes necessary for the peace, the progress, the development of society, that such government, power, or officer should be recognized pro tempore as the legal power, and full effect and validity be given to acts under it. This is the rule of law as well as the rule of reason. Governments acknowledge it. After the war of 1812, the supreme court of the United States decided that the port of Castine having been captured by the British, and held during the war, the British domination was to be considered de facto and pro hac, released the citizens of Castine from their obligations de jure, as citizens of the United States. U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 253. Subsequently, in the war of the South American republics, the secretary of state of the United States held that a sale of guano islands made by a de facto government to citizens of the United States, conveyed a title which the United States were bound to recognize and protect. The doctrine that acts of de facto officers are as valid as if by officers de jure, is undenied and undeniable. It is affirmed in Blackstone, Kent, and every elementary author, and illustrated in Bacon, Comyns, Viner, and every abridgment of the common law. I spare the court the recital from such authorities, and content myself with producing the adjudications of the older English courts and the latest American ones on these questions. I have with some labor compiled the decisions in all the states up to the present time, and instead of presenting the court with a mere reference to cases, have gathered the sense of each particular adjudication, to illustrate the general meaning and signification of the doctrine.

The whole uninterrupted current of decisions is that the acts of an officer de facto are good, valid, and binding. They can not be questioned collaterally, nor in any way, except in a proceeding against the incumbent of the office, to oust him therefrom. Whenever a party holds office, having, as Lord Ellenborough says, 'the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, although not a good officer in point of law,' then, in such cases, his acts have precisely the validity and force as if performed by an officer de jure. A person by color of election may be officer de facto, though indisputably ineligible. Knight v. Corporation of Wells, 1 Lutw. 508; 16 Vin. Abr. 114. Where there was a bishop of Ossory, and another was installed bishop de facto, judicial acts of latter held good. O'Brian v. Knivan, Cro. Jac. 552. Where a steward of a manor, appointed without authority of law, yet acting as steward, and being de facto steward, his grant of copyhold land held good by Lord Bacon: 'Acts done by one who keeps court as steward without authority, if they come in by presentment from the jury, are good.' Harris v. Jays, Cro. Eliz. 699. A commission to take testimony executed by judges after the demise of James I., when their terms expired, and they were not judges, but acting without authority, was held good. The judges certified that 'no inconvenience could arise on such proceedings before notice of the king's demise; but, if otherwise, it would draw in question many trials by verdict of nisi prius, and trials and attainders upon jail delivery; whereupon divers have been arraigned and executed since the king's demise.' Sir Randolph Crew's Case, Cro. Car. 97. Officers de facto of corporation bind the corporation. Ang. & A. Corp. 280; Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 64. Whether sheriffs be de facto or de jure can not be questioned collaterally. Morse v. Calley, 5 N. H. 223. Acts of sheriffs de facto valid as respects third persons. Doty v. Gorham, 5 Pick. 487; Fowler v. Bebee, 9 Mass. 231; Com. v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 290; Buckman v. Ruggles, 15 Mass. 180. In action of ejectment the title of a constable who sold the land not to be questioned. Being de facto sufficient. Burke v. Elliott, 4 Ired. 355. In same action, title of register who registered the deed, not to be questioned. Gilliam v. Riddick, Id. 368. In action of trespass for seizing a hog by town commissioner. Acts of those holding de facto good. Commissioners of Trenton v. McDaniel, 7 Jones (N. C.) 107. In action against defendant for trespass, his acting as officer proves him officer de facto. Id. 375. Judicial act of an alderman de facto holding and exercising the office not under mere color of right, but possessing a commission on its face, constitutional and legal, can only be examined in a proceeding to which he is party, and in which he can be heard. Cornish v. Young, 1 Ashm. 153.Cornish v. Young, 1 Ashm. 153. Party relying on the record of a deed need not show that he who recorded it was an officer de jure—de facto is sufficient. Brush v. Cook, Brayt. 89. The acts of an officer de facto who comes into office by color of title are valid, as it concerns the public or third persons. McInstry v. Tanner, 9 Johns. 135. Where one acts under a colorable title 20 to an office, his title can only be examined before the supreme court, and that directly. McKim v. Somers, 1 Rawle, Pen. & W. 297. The acts of an officer de facto, whether judicial or ministerial, are valid, so far as the rights of the public or third persons having an interest in such acts are concerned; and neither the title of such an officer nor the validity of his acts as such can be indirectly called in question in a proceeding to which he is not a party. Plymouth v. Painter, 17 Conn. 586; Hoagland v. Culvert, 1 Spencer [20 N. J. Law] 387; Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Chester, 6 Humph. 458. An officer de facto holding colore officii is as well qualified to act while thus in office as if legally appointed and duly qualified. Smith v. State, 19 Conn. 493. The right of a person acting colore officii to the office in which he acts, can be tried only in a proceeding to which he is a party, directly presenting that question, and not in a collateral way, between third parties. Id. 499. A person acting as an officer under color of a commission is de facto such officer, until ejected by a proceeding having that object in view. His authority can not be questioned, in a collateral way, and his official acts, until ejected, are valid. Aulanier v. Governor, 1 Tex. 653. The regularity of the election or the qualifications of an officer can not be questioned collaterally. Bean v. Thompson, 19 N. H. 290. The general rule is that acts of officers de facto in which other parties or the public have an interest are valid. State v. Perkins, 4 Zab. [24 N. J. Law] 409. The acts of an officer de facto valid, and not to be questioned collaterally. State v. Brennan's Liquors, 25 Conn. 278. The official acts of an officer de facto can not be impeached collaterally. Stokes v. Kirkpatrick, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 138. The acts of officers de facto are valid when they concern the public or rights of third persons, who have an interest in the acts done. Venable v. Curd, 2 Head, 582; Patterson v. Miller, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 493; Gourley v. Hankins, 2 Cole (Iowa) 75. Acts of an officer de facto are valid when they concern the public or the rights of third persons, and can not be indirectly called into question in a suit to which said officer is not a party. It is only in a suit against him that his right can be questioned. Hooper v. Goodwin, 48 Me. 79. An officer who has entered on the discharge of the duties of his office is an officer de facto, and his eligibility can not be inquired into collaterally, though it may be by quo warranto. Satterlee v. San Francisco, 23 Cal. 314. The right to an office can not be determined by an action of replevin of its appurtenances. Desmond v. McCarthy, 17 Iowa, 525. A person elected as county judge for the full time may signify his refusal to qualify, and thereupon the office becomes vacant for that time, and an appointment may be made immediately, although, to prevent an interregnum, the old incumbent of the office is authorized to perform its functions until his successor has qualified. State v. Washburn, 17 Wis. 658; People v. Bangs, 24 Ill. 187. Acts of officers de facto valid. Scadding v. Lorant, 13 Q. B. 697; 66 E. C. L. 686. Where a judge was ousted from office on quo warranto, held that his acts while illegally in office were binding and valid. People v. Bangs, 24 Ill. 184. Where the law under which a judge was appointed was held to be unconstitutional, and, therefore, his appointment void. Acts done by such judge held valid and binding. Taylor v. Skrine, 2 Tread. Const. 696. When a judge was ousted on quo warranto and a party sentenced to penitentiary by him while illegally in office was discharged on habeas corpus after the judgment of ouster on quo warranto, the supreme court of Wisconsin reversed the decision of the lower court discharging the prisoner, and remanded him to the penitentiary, on the ground that the acts of the judge de facto were good as to all the world, although he was afterwards regularly pronounced not to be legally in office. State v. Bloom, 17 Wis. 521.

These authorities fully establish my proposition, that the acts of a de facto judge are as valid and binding as if done by a judge de jure, except where such acts are for his own benefit. And hence it follows that this petitioner has not in any way been injured or denied his rights under the federal constitution, so far as being tried by a legal judge is one of those rights. For his trial by a judge de facto has precisely the same legal effect as if by a judge de jure. But another view is equally conclusive: Whether the legal state government of Virginia was overthrown on April 17, 1861, at Richmond, or on April 9, 1865, at Appomattox, makes no difference for the purposes of this argument. If the former, then the occupation of the territory of Virginia was a mere re-occupation, a re-possession, a re-extension of federal laws over territory from which they had been temporarily excluded by belligerent forces. The laws of Virginia of course remained intact and in full force and vigor. On the other hand, if the legal government fell at Appomattox, then the possession of Virginia was conquest. On conquest, the conqueror is bound to administer the laws of the conquered country until he provides another code for them. This doctrine Lord Mansfield lays down in Campbell v. Hall, Cowp. 205, where he enters into a detailed statement of the conquests of Great Britain. And in Sir Thomas Picton's Case, 30 How. St. Tr. 225, the lord chief justice acted on it by allowing proof that the Spanish law in the conquered island of Granada allowed torture to be administered, and that, therefore, its application by the British military governor was justifiable and legal. The law of Virginia being, therefore, in force fully and perfectly, the section relating to de facto officers (Code, 101), exactly establishes the law by statute, as I have proved it by principle

21 and authority. That section, in effect, declares that all acts of officers de facto shall be as valid and have the same effect as if done by officers de jure, except where such acts might inure to the benefit of such officer de facto. By it, therefore, all questions as to the validity of the acts of Judge Sheffey, or any other officer denounced by the constitutional amendment, are set at rest. All acts of all such officers are acts of officers de facto, and therefore are good and valid acts.

I have argued the case so far on the hypothesis that Judge Sheffey was in fact and in law rendered ineligible to office on July 28, 1868, and has ever since held office in defiance of law; and I have shown that even if he be disqualified for every cause known to the constitution and laws of Virginia or of the United States, if he be an alien, has fought a duel, be a non-resident, over or under the legal age, and in addition to all of these disqualifications, all of which he unites in his own proper person, he is disfranchised by the constitutional amendment, still, all his acts are good, valid and binding, and can never be challenged or questioned by reason of his said numerous disqualifications. It is argued that the adoption of the constitutional amendment operates like a judgment of ouster on a quo warranto by a court of competent jurisdiction; and that, therefore, from the moment it goes into effect, no person disfranchised by it can hold office colore officii, or can be an officer de facto. This would be true if the individual to which it was to be applied were designated and named in the article itself. It would doubtless be competent for the sovereign power to convict and punish individuals by name, without trial; but then like an act of attainder it must name those individuals. Where a party is so specially attainted, the law operates at once on him like a judgment of an ordinary court. But until he is selected and condemned by name by due process of law, no judgment can have effect as against him. He must be personally condemned by an act of sovereignty like a constitutional amendment, or by a judgment of a court after trial and conviction. While, therefore, it may be true that a party condemned by a judge, ousted by name from office by a constitutional amendment, would be deprived of his liberty contrary to the constitution of the United States, it is clear that, until a judge is thus ousted by name, either by a sovereign act of attainder without trial, or by a conviction after trial, his holding office is still colore officii, and his acts those of a judge de facto. The constitutional amendment is a general act of attainder—a statute denouncing a general penalty for crime. The penalty applies to every person who is guilty; but his guilt can only be ascertained, the identity of the individual can only be made certain, the penalty applied to that particular individual, only by due process of law—i. e., trial, conviction and judgment. It might be competent for a constitutional amendment to declare that A. B. had been guilty of murder, and should be hung. In such case, the conviction of that individual would be final. But when it declares that all persons guilty of murder shall be hung, that penalty can only be applied to individuals according to law. Each person, before being hung, must be tried, convicted and adjudged that that particular penalty shall apply to him. The constitutional amendment only differs from a penal statute in this, that being ex post facto, it could only have become law by becoming part of the constitution. No other authority but the sovereign power could enact it. It is, therefore, an ex post facto law—legal only because part of the constitution. But its provisions are general, like every penal statute denouncing a general penalty, which general penalty can only be applied to each particular case by due course of law, trial, conviction and judgment. No officer, therefore, holding office, who is in fact ineligible under the constitutional amendment, can be affected by it until its provisions are applied to him according to law, nor can his holding be contrary to the constitution until such application is legally made. So it is clear that the constitutional amendment does not affect officers now in office. Future federal legislation may provide the mode of bringing it to operate on this class, but acting proprio vigore, it does not affect them. The deprivation of office is a punishment of the highest class. Taking that from a man which he has and enjoys, and is entitled to, and is in possession of, may be done as a punishment; but then it must be done according to law.

Garland's Case [4 Wall. (71 U. S.) 333] in the supreme court settled the law that test oaths were unconstitutional so far as they went to deprive him of his office of attorney, being ex post facto, and operating so as to make the party convict himself. This being the law, it must follow that a man enjoying the office of judge can not be deprived of it except by due process of law. No man, under the federal constitution, can be tried or convicted unless by a jury, and it is therefore clear that the only mode by which the fact that any person holding an office is within the constitutional amendment is by the verdict of a jury, on an indictment for aiding in rebellion. Aiding rebellion is a crime, and can only be proved for the purpose of punishing the party, by the oaths of two juries, by an indictment, a verdict, and a judgment. That is the only evidence that the law knows, or can know, of guilt or criminality. That a party held an office, and took an oath to support the constitution, may be proved by the best evidence that can be had; but that he aided the rebellion can only be proved by the record of his conviction—where he was confronted with the witnesses 22 against him, was heard by the jury in his defense, and enjoyed all those protections and rights which the laws secure to parties charged with crime. It is clear that the constitutional amendment can operate on no man holding office when it went into operation, until such party is duly convicted of aiding rebellion, and even then it will require some process by which he can be ousted. Whether this can be done by the imposition of a test oath or not, it is useless now to inquire. It is certain that no means of any kind are provided for putting the amendment into operation. But further than this, it seems that Judge Sheffey is not in fact disfranchised. When he was in the legislature in 1849, the Code of 1819 was in operation; and by it no oath was required of members of the legislature to support the constitution of the United States. There is no proof in this cause that he ever took such an oath, and I am almost certain that, in point of fact, he never did take it. At any rate, it can not be presumed that he did take it when such tremendous criminal consequences are sought to be deduced from the taking of it. Being in office, every presumption is in favor of his being eligible. The burden of proof lies in those who charge his disqualification; and they must prove it. No presumption of law will make up for this deficiency of proof.

I have demonstrated: 1. That the only inquiry that can be made on the return to this writ is, whether the petitioner has, in the state court, been deprived of any federal right. 2. That, admitting Judge Sheffey to be disqualified under the constituional amendment, he was still acting as judge, colore officii, and was judge de facto, and that his presiding at the trial as judge in no way contravened any federal right of the petitioner. 3. That therefore the petitioner must be remanded. 4. That Judge Sheffey, in fact, is not disfranchised under the constitutional amendment according to the proof in this cause. 5. That the only proof which is admissible of his aiding the Rebellion is the record of his conviction in a court of competent jurisdiction. 6. That the constitutional amendment can not operate proprio vigore on persons holding office at the time of its adoption, but requires further action by congress to prescribe the mode by which it can be applied to such persons. These propositions are conclusive, and the party must be remanded. He must, however, be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Rockbridge county for another reason. Admitting even that his conviction is illegal, and is no conviction, still it appears by the return that he is charged on the oaths of twelve men with a felony committed in Rockbridge county. In any event, therefore, he must be remanded.

With him, James Neeson; Thos. R. Bowden, Attorney General of Virginia.

Opinion

CHASE, Circuit Justice.

This is an appeal from an order of discharge from imprisonment made by the district judge acting as a judge of the circuit court, upon a writ of habeas corpus, allowed upon the petition of Caesar Griffin. The petition alleged unlawful restraint of the petitioner, in violation of the constitution of the United States, by the sheriff of Rockbridge county, Virginia, in virtue of a pretended judgment rendered in the circuit court of that county by Hugh W. Sheffey, present and presiding therein as judge, though disabled from holding any office whatever by the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States. Upon this petition a writ of habeas corpus was allowed and served, and the body of the petitioner, with a return showing the cause of detention, was produced by the sheriff, in conformity with its command.

The general facts of the case, as shown to the district judge, may be briefly stated as follows:

The circuit court of Rockbridge county is a court of record of the state of Virginia, having civil and criminal jurisdiction. In this court, the petitioner, Caesar Griffin, indicted in the county court for shooting with intent to kill, was regularly tried, in pursuance of his own election; and, having been convicted, was sentenced according to the finding of the jury, to imprisonment for two years, and was in the custody of the sheriff to be conveyed to the penitentiary, in pursuance of this sentence.

Griffin is a colored man; but there was no allegation that the trial was not fairly conducted, or that any discrimination was made against him, either in indictment, trial, or sentence, on account of color. It was not claimed that the grand jury, by which he was indicted, or the petit jury, by which he was tried, was not in all respects, lawful and competent. Nor was it alleged that Hugh W. Sheffey, the judge who presided at the trial, and pronounced the sentence, did not conduct the trial with fairness and uprightness.

One of the counsel for the petitioner, indeed, upon the hearing in this court, pronounced an eulogium upon his character, both as a man and as a magistrate, to deserve which might well be the honorable aspiration of any judge.

But it was alleged and was admitted that Judge Sheffey, in December, 1849, as a member of the Virginia house of delegates, took an oath to support the constitution of the United States, and also that he was a member of the legislature of Virginia in 1862, during the late Rebellion, and as such voted for measures to sustain the so-called Confederate States in their war against the United States; and it was claimed in behalf of the petitioner, that he thereby became, and was at the time of the trial of the petitioner, disqualified to hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under *23 any state, and it was specially insisted that the petitioner was entitled to his discharge upon the ground of the incapacity of Sheffey, under the fourteenth amendment, to act as judge and pass sentence of imprisonment. Upon this showing and argument, it was held by the district judge that the sentence of Caesar Griffin was absolutely null; and his imprisonment was in violation of the constitution of the United States, and an order for his discharge from custody was made accordingly.

The general question to be determined on the appeal from this order is whether or not the sentence of the circuit court of Rockbridge county must be regarded as a nullity because of the disability to hold any office under the state of Virginia, imposed by the fourteenth amendment, on the person, who, in fact, presided as judge in that court. It may be properly borne in mind that the disqualification did not exist at the time that Sheffey became judge. When the functionaries of the state government existing in Virginia at the commencement of the late Civil War took part, together with a majority of the citizens of the state, in rebellion against the government of the United States, they ceased to constitute a state government for the state of Virginia, which could be recognized as such by the national government. Their example of hostility to the Union, however, was not followed throughout the state. In many counties, the local authorities and majority of the people adhered to the national government; and representatives from these counties soon after assembled in convention at Wheeling, and organized a government for the state. This government was recognized as the lawful government of Virginia by the executive and legislative departments of the national government; and this recognition was conclusive upon the judicial department. The government of the state thus recognized was in contemplation of law the government of the whole state of Virginia, though excluded, as the government of the United States was itself excluded, from the greater portion of the territory of the state. It was the legislature of the reorganized state which gave the consent of Virginia to the formation of the state of West Virginia. To the formation of that state, the consent of its own legislature, and of the legislature of the state of Virginia, and of congress, was indispensable. If either had been wanting, no state, within the limits of the old, could have been constitutionally formed; and it is clear that if the government instituted at Wheeling was not the government of the whole state of Virginia, no new state has ever been constitutionally formed within her ancient boundaries. It can not admit of question, then, that the government which consented to the formation of the state of West Virginia, remained in all national relations the government of Virginia, although that event reduced to very narrow limits the territory acknowledging its jurisdiction, and not controlled by insurgent force. Indeed, it is well known historically that the state and the government of Virginia, thus organized, was recognized by the national government. Senators and representatives from the state occupied seats in congress, and when the insurgent force which held possession of the principal part of the territory was overcome, and the government recognized by the United States was transferred from Alexandria to Richmond, it became in fact what it was before in law, the government of the whole state. As such it was entitled, under the constitution, to the same recognition and respect, in national relations, as the government of any other state.

It was under this government that Hugh W. Sheffey was, on February 22, 1866, duly appointed judge of the circuit court of Rockbridge county, and he was in the regular exercise of his functions as such when Griffin was tried and sentenced.

More than two years had elapsed after the date of his appointment, when the ratification of the fourteenth amendment, by the requisite number of states, was officially promulgated by the secretary of state, on July 28, 1868. That amendment, in its third section, ordains that 'no person shall be a senator or representative in congress, or elector of president and vice-president, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any state legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state, to support the constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.'

And it is admitted that the office held by Judge Sheffey, at the time of the trial of Griffin, was an office under the state of Virginia, and that he was one of the persons to whom the prohibition to hold office pronounced by the amendment applied.

The question to be considered, therefore, is whether upon a sound construction of the amendment, it must be regarded as operating directly, without any intermediate proceeding whatever, upon all persons within the category of prohibition, and as depriving them at once, and absolutely, of all official authority and power.

One of the counsel for the petitioner suggested that the amendment must be construed with reference to the act of 1867, which extends the writ of habeas corpus to a large class of cases in which the previous legislation did not allow it to be issued. And it is proper to say a few words on this suggestion here.

The judiciary act of 1789 expressly denied the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus to prisoners not confined under or by color of 24 the authority of the United States. Under that act, no person confined under state authority could have the benefit of the writ. Afterwards, in 1833 and 1842, the writ was extended to certain cases specially described, of imprisonment under state process; and in 1867, by the act to which the counsel referred, the writ was still further extended 'to all cases where any person may be restrained of liberty in violation of the constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States.' And the learned counsel was doubtless correct in maintaining, that without the act of 1867, there would be no remedy by habeas corpus in the case of the petitioner, nor indeed in any case of imprisonment in violation of the constitution of the United States, except in the possible case of an imprisonment, not only within the provisions of this act, but also within the provisions of some one of the previous acts of 1789, 1833, and 1842.

But if, in saying that the amendment must be construed with reference to the act, the counsel meant to affirm that the existence of the act throws any light whatever upon the construction of the amendment, the court is unable to preceive the force of his observation. It is not pretended that imprisonment for shooting, with intent to kill, is unconstitutional, and it will hardly be affirmed that the act of 1867 throws any light whatever upon the question, whether such imprisonment, in any particular case, is unconstitutional. The case of unconstitutional imprisonment must be established by appropriate evidence. It can not be inferred from the existence of a remedy for such a case. And, surely, no construction, otherwise unwarranted, can be put upon the amendment more than upon any other provision of the constitution, to make a case of violation out of acts which otherwise must be regarded as not only constitutional, but right.

We come, then, to the question of construction. What was the intention of the people of the United States in adopting the fourteenth amendment? What is the true scope and purpose of the prohibition to hold office contained in the third section?

The proposition maintained in behalf of the petitioner, is, that this prohibition, instantly, on the day of its promulgation, vacated all offices held by persons within the category of prohibition, and made all official acts, performed by them, since that day, null and void.

One of the counsel sought to vindicate this construction of the amendment, upon the ground that the definitions of the verb 'to hold,' given by Webster in his Dictionary, are 'to keep fast; to retain;' of which definitions, cape; to keep fast; to retain;' of which definitions, the author says that 'to hold rarely or never signifies the first act of siezing or falling on, but the act of retaining a thing when seized on or confined.'

The other counsel seemed to be embarrassed by the difficulties of this literal construction, and sought to establish a distinction between sentences in criminal cases, and judgments and decrees in civil cases. He admitted, indeed, that the latter might be valid when made by a court held by a judge within the prohibitive category of the amendment; but insisted that the sentences of the same court in criminal cases must be treated as nullities.

The ground of the distinction, if we correctly apprehend the argument, was found in the circumstance that the act of 1867 provided a summary redress to the latter class of cases; while in the former, no summary remedy could be had, and great inconvenience would arise from regarding decrees and judgments as utterly null and without effect.

But this ground of distinction seems to the court unsubstantial. It rests upon the fallacy already commented on. The amendment makes no such distinction as is supposed. It does not deal with cases, but with persons. The prohibition is general. No person in the prohibitive category can hold office. It applies to all persons, and to all officers under the United States, or any state. If upon a true construction, it operates as a removal of a judge, and avoids all sentences in criminal cases, pronounced by him after the promulgation of the amendment, it must be held to have the effect of removing all judges and officers, and annulling all their official acts after that date.

The literal construction, therefore, is the only one upon which the order of the learned district judge, discharging the prisoner, can be sustained; and was, indeed, as appears from his certificate, the construction upon which the order was made. He says expressly, 'the right of the petitioner to his discharge appeared to me to rest solely on the incapacity of the said Hugh W. Sheffey, to act (that is, as judge), and so to sentence the prisoner under the fourteenth amendment.'

Was this a correct construction? In the examination of questions of this sort, great attention is properly paid to the argument from inconvenience. This argument, it is true, can not prevail over plain words or clear reason. But, on the other hand, a construction, which must necessarily occasion great public and private mischief, must never be preferred to a construction which will occasion neither, or neither in so great degree, unless the terms of the instrument absolutely require such preference. Let it then be considered what consequences would spring from the literal interpretation contended for in behalf of the petition.

The amendment applies to all the states of the Union, to all offices under the United States or under any state, and to all persons in the category of prohibition, and for all time present and future. The offenses, for which exclusion from office is denounced, are not merely engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, but the 25 giving of aid or comfort to their enemies. They are offenses not only of civil but of foreign war.

Now, let it be supposed that some of the persons, described in the third section, during the war with Mexico, gave aid and comfort to the enemies of their country, and, nevertheless, held some office on July 28, 1868, or subsequently.

Is it a reasonable construction of the amendment which will make it annul every official act of such an officer? But, let another view be taken. It is well known that many persons, engaged in the late Rebellion, have emigrated to states which adhered to the national government, and it is not to be doubted that not a few among them, as members of congress, or officers of the United States, or as members of state legislatures, or as executive or judicial officers of a state, had before the war taken an oath to support the constitution of the United States. In their new homes, capacity, integrity, fitness, and acceptability, may very possibly have been more looked to than antecedents. Probably some of these persons have been elected to office in the states which have received them.

It is not unlikely that some of them held office on July 28, 1868. Must all their official acts be held to be null under the inexorable exigencies of the amendment? But the principal intent of the amendment was, doubtless, to provide for the exclusion from office, in the lately insurgent states, of all persons within the prohibitive description.

Now, it is well known that before the amendment was proposed by congress, governments acknowledging the constitutional supremacy of the national government had been organized in all these states. In some, these governments had been organized through the direct action of the people, encouraged and supported by the president, as in Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and in some through similar action in pursuance of executive proclamations, as in North Carolina, Alabama, and several other states. In Virginia, such a state government had been organized as has been already stated, soon after the commencement of the war; and this government had been fully recognized by congress, as well as by the president.

This government, indeed, and all the others, except that of Tennessee, were declared by congress to be provisional only. But, in all these states all offices had been filed, before the ratification of the amendment, by citizens who, at the time of the ratification, were actively engaged in the performance of their several duties. Very many, if not a majority of these officers, had, in one or another of the capacities described in the third section, taken an oath to support the constitution, and had afterwards engaged in the late Rebellion; and most, if not all of them continued in the discharge of their functions after the promulgation of the amendment, not supposing that by its operation their offices could be vacated without some action of congress.

If the construction now contended for be given to the prohibitive section, the effect must be to annul all official acts performed by these officers. No sentence, no judgment, no decree, no acknowledgment of a deed, no record of a deed, no sheriff's or commissioner's sale—in short no official act—is of the least validity. It is impossible to measure the evils which such a construction would add to the calamities which have already fallen upon the people of these states.

The argument from inconveniences, great as these, against the construction contended for, is certainly one of no light weight. But there is another principle which, in determining the construction of this amendment, is entitled to equal consideration with that which has just been stated and illustrated. It may be stated thus: Of two constructions, either of which is warranted by the words of an amendment of a public act, that is to be preferred which best harmonizes the amendment with the general terms and spirit of the act amended. This principle forbids a construction of the amendment, not clearly required by its terms, which will bring it into conflict or disaccord with the other provisions of the constitution.

And here it becomes proper to examine somewhat more particularly the character of the third section of the amendment. The amendment itself was the first of the series of measures proposed or adopted by congress with a view to the reorganization of state governments acknowledging the constitutional supremacy of the national government, in those states which had attempted to break up their constitutional relations with the Union, and to establish an independent Confederacy.

All citizens who had, during its earlier stages, engaged in or aided the war against the United States, which resulted inevitably from this attempt, had incurred the penalties of treason under the statute of 1790 [1 Stat. 112].

But, by the act of July 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 589], while the Civil War was flagrant, the death penalty for treason, committed by engaging in rebellion, was practically abolished. Afterwards, in December, 1863, full amnesty, on conditions which now certainly seem to be moderate, was offered by President Lincoln, in accordance with the same act of congress; and after organized resistance to the United States had ceased, amnesty was again offered in accordance with the same act by President Johnson, in May, 1865. In both these offers of amnesty extensive exceptions were made.

In June, 1866, little more than a year later, the fourteenth amendment was proposed; and was ratified in July, 1868. The only punitive section contained in it is the third, now under consideration. It is not improbable 26 that one of the objects of this section was to provide for the security of the nation and of individuals, by the exclusion of a class of citizens from office; but it can hardly be doubted that the main purpose was to inflict upon the leading and most influential characters who had been engaged in the Rebellion, exclusion from office as a punishment for the offense.

 © 2023 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

It is true that in the judgment of some enlightened jurists, its legal effect was to remit all other punishment. And such certainly was its practical effect, for it led to the general amnesty of December 25, of the same year, and to the order discontinuing all prosecutions for crime, and proceedings for confiscation originating in the Rebellion. But this very effect shows distinctly its punitive character.

Now it is undoubted that those provisions of the constitution which deny to the legislature power to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or to pass a bill of attainder or an ex post facto, are inconsistent in their spirit and general purpose with a provision which, at once without trial, deprives a whole class of persons of offices held by them, for cause, however grave. It is true that no limit can be imposed on the people when exercising their sovereign power in amending their own constitution of government. But it is a necessary presumption that the people in the exercise of that power, seek to confirm and improve, rather than to weaken and impair the general spirit of the constitution.

If there were no other grounds than these for seeking another interpretation of the amendment than that which we are asked to put upon it, we should feel ourselves bound to hold them sufficient. But there is another and sufficient ground, and it is this, that the construction demanded in behalf of the petitioner, is nugatory except for mischief.

In the language of one of the counsel, 'the object had in view by us is not to unseat Hugh W. Sheffey, and no judgment of the court can effect that.' Now the object of the amendment is to unseat every officer, whether judicial or executive, who holds civil or military office in contravention of the terms of the amendment. Surely a construction which fails to accomplish the main purpose of the amendment, and yet necessarily works the mischief and inconveniences which have been described, and is repugnant to the first principles of justice and right embodied in other provisions of the constitution, is not to be favored, if any other reasonable construction can be found.

Is there, then, any other reasonable construction? In the judgment of the court there is another, not only reasonable, but very clearly warranted by the terms of the amendment, and recognized by the legislation of congress. The object of the amendment is to exclude from certain offices a certain class of persons. Now, it is obviously impossible to do this by a simple declaration, whether in the constitution or in an act of congress, that all persons included within a particular description shall not hold office. For, in the very nature of things, it must be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition, before any sentence of exclusion can be made to operate. To accomplish this ascertainment and ensure effective results, proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcements of decisions, more or less formal, are indispensable; and these can only be provided for by congress.

Now, the necessity of this is recognized by the amendment itself, in its fifth and final section, which declares that 'congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provision of this article.'

There are, indeed, other sections than the third, to the enforcement of which legislation is necessary; but there is no one which more clearly requires legislation in order to give effect to it. The fifth section qualifies the third to the same extent as it would if the whole amendment consisted of these two sections. And the final clause of the third section itself is significant. It gives to congress absolute control of the whole operation of the amendment. These are its words: 'But congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.' Taking the third section then, in its completeness with this final clause, it seems to put beyond reasonable question the conclusion that the intention of the people of the United States, in adopting the fourteenth amendment, was to create a disability, to be removed in proper cases by a two-thirds vote, and to be made operative in other cases by the legislation of congress in its ordinary course. This construction gives certain effect to the undoubted intent of the amendment to insure the exclusion from office of the designated class of persons, if not relieved from their disabilities, and avoids the manifold evils which must attend the construction insisted upon by the counsel for the petitioner.

It results from the examination that persons in office by lawful appointment or election before the promulgation of the fourteenth amendment, are not removed therefrom by the direct and immediate effect of the prohibition to hold office contained in the third section; but that legislation by congress is necessary to give effect to the prohibition, by providing for such removal. And it results further that the exercise of their several functions by these officers, until removed in pursuance of such legislation, is not unlawful.

The views which have been just stated receive strong confirmation from the action of congress and of the executive department of the government. The decision of the district judge, now under revision, was made in December, 1868, and two months afterwards, 27 in February, 1869 [15 Stat. 344], congress adopted a joint resolution entitled 'a resolution respecting the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas.' In this resolution it was provided that persons, 'holding office in the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas,' but unable to take and subscribe the test oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862 [12 Stat. 502], except those relieved from disability, 'be removed therefrom;' but a provision was added, suspending the operation of the resolution for thirty days from its passage.

The joint resolution was passed and received by the president on February 6, and not having been returned in ten days, became a law without his approval.

It can not be doubted that this joint resolution recognized persons unable to take the oath required, to which class belonged all persons within the description of the third section of the fourteenth amendment, as holding office in Virginia at the date of its passage, and provided for their removal from office.

It is not clear whether it was the intent of congress that this removal should be effected in Virginia by the force of the joint resolution itself, or by the commander of the first military district. It was understood by the executive or military authorities as directing the removal of the persons described, by military order. The resolution was published by command of the general of the army for the information of all concerned, March 22, 1869. It had been previously published by direction of the commander of the first military district, accompanied by an order, to take effect on March 18, 1869, removing the persons described from office. The date at which this order was to take effect, was afterwards changed to March 21.

It is plain enough from this statement that persons holding office in Virginia, and within the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment, were not regarded by congress, or by the military authority, in March, 1869, as having been already removed from office.

It is unnecessary to discuss here the question whether the government of Virginia, which seems to have been not provisional, but permanent, when transferred from Alexandria to Richmond, became provisional under the subsequent legislation of congress, or to express any opinion concerning the validity of the joint resolution, or of the proceedings under it. The resolution and proceedings are referred to here only for the purpose of showing that the amendment had not been regarded by congress or the executive, so far as represented by the military authorities, as effecting an immediate removal of the officers described in the third section.

After the most careful consideration, therefore, I find myself constrained to the conclusion that Hugh W. Sheffey had not been removed from the office of judge at the time of the trial and sentence of the petitioner; and that the sentence of the circuit court of Rockbridge county was lawful. In this view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to determine the question relating to the effect of the sentence of a judge de facto, exercising the office with the color, but without the substance of right. It is proper to say, however, that I should have no difficulty in sustaining the custody of the sheriff, under sentence of a court held by such a judge.

Instructive argument and illustration of this branch of the case might be derived from an examination of those provisions of the constitution ordaining that no person shall be a representative or senator, or president, or vicepresident, unless having certain pre-prescribed qualifications. These provisions, as well as those which ordain that no senator or representative shall, during his term of service, be appointed to any office under the United States, under certain circumstances, and that no person holding any such office shall, while holding such office, be a member of either house, operate on the capacity to take office. The election or appointment itself is prohibited and invalidated; and yet no instance is believed to exist where a person has been actually elected, and has actually taken the office, notwithstanding the prohibition, and his acts, while exercising its functions, have been held invalid.

But it is unnecessary to pursue the examination. The cases cited by counsel cover the whole ground, both of principle and authority. Taylor v. Skrine, 2 Tread. Const. 696; State v. Bloom, 17 Wis. 521; People v. Bangs, 24 Ill. 184. This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term, with reference to this and kindred cases in this district, and I am authorized to say that they unanimously concur in the opinion that a person convicted by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, can not be properly discharged upon habeas corpus.

It follows that the order of the district judge must be reversed, and that the petitioner must be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Rockbridge county.

All Citations

Chase 364, 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U.S. Cts. 93, 2 Balt. Law Trans. 433, 8 Am. Law Reg. (N.S.) 358, 11 F.Cas. 7, No. 5815, 3 Am. Law Rev. 784

Footnotes

1 Reported by Bradley T. Johnson, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U.S. Cts. 93, 3 Am. Law Rev. 784, and 8 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 358, contain only partial reports.

End of Document © 2023 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA
Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Sweeping and Forcing the President into Section 3, 28 TEX. REV. L. & POL. (forthcoming 2024), ssrn.com/abstract=4568771.

Sweeping and Forcing the President into Section 3

by Josh Blackman* & Seth Barrett Tillman

Does the full "sweep and force" of Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment disqualify Donald Trump from the presidency? In a new article, William Baude and Michael Stokes Paulsen argue that the answer is yes because "essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ." This sweeping conclusion is not accurate. Establishing the original public meaning of Section 3 is difficult because there is originalist and textualist evidence pointing in different directions. Our research is built on more than a decade of scholarship in areas that are, regrettably, neglected in modern courts and scholarship, but would have been well understood in the 1860s.

Our Article proceeds in five parts. Part I begins with a threshold question: Is Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment self-executing? Baude and Paulsen say the answer is yes, pointing to other provisions of the Constitution as models. Yet, the answer is not so clear. Constitutional provisions are not automatically self-executing, nor is there any presumption of self-execution for such provisions. We will illustrate our position with discussions of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, Article I qualifications, and more. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which includes the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses, can only be wielded as a sword supporting affirmative relief with federal enforcement legislation, such as Section 1983. But, even absent enforcement legislation, Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment can be wielded as a shield as a set of defenses. Section 1 is self-executing in the latter regard, but not the former. If Section 1 is a guide, then Section 3 cannot be used as a sword to disqualify Trump, absent federal enforcement legislation. Trump has not been disqualified pursuant to any federal enforcement legislation.

Part II provides a careful study of Griffin's Case, a federal circuit court case decided by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase in 1869. Chase stated expressly that Section 3 can only be enforced by Congress

* Centennial Chair of Constitutional Law, South Texas College of Law Houston.

 Seth Barrett Tillman, Associate Professor, Maynooth University School of Law and Criminology, Ireland. Scoil an Dlí agus na Coireolaíochta Ollscoil Mhá Nuad.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

through federal legislation. Yet, Baude and Paulsen tar-and-feather Griffin's Case, and their article reads like an effort to discredit Chase. But their criticisms miss the mark. They fault Chase for not adhering to doctrines developed decades later, and they condemn Chase for breaching invented ethical standards. All things considered, Griffin's Case lies in the heartland of judicial thinking and scholarship. Baude and Paulsen misread Griffin's Case, misunderstood Chase, and misconstrued the holding. Chase's opinion was, and remains, reasonably probative evidence of the original public meaning of Section 3, and whether it is or is not self-executing.

Part III turns to another case that Chief Justice Chase presided over. This case also implicated Section 3: the treason indictment against Jefferson Davis. A version of the case, reported nearly a decade after it was decided, includes a sentence which suggests that Chase viewed Section 3 as self-executing. If so, the Case of Jefferson Davis (1868) would seem to be in tension with Griffin's Case (1869). However, this sentence was added to the report by a former confederate general who had apparently plotted to kidnap Abraham Lincoln. Plus, the general was subsequently the lawyer for the respondent, another former confederate, in Griffin's Case. The reporter's connection to the self-execution issue is some cause for concern. A contemporaneous report, published in 1869, does not include that sentence. Even taken on these terms, the two Chase opinions can be reconciled. Griffin was an applicant in a collateral challenge; he sought to use Section 3 as a sword, that is, offensively as a cause of action supporting affirmative relief, but he could not do so without enforcement legislation. By contrast, Davis sought to use Section 3 as a shield–as a defense in his criminal prosecution, and he could do so without enforcement legislation. Even under modern doctrine, Griffin's Case is not in tension with the Case of Jefferson Davis.

Part IV focuses on the conduct that can trigger a disqualification. The offense element of Section 3 has two prongs: (i) engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and (ii) giving aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. These elements are textually distinct, and they reflect longstanding aspects of domestic and international law. Yet, Baude and Paulsen conflate "engaged" in insurrection, a direct and substantive criminal law offense, with giving "aid or comfort" to enemies, which permits liability based on indirect and inchoate wrongs. And in the process, they constructed a new offense that does not appear in the text of Section 3: giving aid or comfort to insurrection. The text of Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to wrongs and crimes that are inchoate or indirect. Nor does the "engage" prong extend to inaction—for example, failing to take action with regard to an insurrection or rebellion.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Part V considers another threshold question: was Trump ever subject to Section 3? President Trump was unique among all of his predecessors in that he did not hold any prior government position before he took the presidential oath of office on January 20, 2017. Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment could only disqualify Trump if the presidential oath he took on that date was as an "Officer[] of the United States." In 2021 we published an article concluding "that the President is not a Section 3 'officer of the United States.'" In their article, Baude and Paulsen summarily dismiss our position. But Baude and Paulsen disregard substantial evidence about the meaning of the phrase "Officers of the United States" in the Constitution of 1788. And they disregard the fact that the debates they cite from the 1860s in support of their position look back to debates from the early Republic. Instead of parsing the Constitution of 1788 and early debates, Baude and Paulsen focus on original intentions and consequentialism. These sorts of arguments are weak evidence of original public meaning and do not pass originalist muster. More importantly, Baude and Paulsen offer no complete or comprehensive theory to explain what other positions are included and excluded by the phrase "Officer of the United States." Without ever explaining what Section 3's "officer of the United States"-language means, they only seek to establish that the President falls in that category. In short, Baude and Paulsen punched a textualist ticket good for one ride on the Trump train.

The theoretical defects and other errors in Baude and Paulsen's article are not insubstantial, and they span multiple independent issues. And we see no sound basis for their article's startling conclusion: "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ." We suggest that scholars, litigants, elections administrators, and judges allow Baude and Paulsen's article to percolate in the literature before placing too great a reliance on its novel claims.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Introduction 8

I. Two Senses of Self-Execution: Sword and Shield 18

A. Is Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court self-executing? 20

1. Chief Justice Marshall stated that Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction for the Supreme Court was self-executing 22

2. Chief Justice Ellsworth and Justice Chase stated that Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction for the Supreme Court was not self-executing 23

3. Particular constitutional provisions are not presumptively self-executing 24

B. Are Article I qualifications self-executing? 25

1. Parliamentary rules are enforced in a discretionary manner 25

2. The House and Senate have not disqualified several members-elect who were below the age requirements in Article I 27

3. The 66th Congress excluded Victor L. Berger, allegedly for a Section 3 violation, but he was seated by the 68th Congress .. 31

4. State legislatures, who were bound by the Supremacy Clause, elected senators who were below the age requirement in Article I 34

5. Voters elect candidates who are below the age requirement in Article I 36

C. Is Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment self-executing? 38

1. Section 1 and Treaties as a shield 39

a. The Slaughter-House Cases 40

b. United States v. Cruikshank 41

c. Plessy v. Ferguson 43

d. Treaties as a shield 44

2. Section 1 as a sword 45

a. Section 1983 46

b. Bradwell v. Illinois 47

c. Ex Parte Young 49

d. Bivens 50

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

II. Chief Justice Chase's Decision in Griffin's Case 53

A. What did Griffin's Case actually decide and not decide? 55

B. Baude and Paulsen misstate the grounds of decision in Griffin's Case 60

1. Were Baude and Paulsen complaining about Chase's jurisdiction? 61

2. Were Baude and Paulsen complaining that Chase's decision was dicta or an advisory opinion? 62

3. Were Baude and Paulsen complaining that Chase violated the constitutional avoidance doctrine? 62

4. Chase ruled that a habeas petitioner's claim based on the trial judge's being only a de facto officer cannot succeed. Baude and Paulsen say otherwise. Who was/is right? 66

5. Baude and Paulsen argue that Chase was wrong about retroactivity 71

a. Section 3 operates retroactively and prospectively 73

b. Disqualifying Jefferson Davis, Alexander Stephens, and West Hughes Humphreys 74

c. How far back would a retroactive Section 3 reach? 79

d. A theory for how constitutional amendments modify or repeal earlier provisions of the Constitution 85

e. Retroactivity in Griffin's Case 90

f. Chase's roadmap to understand Section 3 and retroactivity 92

g. Enforcement by the States 94

h. How could the States enforce Section 3 with regard to the presidency? 100

6. Baude and Paulsen argue that Chase violated judicial norms in announcing his colleagues' views. 115

a. Baude and Paulsen's criticism of Chase's announcement 116

b. The Supreme Court in 1899 favorably quoted Chase's opinion on the very ethical issue raised by Baude and Paulsen 119

c. Chase's purported breach of judicial norms escaped any criticism until 2020 122

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

d. Griffin's Case has been cited repeatedly without criticism for more than 150 years 125

C. Griffin wielded Section 3 as a "sword" 131

III. Chief Justice Chase's Decision in the Case of Jefferson Davis . 133

A. What did Chase's Opinion in the Case of Jefferson Davis case decide, and not decide? 135

B. Chase's opinion in the Case of Jefferson Davis as reported by Bradley T. Johnson 139

1. Federal Cases 140

2. Reports of Cases Decided by Chief Justice Chase by Bradley T. Johnson 140

3. Who was Bradley T. Johnson? 143

C. Reconciling Griffin's Case and the Case of Jefferson Davis . 146

IV. Section 3, Insurrection, Enemies, and Treason 155

A. The two prongs of Section 3's offense element 157

B. Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to wrongs and crimes that are inchoate or indirect 159

C. Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to inaction with regard to an insurrection 163

D. Enemies are not coextensive with insurrectionists or rebels .. 168

1. Defining the terminology: enemy, war, and treason 170

a. Who or what is an enemy? 170

b. Enemies can only exist during an actual war, including de facto war, declared war or undeclared war 173

c. Treason can only be committed during an actual or de facto war 175

2. Section 3's two prongs mirror the Union's dual-track legal theory for prosecuting the Civil War 178

3. Baude and Paulsen err by mapping the "aid and comfort" prong onto the insurrection prong 181

4. Not all secessionists are insurrectionists or enemies 182

V. Is the President an "Officer of the United States" for purposes of Section 3? 185

A. There is no "secret code" 187

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

B. What about the Constitution of 1788? 190
C. Potential linguistic drift for "Office . . . under the United States" 199
D. What is Baude and Paulsen's theory? 201
E. Original meaning and intentions 203
F. Original meaning and consequentialism 210
1. Presidential electors 212
2. Members of state legislatures 215
3. Members of state conventions 217
4. State militia officers 218
G. Baude and Paulsen's Reliance on the 1862 Ironclad Oath Statute Undermines Their Position 219
H. Parting thoughts on the phrase "Officer of the United States" in Section 3 224
Conclusion 229
Postscript 231

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Introduction

In a recent article, Professor William Baude and Professor Michael Stokes Paulsen purport to set forth the "full sweep and force of Section Three" of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1] Baude and Paulsen make four primary arguments. First, they contend that Section 3 remains operational long after the American Civil War ended. Second, they argue that Section 3 is self-executing; as they view it, Section 3 may automatically remove covered officeholders and impose a disability on candidates' ballot access without the need for federal enforcement legislation, and perhaps, without any judicial proceedings. Third, they write that imposing such a disqualification does not run afoul of other provisions of the Constitution, such as prohibitions on retroactivity or the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment. In their view, the later-in-time Section 3 modifies earlier provisions of the Constitution, as well as federal statutory law. Fourth, they interpret Section 3 to include "indirect participation" with an insurrection. Specifically, they contend that giving aid or comfort to an insurrection is sufficient to trigger a Section 3 disqualification. In this Article, we will disagree with their second, third, and fourth positions.

Baude and Paulsen conclude that Section 3 disqualifies former President Donald Trump from being re-elected as President. Indeed, Baude and Paulsen suggest that Trump is already disqualified from office, and States can prevent him from even appearing on the ballot. Baude and Paulsen unequivocally state, "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ."[2] This sweeping conclusion about

---

[1] William Baude & Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Sweep and Force of Section Three, 172 U. PA. L. REV. (forthcoming 2024), https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751.

[2] Baude and Paulsen's article is something of a moving target: they are actively updating and revising their article in advance of publication. The first version was published on SSRN on or about August 10, 2023. The first updated version, with some minor edits, was uploaded on or about August 24, 2023. The second updated version of Baude and Paulsen's article, with some substantial edits, was uploaded on or about September 19, 2023. We shared a draft of our article on September 11, 2023. Rather than revising the body of our article in response to each iteration of the Baude and Paulsen paper, we will discuss any relevant revisions by Baude and Paulsen in the Postscript that follows at the end of this Article. As a general matter, we will cite and quote from the original version that Baude and Paulsen posted on or about August 10, 2023.

With that in mind, this statement is from the authors' first draft. In a later draft, Baude and Paulsen revised this claim: "In the end, the sum total of evidence

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"essentially all the evidence" pointing in the same direction is not accurate.

Our research in this area, which began long before Baude and Paulsen shared their article,[3] demonstrates that establishing the original public meaning of Section 3 is difficult. This research is built on more than a decade of scholarship in areas that are, regrettably, neglected in modern courts and scholarship, but would have been well understood in the 1860s. Attempting to use Section 3 to disqualify Trump, along the lines Baude and Paulsen suggest, is not a slam dunk, and is likely to backfire. Our views here are not new. We have been continuously publishing in this and related areas, separately and jointly, for over a decade.

Indeed, the Baude and Paulsen article, which purports to be an originalist tour-de-force, views today's pressing question through a distinctly modern lens. Our position is that they have not put forward a sufficiently complete theoretical work needed to understand the major facets of Section 3 in the abstract sense that extends beyond Donald Trump's case. Baude and Paulsen offer no theory of how Section 3 would extend beyond the controversy of the day. They don't tell us how to determine which other officers might be disqualified by Section 3, beyond the President. They don't tell us how to define an "enemy" for purposes of Section 3 outside the context of the Civil War, even though that term is essential to their atextualist analysis. They don't provide a framework to determine whether other provisions of the Constitution are self-executing, including the grant of appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court and the Article I qualification standards. They conflate "engaged" in insurrection, a direct and substantive criminal law offense, with giving "aid or comfort" to enemies, which permits liability based on indirect and inchoate wrongs. And they extract and rearrange distinct parts of Section 3 into a new Section 3 chimera: "giving aid or comfort to insurrection"—an offense which does not actually appear in Section 3's text.

---

concerning the original textual meaning . . . points in a consistent direction." Id. at 104. We leave it to the reader to contemplate if there is much difference between "essentially all" and "sum total," and between "same direction" and "consistent direction." It seems to us that, at the margin, their claim was softened, at least a bit. And if they softened their claim, they do not explain in what regard their prior claim was imprecise, and they do not explain what new evidence or arguments persuaded them to make this change.

[3] We are grateful that Baude and Paulsen shared an earlier draft of their paper with us, and we provided some comments on their draft. Their sharing the early draft also enabled us to make this timely response.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

They offer no principled explanation with regard to retroactivity, and they do not even recognize how far back Section 3 could sweep. They don't provide any grounded rule to explain which provisions of the Constitution and federal statutory law are repealed or limited by Section 3. To what extent should the courts peel back protections under the First Amendment and traditional free speech protections—could Congress enact seditious libel laws to enforce Section 3? What about the Judge of the Elections Clause—can courts review a House's decision to seat someone disqualified by Section 3? What about the Speech or Debate Clause—would a member be disqualified for opposing a declared war, thereby giving aid or comfort to enemies? And so on.

Beyond deficiencies with legal theory, significant errors recur throughout their article. They tar-and-feather a decision by Chief Justice Chase, Griffin's Case (1869), which, all things considered, lies in the heartland of judicial thinking and scholarship. Simply put, they have misread the caselaw. They criticize Chase's motives based on a single sentence in the Case of Jefferson Davis (1868)—a sentence which did not appear in the original report of the case and which was added to a later report by a former confederate general. They accuse Chase of judicial impropriety for discussing the views of his Supreme Court colleagues, even though three decades later the Supreme Court favorably quoted Chase's opinion on this exact point.

Baude and Paulsen's errors are not limited to Chase. They cite cases as evidence of Section 3's self-execution which in fact invoked a state law to disqualify state officials. They rely on a source that the Supreme Court expressly rejected in The Prize Cases (1863), having already told us that The Prize Cases are part of the intellectual infrastructure from which Section 3 arose. They conflate the Treason Clause of the Constitution with a federal treason statute signed into law by President Lincoln. They don't even address the fact that Section 3 speaks to "holding" elected positions, and it says nothing at all about ballot access or any other remedies in regard to regulating elections. They state that secession movements necessarily violate Section 3—members of the Puerto Rican independence movement would disagree. And much, much more.

Moreover, Baude and Paulsen's article is replete with hyperbole. They describe Chief Justice Chase's (purported) position in the Case of Jefferson Davis (1868) as "bonkers."[4] Indeed, Baude and Paulsen's hyperbole makes their position less convincing than it otherwise could be. The hyperbole distracts from the article's substance, and we acknowledge that there is much substance. That said: for Baude and Paulsen to be right about "essentially all the evidence," a great many other people—living and dead—must be dead-wrong about a great deal, which until 2020 very few thought controversial. We think humility counsels otherwise.

[4] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 43.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen's article places a bullseye on one person, and one person alone: Donald Trump. And to borrow from Justice Scalia's description of the independent counsel in Morrison v. Olson, with such a laser-focus, it is unsurprising they think they hit their target. But their laser-focus precluded them from seeing a wider universe of contrary evidence, which would have been readily visible had they approached Section 3 from a more abstract perspective apart from Trump. Their theoretical defects and substantive errors are endemic, and undermine the emphatic conclusion of the article: "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ."[5] This statement is not accurate. Most originalists are loath to suggest that questions rooted in century-old and centuries-old texts are so easy to resolve. But Baude and Paulsen reach an emphatic conclusion on contested and contestable ground.

Our Article proceeds in five parts. Part I begins with a threshold question: Is Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment self-executing? Baude and Paulsen say the answer is yes. But the answer is not so clear. Constitutional provisions are not automatically self-executing; nor is there any presumption that such provisions are self-executing. Is the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction self-executing? Chief Justice Ellsworth said no, and Chief Justice Marshall said yes. Today, it appears that the prevailing view is that Ellsworth was correct. Are the Article I qualifications for office—including the minimum age requirement—self executing? What about the quorum rule? These internal rules are generally "under-enforced," and when enforced, they are enforced in a discretionary manner. What about treaties? Treaties like constitutional provisions and statutes are also the supreme law of the land; yet, treaties are not presumptively self-executing.

What about Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment? Certainly that provision, which includes the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses, is self-executing, right? In our American constitutional tradition there are two distinct senses of self-execution. First, as a shield—or a defense. And second, as a sword—or a theory of liability or cause of action supporting affirmative relief. The former is customarily asserted as a defense in an action brought by others; the

---

[5] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 103.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

latter is asserted offensively by an applicant seeking affirmative relief. Section 1 can only be wielded as a sword with federal enforcement legislation. But Section 1 can be wielded as a shield without legislation. Section 1 is self-executing as a set of defenses. The Supreme Court's leading Fourteenth Amendment cases reflect this dichotomy. Section 1 was used as a shield in The Slaughter-House Cases, United States v. Cruikshank, and Plessy v. Ferguson. Section 1 was used as a sword in Bradwell v. Illinois, and in more modern times, countless other cases invoke Section 1983 and its statutory antecedents. Moreover, a plaintiff asserting an Ex parte Young claim is actually asserting a defense as a shield in anticipation of a state lawsuit, prosecution, or other enforcement action. Baude and Paulsen fail to account for the two distinct senses of self-execution. It is these two senses of self-execution which reconcile Chief Justice Chase's two decisions, whose legal bona fides have only recently become controversial. In short, Griffin's Case and the Case of Jefferson Davis do not contradict one another.

Part II provides a careful study of Griffin's Case. This circuit court opinion was decided in May 1869. Salmon P. Chase, the Chief Justice of the United States, presided over the case. Chase stated expressly that Section 3 can only be enforced by Congress through federal legislation. One would think that this decision, issued within a year of the Fourteenth Amendment's ratification, by the Chief Justice of the United States, would be reasonably probative evidence of the original public meaning of Section 3, and whether it is or is not self-executing. But, according to Baude and Paulsen and some other recent commentators, such is not the case.

Baude and Paulsen go to some lengths to ridicule his opinion and their article reads like an effort to discredit Chase. But their criticisms miss the mark. They fault Chase for not adhering to doctrines developed decades later, and they condemn Chase for breaching invented ethical standards. Baude and Paulsen are wrong on the law. Worse still, Baude and Paulsen repeatedly deride Chase in hyperbolic terms. They say that Chase was trying to "knee-cap[]" the Fourteenth Amendment and compare his opinion to Dred Scott![6]

We think Baude and Paulsen misread Griffin's Case, misunderstood Chase, and misconstrued the holding. We encourage the reader to compare our treatment of Griffin's Case with that of Baude and Pauslen. The stark contrast will demonstrate that this "evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points" against Baude and Paulsen's position. Rather, Chief Justice Chase's opinion was, and remains, reasonably probative evidence of the

---

[6] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 49.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

original public meaning of Section 3, and whether it is or is not self-executing.

Trump has not been disqualified pursuant to any federal enforcement legislation. Indeed, the Special Counsel did not even indict Trump, or anyone else involved with January 6, with charges of insurrection or rebellion, which could function as the criminal-law type predicates to Section 3 coverage.[7] If Chase was and remains correct, and Section 3 required and continues to require enforcement via federal legislation, then Trump cannot be disqualified in the manner Baude and Paulsen conclude.

Part III turns to another case that Chief Justice Chase presided over. This case also implicated Section 3: the treason case against Jefferson Davis. This proceeding, that is, The Case of Jefferson Davis, occurred in December 1868, several months before Griffin's Case was decided. The version of the case reported in Federal Cases (1894) includes this sentence: "THE CHIEF JUSTICE instructed the reporter to record him as having been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment [against Davis] should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of [Section 3] the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States."[8] This sentence, on its face, seems to conflict with what Chase would write in Griffin's Case a few months later. Baude and Paulsen, and other scholars, have unquestionably accepted this statement as a report of what occurred in December 1868. Modern readers may take for granted that all reported versions of a case will be largely identical. But for much of Anglo-American legal history that assumption would have been wrong.

The American Law Review, published contemporaneously in 1869, offered an accounting of the trial, including detailed descriptions of arguments made by counsel for the defense and the government. But that publication did not include this particular sentence about Section 3. Indeed, we have found no contemporaneous public source confirming that Chase had adopted the view ascribed to him in the 1894 report of the case appearing in Federal Cases. To the contrary, we have found a contemporaneous source, a newspaper article, which states just the opposite of the position ascribed to Chase in the 1894 Federal Cases report. How did this sentence make its way into Federal Cases?

---

[7] We discussed this statute in Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, What Happens if the Biden Administration Prosecutes and Convicts Donald Trump of Violating 18 U.S.C. § 2383?, 2021 U. ILL. L. REV. ONLINE 190, https://ssrn.com/abstract=3837615, https://illinoislawrev.web.illinois.edu/wp-content/uploads/2021/04/Blackman-Tillman.pdf.

[8] Case of [Jefferson] Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 102 (C.C.D. Va. 1871).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

That version of the case was first published in 1876 by Bradley T. Johnson, a former general in the (purported) confederate army.[9] General Johnson had apparently plotted to kidnap Abraham Lincoln, and later, he admitted to making changes to Chase's reports without Chase's knowledge. Plus, General Johnson was the lawyer for the respondent, a former confederate, in Griffin's Case. The reporter's connection to the self-execution issue is some cause for concern.

Even taken on these terms, Griffin's Case can be reconciled with the Case of Jefferson Davis. Griffin was an applicant in a collateral challenge; he sought to use Section 3 as a sword, that is, offensively as a cause of action supporting affirmative relief, but he could not do so without enforcement legislation. By contrast, Davis sought to use Section 3 as a shield—as a defense in his criminal prosecution for treason, and he could do so without enforcement legislation. Finally, both opinions spoke to issues that were thought to be important by the public at the time they were issued (if not also for many years later). How is it that no one in the legal community (or elsewhere for all we know) noticed the inconsistency until circa 2020—about 150 years after-the-fact? Such a no-one-noticed-until-me argument is conceivable, but such a position calls for some explanation.

Part IV focuses on the conduct that can trigger a disqualification. The offense element of Section 3 has two prongs: (i) engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and (ii) giving aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. These elements are textually distinct, and they reflect longstanding aspects of domestic and international law. One can only be an enemy during a war. (Baude and Paulsen do not even try to define the term "enemy" outside the context of the Civil War.) But, as they admit, not all insurrections are war. One can engage in insurrection without aiding an enemy. One who engages in insurrection without aiding an enemy is an offender, a criminal, or a felon. But absent a war, he is not an enemy. And one can aid an enemy without engaging in insurrection or rebellion. Yet, Baude and Paulsen conflate a direct criminal law offense (engaging in insurrection) with an indirect wrong (giving aid or comfort to enemies). And in the [9] Throughout this Article, we make an effort to refer to the confederate government, the confederacy, the confederate army, or the Confederate States of America as the "so-called" or "purported" confederacy, etc. Our nomenclature follows our legal system. See, e.g., Second Confiscation Act, ch. 195, § 5, 12 Stat. 589 (1862) (referring to the "so-called Confederate States of America"); United States v. Keehler, 76 U.S. 83, 87 (1869) (noting that "throughout the year 1862 the so-called Confederate government had force sufficient to enforce its orders" (emphasis added)). If we have failed to use "so-called" or "purported" on any occasion, it was inadvertent.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

process, they constructed a new offense that does not appear in the text of Section 3: giving aid or comfort to insurrection. The text of Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to wrongs and crimes that are inchoate or indirect. Baude and Paulsen's reconstruction of Section 3 is inconsistent with the provision's text. And it is only that expansive atextualist reconstruction of the text that could trigger Trump's disqualification, assuming his conduct stopped short of actually engaging in insurrection.

Part V considers another threshold question: was Trump ever subject to Section 3? President Trump was unique among all of his predecessors in that he did not hold any prior government position before he took the presidential oath of office on January 20, 2017. Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment could only disqualify Trump if the presidential oath he took on that date was as an "Officer[] of the United States." The President is an "Officer" and holds an "Office." That much is not disputed. But is the President an "Officer of the United States"? If the presidency is not an "Officer[] of the United States" for purposes of Section 3, then the "full sweep and force" of that provision could not touch Trump. In 2021 we published an article discussing whether the President is an "Officer[] of the United States" for purposes of Section 3.[10] We concluded "that the President is not a Section 3 'officer of the United States.'"[11]

In their article, Baude and Paulsen summarily dismiss our position. Baude and Paulsen contend that our textualist approach is "hidden-meaning hermeneutics" that renders Section 3 "a 'secret code' loaded with hidden meanings discernible only by a select priesthood of illuminati."[12] This sort of argumentation is, once again, misplaced hyperbole. Instead, Baude and Paulsen do not address the evidence we have put forward. And they left unrebutted several sources, from the period roughly contemporaneous with ratification, that support the position that the President is not an "Officer of the United States." To preempt an obvious, and predictable response, of course the President is an officer and holds an office. But that is not the relevant question. The relevant question is whether the President is an "Officer of the United States" as that phrase is used in Section 3. The Framers of the Constitution of 1788 and Section 3 used different "office"- and "officer"-language throughout the original Constitution and even

---

[10] Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Is the President an 'Officer of the United States' for Purposes of Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment, 15 N.Y.U. J. L. & LIBERTY 1 (2021).

[11] Id. at 54.

[12] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 104.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

within Section 3. We should endeavor to establish the meaning of the language they chose, and we do not assume that when they chose terms which were readily distinguishable from one another that such terms had identical meanings. The presumption ought to be that when different language is chosen, it was intended and understood as having different meanings. That presumption ought not be casually disregarded. Yet, Baude and Paulsen do precisely that: they assume that Section 3's "Office . . . . under the United States"-language and "officer of the United States"-language are coextensive and both reach the presidency.

Baude and Paulsen disregard substantial evidence about the meaning of the phrase "Officers of the United States" in the Constitution of 1788. And they disregard the fact that the debates they cite from the 1860s in support of their position look back to debates from the early Republic. These early debates discussed the meaning of "office"- and "officer"-language in the Constitution of 1788. Instead of parsing the Constitution of 1788 and early debates, Baude and Paulsen focus on original intentions and consequentialism. These sorts of arguments are weak evidence of original public meaning and do not pass originalist muster. Baude and Paulsen ignore authorities ranging from Justice Story's scholarship to Chief Justice Roberts's opinions for the Supreme Court. Baude and Paulsen conclude, "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ."[13] Yet Baude and Paulsen simply look away from contrary evidence.

What is Baude and Paulsen's theory of what "Officer of the United States" meant in 1868? They are positively certain that language included the President—a conclusion that would address Donald Trump's eligibility for re-election, but not much else. But they do not explain what other positions are included and excluded by the constitutional text at issue here. We suggest that if ever a full-accounting of the meaning of "Officer of the United States" was needed, it would be in a case that could disqualify a leading presidential candidate. Without ever explaining what Section 3's "officer of the United States"-language means, they only seek to establish that the President falls in that category. In short, Baude and Paulsen punched a textualist ticket good for one ride on the Trump train. They tell us the President is an "Officer of the United States," but they will not tell us much else. If we are correct on this textual point, then Trump cannot be disqualified under Section 3. Before Trump can be swept or forced

---

[13] Id. at 103.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

into Section 3, Baude and Paulsen must fully grapple with all originalist and textualist evidence.

***

We close with a general observation about this new article. Baude and Paulsen make more than a few novel claims, which we have not seen in any of their prior published scholarship. Rather than cautiously approaching their first foray in this area, Baude and Paulsen make some claims with absolute certitude, and then go on to re-express their position in different terms, and then to hedge on the central question. A simple example will suffice. In one place, Baude and Paulsen write that "it is not at all clear that [Section 3] inflicts punishment."[14] And in another place, Baude and Paulsen write that Section 3 is an "offense, conviction, and punishment all rolled into one."[15] Baude and Paulsen fail to explain whether Section 3 does or does not inflict a punishment. As a result of these and other internal discrepancies and tensions, their lengthy paper, which they have and continue to substantively update, presents something of a moving target.[16] They use charged language against long dead actors who, because they are dead, are in no position to defend themselves and their handiwork. Baude and Paulsen disagree with many, and those who disagree with them are not merely characterized as wrong, but as inept, unethical, disloyal, or occultish. For these reasons, and others, we have considerable methodological differences with Baude and Paulsen. And given the seriousness of the central issues, and the speed with which it may race through the state and federal courts and executive bodies controlling ballot access, reasonable caution and care are in order. We suggest that scholars, litigants, elections administrators, and judges allow their article to percolate in the literature before placing too great a reliance on its novel claims.

---

[14] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 53.

[15] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 20. The language of the article has since changed. See discussion supra note 2. The former statement remains. See id. at 53. But they've tweaked the "rolled into one" line. The article now states that Section 3 "enacts its standard and imposes its consequences all at once." Id. at 20. A "consequence" seems to be a synonym for "punishment." The tension remains.

[16] See discussion supra note 2.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I. Two Senses of Self-Execution: Sword and Shield

Throughout their article, Baude and Paulsen state unequivocally that Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing. They write that "disqualification requires no further legislation or other action, by anybody, to be operative."[17] Rather, "[t]he disqualification simply is."[18] We do not disagree that a provision of the Constitution is. If that were all Baude and Paulsen meant by self-execution, that "A=A" or "Section 3 is because Section 3 is," we would not disagree, and we think few would or should care. But that tautological statement does not resolve what the scope of Section 3 is, and more importantly, how it is enforced. These are the actual questions at stake when we discuss "self-execution."

In our American constitutional tradition there are two distinct senses of self-execution. First, as a shield—or a defense. And second, as a sword—or a theory of liability or cause of action supporting affirmative relief. The former is customarily asserted as a defense in an action brought by others; the latter is asserted offensively by an applicant seeking affirmative relief.

For example, when the government sues or prosecutes a person, the defendant can argue that the Constitution prohibits the government's action. In other words, the Constitution is raised defensively. In this first sense, the Constitution does not require any further legislation or action by Congress. In these circumstances, the Constitution is, as Baude and Paulsen write, "self-executing."

In the second sense, the Constitution is used offensively–as a cause of action supporting affirmative relief. For example, a person goes to court, and sues the government or its officers for damages in relation to a breach of contract or in response to a constitutional tort committed by government actors. As a general matter, to sue the federal government or its officers, a private individual litigant must invoke a federal statutory cause of action. It is not enough to merely allege some unconstitutional state action in the abstract.[19] Section 1983, including

---

[17] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 18.

[18] Id.

[19] See e.g., Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Ctr., Inc., 575 U.S. 320, 326 (2015) (rejecting the proposition that "the Supremacy Clause creates a cause of action for its violation" in the federal court's equitable jurisdiction); Trump v. Sierra Club, 140 S. Ct. 1, 1 (2019) (mem.) (stating that the federal government had its statutory antecedents (i.e., the Second Enforcement Act, also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871), is the primary modern statute that private individuals use to vindicate constitutional rights when suing state government officers.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Constitutional provisions are not automatically self-executing when used offensively by an applicant seeking affirmative relief. Nor is there any presumption that constitutional provisions are self-executing. Indeed, whether any particular provision is or is not self-executing is not obvious, and frequently, the issue cannot be resolved based solely on the provision's text. Consider Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. In an early decision, Chief Justice Marshall held that the Supreme Court would automatically enjoy all of the appellate jurisdiction granted by Article III if not cut back by a federal statute. But in even-earlier decisions, Chief Justice Ellsworth and Associate Justice Samuel Chase,[20] took the position that the grant of appellate jurisdiction was not self-executing. Rather, Congress had to affirmatively grant that jurisdiction by statute. Today, it appears that the Ellsworth–Chase view is the prevailing view. Still, with regard to Article III, there is no consensus that such self-execution is a default. Moreover, there is no presumption that treaties are self-executing.

Baude and Paulsen analogize between the qualifications in Article I (such as the age requirements) and the disqualifications in

---

"made a sufficient showing at this stage that the plaintiffs have no cause of action"); see also Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, The Unresolved Threshold Issues in the Emoluments Clauses Litigation: The President Has Three Bodies and There Is No Cause of Action for Ultra Vires Conduct, 19 GEO. J. L. & PUB. POL'Y 163, 214–15 (2022) ("The plaintiffs [in the Foreign Emoluments Clause litigation] cited Armstrong, but they failed to note that in this case the Supreme Court held that there was no equitable cause of action. Armstrong cuts against plaintiffs' free-floating claim to an equitable ultra vires cause of action." (citations omitted)). In any event, it is not clear how an equitable cause of action could be used to disqualify a candidate based on Section 3. To reinforce the point about the need for federal legislation, under the Court's "traditionally cautious approach to equitable powers," Congress is responsible for "any substantial expansion of past practice." See Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. All. Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 329 (1999).

[20] Associate Justice Samuel Chase, from Maryland, was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Washington. Chase served on the Supreme Court from 1796 to 1811. See Justices 1789 to Present, SUP. CT. OF THE U.S., https://www.supremecourt.gov/about/members_text.aspx. Justice Samuel Chase of Maryland should not be confused with Chief Justice Salmon Chase, from Ohio, who was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Lincoln. Chief Justice Salmon Chase served on the Supreme Court from 1864 to 1873. Id. There is no known relationship between the two Chases.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section 3. They contend that the former are clearly self-executing, so the latter should be self-executing as well. Not so. Congress's internal proceedings follow parliamentary rules. These rules include, for example, qualifications and the quorum rules. These internal rules are generally "under-enforced," and when enforced, they are enforced in a discretionary manner. For example, the House and Senate have issued oaths to members who were below the Article I age requirement. And both Houses, in the absence of a member's objection, will routinely hold sessions and conduct business in the absence of a "quorum," that is, a majority of members actually being present. We do not think there is any consensus with regard to whether Article I's qualification requirements are self-executing. Nor are treaties presumptively self-executing.

Is Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment self-executing? Our answer is two-fold. Section 1 can only be wielded as a sword by an applicant seeking affirmative relief if there is federal enforcement legislation, such as Section 1983 (and its statutory antecedents). But Section 1 can be wielded as a shield without legislation. Section 1 is self-executing as a set of defenses. The Supreme Court's leading Fourteenth Amendment cases reflect this dichotomy. Section 1 was used as a shield in The Slaughter-House Cases, United States v. Cruikshank, and Plessy v. Ferguson. Section 1 was used as a sword in Bradwell v. Illinois, and in countless other cases that invoke Section 1983 and its statutory antecedents. Baude and Paulsen fail to account for the two senses of self-execution.

A. Is Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court self-executing?

We think a good starting point to consider the question of whether Section 3 is self-executing in the courts and elsewhere, is to ask whether other constitutional provisions are self-executing. We examine Article III itself because it has been discussed continuously by courts and others during ratification and since. The canonical Marbury v. Madison was one such case.

The Constitution does not specify what lower federal courts, if any, Congress must create. And having created lower federal courts, what jurisdiction the lower federal courts possess, as general matter, is determined by Congress.[21]

---

[21] See, e.g., Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. 20, 1 Stat. 73, https://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/judiciary_act.asp; RICHARD H. FALLON, JR., ET AL., HART AND WECHSLER'S THE FEDERAL COURTS AND THE

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Supreme Court was different. Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 provided that the Supreme Court "shall have original Jurisdiction" in "all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party."[22] Once the Supreme Court was established by statute, the widely accepted (albeit not universal) view is that the Court would have had all those heads of original jurisdiction, even in the absence of implementing legislation.[23] And Marbury v. Madison teaches that Congress cannot expand the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction.

What about the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction? Article III, Section 2, Clause 2 provides further, "In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."[24] The language here is strong. It uses words like "shall" and "all." Much of what is stated here appears mandatory. But the text also provides that Congress can make "exceptions" and "regulations" to that appellate jurisdiction. Which way does the text cut? Stated in modern terms, was the Supreme Court's Article III appellate jurisdiction self-executing? In other words, if Congress merely established the Supreme Court, but did not grant any appellate jurisdiction, would the Supreme Court automatically enjoy all the appellate jurisdiction "granted" by Article III or none at all? Not surprisingly, the answer is unclear.

In an early decision, Chief Justice Marshall said yes—the Court would enjoy all the Article III jurisdiction. But in even-earlier decisions, Chief Justice Ellsworth and Justice Chase took the position that the answer was no—the Court would enjoy no Article III jurisdiction. Today, it appears that the Ellsworth–Chase view is the prevailing view. These decisions did not use the language of self-executing or non-self-executing. Still, these decisions demonstrate that there is no deep well of consensus that constitutional provisions are automatically self-executing or even presumptively self-executing. There is no consensus that such self-execution is a default.

FEDERAL SYSTEM 20 (6th ed. 2009) ("The judiciary article of the Constitution was not self-executing, and the first Congress therefore faced the task of structuring a court system.").

22 U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2, cl. 2.

23 Professor Akhil Amar has argued that Congress can grant the Supreme Court less than all the state-party-based original jurisdiction provided for in Article III. See Akhil Amar, Marbury, Section 13, and the Original Jurisdiction over the Supreme Court, 56 U. CHI. L. REV. 443, 481–83 (1989).

24 U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2, cl. 2 (emphases added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. Chief Justice Marshall stated that Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction for the Supreme Court was self-executing

There are two ways to understand Article III's "grant" of appellate jurisdiction. First, Article III's "grant" of appellate jurisdiction is an actual grant of jurisdiction. It might be described as a default. Once Congress establishes the Supreme Court, it enjoys all the appellate jurisdiction described in the provision, unless or until cut down by a congressional statute. Thus, no statute was required to put this provision into effect. Under this view, the provision could be characterized as self-executing.

An early proponent of this view was Chief Justice Marshall in Durousseau v. United States.[25] He stated: "The appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act. They are given by the constitution. But they are limited and regulated by the judicial and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject."[26]

In Marshall's view, Congress did not need to vest the Supreme Court with its appellate jurisdiction. Marshall's statement was also endorsed by Chief Justice Salmon Chase in Ex Parte McCardle, albeit in dicta.[27] But this Marshall–Chase view was and is not the only view.

---

[25] 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 307, 314 (1810). See RICHARD H. FALLON, JR. ET AL., HART AND WECHSLER'S THE FEDERAL COURTS AND THE FEDERAL SYSTEM 287 (7th ed. 2015) ("In Durousseau v. United States, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 307 (1810), the Court construed the Judiciary Act of 1789 as impliedly withdrawing the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in every situation in which jurisdiction was not expressly conferred. As a result, the power to issue an extraordinary writ as an exercise of appellate jurisdiction, if outside the affirmative grant of authority by statute, may be deemed to have impliedly been precluded by Congress.").

[26] Id.

[27] Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506, 513 (1868) ("It is unnecessary to consider whether, if Congress had made no exceptions and no regulations, this court might not have exercised general appellate jurisdiction under rules prescribed by itself. For among the earliest acts of the first Congress, at its first session, was the act of September 24th, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States. That act provided for the organization of this court, and prescribed regulations for the exercise of its jurisdiction. The source of that jurisdiction, and the limitations of it by the Constitution and by statute, have been on several occasions subjects of consideration here.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2. Chief Justice Ellsworth and Justice Chase stated that Article III's grant of appellate jurisdiction for the Supreme Court was not self-executing

There is a second way to understand Article III's "grant" of appellate jurisdiction: as a jurisdictional ceiling. No appellate jurisdiction flows to the Supreme Court except if granted by Congress, and although Congress can grant less appellate jurisdiction than that described in the provision—or, perhaps, even none at all—it cannot grant more. Any actual appellate jurisdiction enjoyed by the Supreme Court requires a statute. If so, then this provision is not self-executing. The provision requires a congressional statute to put it into effect.

This view was articulated early on by Chief Justice Ellsworth in Wiscart v. D'Auchy.[28] Ellsworth stated:

> [T]he [Supreme Court's] appellate jurisdiction is, likewise, qualified; inasmuch as it is given 'with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make.' Here then, is the ground, and the only ground, on which we can sustain an appeal. If Congress has provided no rule to regulate our proceedings, we cannot exercise an appellate jurisdiction; and if the rule is provided, we cannot depart from it. The question, therefore, on the constitutional point of an appellate jurisdiction, is simply, whether Congress has established any rule for regulating its exercise?[29]

Simply put, if Congress did not enact a statute granting the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, then the Supreme Court would have lacked that appellate jurisdiction. In theory at least, had Congress never given the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction, it would have only maintained its original jurisdiction. Chief Justice Ellsworth was hardly alone in reaching this conclusion. In Turner v. Bank of North America,[30] Justice Chase put forth a similar view. Chase stated: "If congress has given the power to this court, we possess it, not otherwise: and if congress has not given the power to us, or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal."[31]

---

[28] 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 321, 327 (1796) (Ellsworth, C.J.).

[29] Id. (emphases added).

[30] 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 8 (1799).

[31] Id. at 10 n.1 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Many courts have endorsed the Ellsworth-Chase view. In Barry v. Mercein,[32] the Court cited Wiscart, and reasoned that "the Supreme Court have their appellate jurisdiction only in those cases in which it is affirmatively given by the acts of Congress, and no such appellate jurisdiction is given in this case."[33] In Daniels v. Railroad Co.,[34] the Court explained that "it is for Congress to determine how far, within the limits of the capacity of this court to take, appellate jurisdiction shall be given, and when conferred, it can be exercised only to the extent and in the manner prescribed by law. In these respects it is wholly the creature of legislation."[35] In The Francis Wright,[36] the majority opinion quoted Justice Ellsworth's view from Wiscart, and noted that Ellsworth "spoke for the majority of the Court."[37] And so on.[38]

3. Particular constitutional provisions are not presumptively self-executing

Which view is correct as a matter of original public meaning? It is not obvious. What is the current view? The Congressional Research Service suggests that the Ellsworth-Chase view is the dominant one today.[39]

The question of whether or not Article III's appellate jurisdiction clause is self-executing is a matter of debate. In reaching their various conclusions and decisions, these Supreme Court Justices did not use the language of "self-executing" or "non-self-executing." The Justices did not exclusively rely on efforts to parse the words of 32 46 U.S. (5 How.) 103 (1847).

---

33 Id. at 117.

34 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 250 (1865).

35 Id. at 254.

36 105 U.S. 381 (1881)

37 Id. at 384–85 (quoting Ellsworth's view from Wiscart)

38 See, e.g., Rogers v. Watson, 46 F.2d 753, 755 (7th Cir. 1931) (quoting Chase's view from Turner); Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. 163, 205 (1873) (Clifford, J., dissenting) ("[I]it follows that the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution can only be exercised by this court in pursuance of an act of Congress." (citing Wiscart v. D'Auchy, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 321, 327 (1796))).

39 See CONG. RSCH. SERV., THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES: ANALYSIS AND INTERPRETATION, S. Doc. No. 117-2, at 1173–74 (2022) ("However, later cases have generally take the view that 'the Supreme Court possesses no appellate power in any case, unless conferred upon it by act of Congress.'" (quoting Barry v. Mercein, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 103, 119 (1847))).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the provision. They put no stock in the fact that Article III uses apparently mandatory language like "shall" and "all." Rather, the courts examined Article III's language, history, purpose, and other factors. We have seen no suggestion of anything like a general rule that constitutional provisions are or are not self-executing. We have seen no decision of the Court affirming a general rule that constitutional provisions are even presumptively self-executing. This background should inform our discussion of whether or not Section 3 is self-executing

B. Are Article I qualifications self-executing?

Baude and Paulsen make a constitutional analogy. They claim that the disqualification element of Section 3 is self-executing in the same sense as the qualification elements in Article I of the Constitution of 1788. This analogy does not support their position. Rules governing the internal organization and proceedings of Congress are parliamentary rules. These rules include qualifications and quorum rules. These rules are generally "under-enforced," and when enforced, they are enforced in a discretionary manner.

For example, the House and Senate have not uniformly disqualified members who were below the age requirements in Article I. Indeed, Representative Victor L. Berger, the only member of Congress whose exclusion was purportedly premised on Section 3, was later allowed to serve in future Congresses. And state legislators, who also swear an oath to the Constitution, have elected several types of (purportedly) underage senators: (1) senators who had not yet reached the age of thirty when elected; (2) senators who would not reach the age of thirty by the time the new Congress's constitutional term had begun; (3) senators who would not reach the age of thirty when Congress was scheduled (by statute) to meet; and (4) even senators who would not reach the age of thirty by the end of the term for which the senators they chose were elected! And, these members-elect have been seated. Moreover, voters have also elected candidates who did not meet the Article I qualifications, and these members-elect also have been seated. This history does not support Baude and Paulsen's view that virtually everyone under the sun has an affirmative duty to disqualify candidates pursuant to Article I and, by analogy, under Section 3.

1. Parliamentary rules are enforced in a discretionary manner

When the Constitution puts forward a parliamentary rule, as a general matter, that rule is discretionary, and not mandatory. Such rules are best considered aspirational. Each house of Congress has the discretion to enforce its own practices pursuant to the "rules of its proceedings."

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Consider a simple example. The Constitution requires that a "majority of each" house "shall constitute a Quorum to do Business."[40] It is widely observed and widely known, for example, that the Constitution's majority quorum rule is not always enforced: each House will meet, debate, and pass orders, resolutions, and votes absent a majority of its members present, and each House's presiding officers, absent objections, will continuously presume the existence of a quorum once established.

Any enforcement of the Constitution's quorum provision depends on each chamber's rules, and the rules' application depends on the members and each chamber's presiding officers—but all such enforcement is discretionary and voluntary. The presiding officers and the members are not required to notice the absence of a quorum. As a general matter, this presumption of a continuously-present quorum is disturbed when a member makes an objection suggesting the absence of a quorum. At which point the roll is called. When these rules are enforced, it is because someone chooses to do so, not because the Constitution mandates that he must. Of course each House could modify its rules to require a quorum call before or after any business is transacted. But Congress has not adopted any such rule.

Some observers may see Congress's regular practice as an unconstitutional power grab by those in attendance. But the alternative view is that quorum rules are discretionary, and that waiver is part of the Constitution's quorum rule itself. This argument can be premised on practice or constitutional liquidation. Or, this argument can be premised on originalism. That is, the original public meaning of the Constitution's quorum language incorporated the concept that the rule is only at-play based on a member's objection and that even objections must conform to chamber rules. From either a practice-based or an originalist perspective, the rule is not "under-enforced" at all. Again, if waiver is part of the rule, then the rule is not "under-enforced."

The Constitution's parliamentary provisions, including its qualification provisions, follow chamber rules. These rules may take the form of statutes or single house rules. And these provisions are enforced by members and by the chambers' presiding officers. In what sense are these provisions self-executing? The Constitution does not affirmatively state how the quorum provision should be enforced. Rather, yesteryear's, as well as today's practices unfolded as they did

---

[40] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 5, cl. 1.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

because the Constitution's provisions were genealogical legal successors to prior rules in state constitutions, colonial assemblies, and other parliamentary chambers in the Westminster tradition. Did anyone think otherwise in 1265, 1689, 1788, or 1868? Did anyone believe a subject or citizen or any highly placed government official (outside the parliamentary chamber) had a legal right to vindicate a maximalist enforce-at-all-costs vision of these rules? We highly doubt it.

If you think otherwise, just try seeking a federal court order compelling a house of Congress to cease operations when a chamber lacks a quorum. Or, try seeking a federal court order declaring a statute unconstitutional or unenforceable based on its having been passed by a house of Congress which lacked a quorum. You will be stymied at every turn. Indeed, the D.C. Circuit rejected a challenge brought by members to a COVID-era House rule that allowed for proxy voting.[41] Under this rule, members didn't even have to be physically present in the chamber to vote.[42] The plaintiffs argued that this rule violated the Quorum Clause.[43] The court, however, declined to reach the merits, finding that this case was barred by the Speech or Debate Clause.

We think caution is especially appropriate when dealing with parliamentary rules. These rules are not the usual province of the courts and today's legal scholarship; rather, they are enforced in political processes. Moreover, these rules are part of a mimetic legal tradition largely guided by observation, as opposed to written texts, and this tradition may seem foreign to those not steeped in it.

2. The House and Senate have not disqualified several members-elect who were below the age requirements in Article I

The Constitution requires that members of the House and Senate must attain the ages of twenty-five and thirty, respectively. Baude and Paulsen write that the age-disqualification under Article I is "automatic" and the "Constitution's rule is self-executing."[44] Likewise, Mark Graber contends that "disqualification for insurrection is in legal 41 McCarthy v. Pelosi, 5 F.4th 34, 37 (D.C. Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 897 (2022).

---

42 Id. at 37 ("Any Member 'whose presence is recorded by a designated proxy,' or whose vote is cast by a proxy, 'shall be counted for the purpose of establishing a quorum.'" (quoting H.R. 965, 116th Cong. (2020))).

43 Opening Brief of Plaintiffs-Appellants at 40, McCarthy v. Pelosi, 5 F.4th 34 (D.C. Cir. 2021) (No. 20-5240) ("Because H. Res. 965 specifically authorizes absent Members to be counted toward the quorum requirement, it is unconstitutional."), https://perma.cc/X6HU-UF5F.

44 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 18.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

principle no different from disqualification for being underage or not a citizen."[45] But it simply isn't the case that the age requirements in the Constitution are self-executing in the sense that Baude and Paulsen describe. All execution requires rules, and even rules can be waived by majority action.

An under-age member-elect who arrives on Capitol Hill is not automatically denied a seat. Rather, enforcement of the age requirements of Article I are discretionary, and not mandatory. A member-elect who shows up lacking some qualification risks being lawfully excluded. And those who elect such persons take that risk too. The fact that some activity poses a risk does not, without more, make it illegal or unconstitutional. To put it another way, no one has an affirmative duty to investigate a member-elect's qualifications. And if a member or member-elect discovers that some other member-elect lacks a prescribed qualification, nothing in the text of the Constitution imposes any specific affirmative duty on the member to share that information with his fellow members. Nor is there any affirmative obligation to launch objections to the member-elect's becoming a member. Moreover, even if a house holds a vote to exclude, nothing in the Constitution mandates that other members attend the chamber when that specific vote is held. And even if a member is in attendance, the Constitution's text does not squarely compel anyone to vote anything other than present on the motion to exclude.

History supports this understanding of congressional practice. William Claiborne of Tennessee, who was born in 1775, was elected to and then began serving his two-year House term in 1797.[46] He was only 22 years old. The House did not disqualify him. Claiborne was re-elected in 1799, when he was still not yet twenty-five. It was only some time during his second term that he finally reached the age of twenty-five.

Other examples abound. In 1806, Henry Clay of Kentucky was elected to the Senate by his state legislature.[47] He took the oath, and he began serving while he was still twenty-nine years old. In 1816, the

---

[45] Mark Graber, Damn the Torpedoes: Disqualifying Donald Trump, BALKINIZATION (Aug. 26, 2023), https://balkin.blogspot.com/2023/08/damn-torpedoes-disqualifying-donald.html.

[46] The Youngest Representative in House History, William Charles Cole Claiborne, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: HIST., ART, & ARCHIVES, https://history.house.gov/Historical-Highlights/1800-1850/The-youngest-Representative-in-House-history,-William-Charles-Cole-Claiborne/.

[47] Henry Clay: A Featured Biography, U.S. SENATE, https://www.senate.gov/senators/FeaturedBios/Featured_Bio_Clay.htm.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Senate administered the oath to Armistead Mason of Virginia, who was elected by the state legislature to a Senate term to fill a vacancy.[48] The unexpired term would stretch about a year. At the time of Mason's election, he was twenty-eight years old. His elected term ended in March 1817, and he was still several months shy of his thirtieth birthday when his term ended. In 1818, the Senate administered the oath to John Henry Eaton of Tennessee.[49] At the time, Eaton was only twenty-eight years old. According to the Senate Historical Office, "Apparently no one asked John Eaton how old he was."[50]

To further prove the point that the age qualifications are not self-executing, consider Rush Holt of West Virginia. In 1934, Holt defeated incumbent Senator Henry Hatfield, an incumbent. Holt was elected to the Senate at the age of twenty-nine. Holt pledged to wait until after his thirtieth birthday before taking the oath. Hatfield, Holt's defeated opponent, filed a petition with the Senate, contending that Holt did not meet the minimum age requirement. The Senate dismissed Hatfield's petition on the grounds that "the age requirement applies at the time of oath-taking rather than the time of election, or the time the term [to which the candidate is elected] begins."[51] Hatfield could not force his colleagues to declare Holt disqualified and his seat vacant. And we think Hatfield would have been unsuccessful had he tried to seek relief through judicial means in state or federal court.

Any analogy between the qualifications in Article I and the disqualification standard in Section 3 breaks down for another reason. The Judge of the Elections Clause imposes a judicial-like duty on each house as a whole. And by implication, that duty may extend to individual members who pass on the qualifications of other members or members-elect. In this role, individual members may serve in something like a judicial capacity. What happens if there is a member who objects to seating a member-elect based on the latter's failing to meet the Article I's qualifications? In such a proceeding, it is reasonable to interpret the Constitution to mean that members should vote to allow a qualified member to be seated, and concomitantly, that the members should vote not to seat (temporarily or permanently) a member-elect lacking some constitutional qualification (at least until 48 Youngest Senator, U.S. SENATE, https://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/history/minute/Youngest_Senator.htm.

---

49 Id.

50 Id.

51 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the qualifications are met).[52] But the "force" of "should" here is weak, as the Constitution imposes no affirmative duty on the members to show up and vote in any particular proceeding. If members have any such duty as described here, that duty does not follow from the vagaries of Article I's twin qualifications clauses—for Representatives and Senators. Rather, that duty follows, if it follows at all, from the Judge-of-the-Elections Clause.[53]

However, Section 3 has no similar analogue to the Judge-of-the-Elections Clause. Section 3 does not explain who is to determine who is subject to disqualification, other than Congress in Section 5. And the text of Section 3 does not expressly burden Congress or anyone else with a judicial duty in resolving any Section 3 controversy. Any duty imposed by Section 5 to enforce Section 3 falls entirely in the sound discretion of Congress. If Section 3 is a traditional qualification, then Congress may very well have a power to act on Section 3 in regard to its members-elect. (Baude and Paulsen acknowledge this point.[54]) But Section 3 and the Constitution are otherwise silent as to who or what institutions are to enforce Section 3 in regard to other positions, including the presidency. Silent, except for Section 5 and the Necessary and Proper Clause which would impose that duty on Congress, by implication, not on the States.

None of what we have described above should be controversial. Yet, Baude and Paulsen write that the age-disqualification under Article I is "automatic" and the "Constitution's rule is self-executing."[55] Representative Claiborne and Senators Clay, Mason, and Eaton might have differed with Baude and Paulsen on that point. For each of these members, and for the voters and state legislators who elected them, the member-elect was seated immediately, or after a delay. That delay could have been due to a chamber's not taking action. Or, a chamber may decide to allow a member to delay taking his seat until he reached Article I's prescribed age. Nothing here is automatic or self-executing.

---

52 See generally Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969); U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995).

53 U.S. CONST. art. 1, § 5, cl. 1.

54 See Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 29 ("Each house of Congress has two specific powers with respect to its own membership in which Section Three might come into play. First, each house has power to 'Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications' of 'its own Members.' Since one of those qualifications is non-disqualification under Section Three, each house can and must judge whether Section Three forbids the seating of a member." (quoting U.S. CONST. art. 1, § 5, cl. 1.)).

55 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 18.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Each rule is subject to customary parliamentary controls allowing for waiver, and each rule is enforced, if enforced at all, as a matter of discretion. These rules mimic: Don't ask, don't tell. That's how they are "enforced." By contrast, according to Baude and Paulsen, a great swathe of government officials, state and federal, have an affirmative duty to go out and enforce Section 3. If Section 3 is modeled on Article I's Qualifications Clauses, the result Baude and Paulsen prescribe does not follow.

Indeed, under Baude and Paulsen's approach, Section 3 modified the Free Speech Clause and prohibitions against retroactivity. Why wouldn't Section 3 also modify the Judge of the Elections Clause? Going forward, each Chamber may no longer have the sole power to determine whether a member-elect is subject to disqualification under Section 3. Rather, other constitutional actors, including the courts, can ensure that Congress does not allow former insurrectionists to take the oath as members. We cannot predict with any clarity what the results of Baude and Paulsen's position is because they put forward no theory of constitutional change explaining what prior law (constitutional or statutory) is upset or changed by Section 3. We discuss Baude and Paulsen's lack of a theory of constitutional change below.

Baude and Paulsen are correct that no legislation would have been needed to "disqualify," in the abstract sense, the underage members discussed above. The Constitution imposed the obligation to meet a minimum age. But some legal process was needed to execute that legal obligation. For enforcement, Article I's qualification rules are implemented or operationalized by both statutes and chamber rules. In that practical sense, even Article I's qualification rules are not "self-executing." Below, we will discuss Chief Justice Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case. We think this practical understanding of qualifications is what Chase addressed in his decision. Where positions other than members of Congress are at issue, enforcement of Section 3 requires statutes, which can only be supplied by Congress.

3. The 66th Congress excluded Victor L. Berger, allegedly for a Section 3 violation, but he was seated by the 68th Congress

Article I established age, citizenship, and inhabitancy qualifications for members of Congress. These provisions begin "No person shall be a Representative . . . ."[56] and "No person shall be a Representative . . . ."[57] Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment uses

---

[56] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 (emphasis added).

[57] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 3, cl. 3 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

similar language: "No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State . . . ." Based on the similarity in the text, the restrictions in Section 3 should function in the same manner as the qualifications in Article I.

If the restrictions in Section 3 function like the qualifications in Article I, then the former restrictions cannot apply prior to the start of the elected official's constitutional term. Indeed, the effect of those eligibility restrictions may even kick in after that time, that is, at the start of the elected official's constitutional term, should the candidate delay taking his constitutionally prescribed oath. For example, a member-elect who is subject to a Section 3 disqualification could delay taking the oath to afford both Houses of Congress an opportunity to relieve him of the disability by a 2/3 vote. And Congress could relieve him of that disability at any point during his two-year elected term. Section 3 would not prevent a purportedly disqualified candidate from being elected by the people. All the more so, Section 3 would not prevent a purportedly disqualified candidate from being placed on the ballot.[58]

If Article I qualifications can be enforced in a discretionary manner, can Section 3 restrictions also be enforced in a discretionary manner? A prominent example may illustrate this principle: the case of Representative Victor L. Berger.[59] In November 1918, Berger, a Socialist, was elected to represent a House district for Milwaukee, Wisconsin in the 66th Congress. In February 1919, Berger was convicted in federal district court proceedings for violating the Espionage Act of 1917. When the 66th Congress met on May 19, 1919, Berger was free on bail. Faced with this conviction, the House proceeded to exclude Berger by resolution on November 10, 1919. The standard narrative is that his exclusion was based upon his anti-war agitation during World War I—in other words, according to the standard narrative, his exclusion was founded upon Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, the legal standard or rationale on which the House refused to seat Berger is far from clear.[60]

---

[58] We discuss the interplay between presidential qualifications and Section 3 infra in Part II.B.5.h.3.

[59] See JOSH CHAFETZ, DEMOCRACY'S PRIVILEGED FEW 189–91 (2007); BERGER, Victor Luitpold 1860–1929, BIOGRAPHICAL DIRECTORY OF THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS, https://bioguide.congress.gov/search/bio/B000407.

[60] Note, The Power of a House of Congress to Judge the Qualifications of its Members, 81 HARV. L. REV. 673, 681 (1968) ("[T]he majority of the reporting committee declared [in the Berger exclusion case] that the House had always had the right to disqualify on grounds other than the enumerated ones . . . ."). But cf.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Berger's seat was declared vacant. A new election was held, in which Berger was a candidate, and notwithstanding his re-election to the seat, the 66th House refused to seat him a second time. In November 1920, Berger ran yet again in the general election for a seat in the 67th House.[61] He was not excluded from the ballot. Berger did not prevail in that election. In January 1921, before the 66th House expired, the Supreme Court overturned his conviction.[62] After the Supreme Court's ruling, Berger ran for, and prevailed, in three subsequent elections. He was seated in the 68th, 69th, and 70th Houses.

Baude and Paulsen write that "curiously, after the convictions were reversed the House allowed Berger to sit in the sixty-eighth through seventieth Congresses."[63] They do not explain why this seating was "curious." The Supreme Court's decision vacating a conviction under the espionage act could have no legal effect on a Section 3 disqualification. Only Congress can relieve that disability by a 2/3 vote of each House. And no such vote took place.

What lessons should be drawn from the case of Victor L. Berger? The first option is that Berger was in fact disqualified pursuant to Section 3. The 66th Congress enforced that disqualification by refusing to seat Berger. However, the 68th, 69th, and 70th Congresses declined to enforce that qualification—in much the same way that previous Houses seated members who had not yet reached the requisite age. Under this first option, constitutional qualifications, including Section 3, are simply not mandatory. Rather, they are discretionary, enforced under standing parliamentary rules, at the discretion of the members, who are not personally obligated to see that such provisions are carried out. If this option is the right one, then a discretionary Section 3 disqualification cannot be self-executing, in the expansive sense argued for by Baude and Paulsen—Section 3 does not impose an obligation on every level of government and every official to enforce the Constitution's provision.

There is a second option: the decision of the 66th House was lawful, and the decision of the 68th House to admit Berger, absent his disability being removed by a 2/3 vote of each house, was unlawful. This option, however, is in tension with a general principle: when faced with two rules of decision from equal authorities—e.g., the 66th House id. ("[I]t seems that the principal basis for exclusion was the applicability of section 3 of the fourteenth amendment." (emphasis added)).

---

61 Philip M. Glende, Victor Berger's Dangerous Ideas, in 26 ESSAYS IN ECONOMIC AND BUSINESS HISTORY 5, 17 n.44 (2008), https://tinyurl.com/53x9j465.

62 Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22 (1921).

63 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 61 n. 219.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

and the 68th House—the later-in-time decision is controlling.[64] Indeed, the fact that Berger again appeared on the ballot, and that voters elected Berger to the 68th, 69th, and 70th Houses, and that he was seated in each separate, consecutive two-year House constitutional term, provides even more support that the later-in-time decisions should be given more weight. Again, this second option is not consistent with a self-executing Section 3, if a later House can expressly disagree with an earlier House.

There is a third option: the 68th Congress recognized that the 66th Congress acted unconstitutionally, such that its prior decision was entirely void. In other words, the later-in-time House rejected the determination of the earlier-in-time House. And why was the 66th House's decision void? Because the 66th House was relying on a general power to exclude apart from qualifications in the Constitution's text. In our view, a single House cannot enforce Section 3, absent an actual federal statute putting Section 3 into effect. Such a statute could conceivably authorize enforcement by a single House vote—that is through a vote of exclusion or expulsion. But absent such a statute, the 66th House's decision to exclude Berger, under the purported authority of Section 3, was also lawless and void. Indeed, it isn't even clear that a joint session of Congress, acting outside the confines of bicameralism and presentment, could enforce Section 3 absent a federal statute.

Those who have relied upon the Berger Exclusion Case as a sound precedent for Section 3 enforcement have got it entirely backwards. The 66th House's decision to exclude Berger may not have relied upon Section 3 at all. If the House relied upon Section 3, it only did so because its decision was supported by a prior conviction in federal district court proceedings, and the House receded from its exclusion decision after that conviction was overturned. In short, the Berger Exclusion Case supports the general view that exclusion under Section 3 requires a federal statutory basis.

4. State legislatures, who were bound by the Supremacy Clause, elected senators who were below the age requirement in Article I

The history of enforcement of Article I qualifications for members does not support Baude and Paulsen's position. These provisions are not self-executing. Rather, the practice concerning these [64] Baude and Paulsen at n.173 ("Hamilton continued, 'a mere rule of construction,' but it was an appropriate one, 'consonant to truth and propriety,' consistently recognized by courts as interpreters of law: that, as 'between the interfering acts of an equal authority that which was the last indication of its will should have the preference.'" (quoting Federalist No. 78 (Hamilton)).

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

provisions suggests that Congress must take affirmative action to enforce Article I qualification requirements.

By contrast, Baude and Paulsen characterize Article I's qualifications rules as "binding rule[s] of constitutional law."[65] What they do not make clear is that the binding force or bite of such rules is very limited. If Section 3 works in the same fashion as Article I's qualification rules, then Section 3 also has a very limited bite.

Let's assume that Baude and Paulsen are correct. Let's assume that if Congress is responsible for enforcing the qualifications in Article I, it follows that Congress is likewise responsible for enforcing the disqualification provisions in Section 3. After all, Section 5 gives the enforcement power to Congress, and no one else is expressly assigned any similar or coordinate power.

Yet, Baude and Paulsen argue that virtually everyone under the sun has an obligation to enforce Section 3. They write that this duty is imposed on "anybody who possesses legal authority (under relevant state or federal law) to decide whether somebody is eligible for office."[66] Baude and Paulsen provide a list of individuals covered by this mandate:

> state election officials; other state executive or administrative officials; state legislatures and governors; the two houses of Congress; the President and subordinate executive branch officers; state and federal judges deciding cases where such legal rules apply; even electors for the offices of president and vice president.[67]

Once again, the analogy to Article I qualifications offers Baude and Paulsen little support. We discussed above how the legislatures of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia elected Senators who had not yet reached the age of thirty, who would not be 30 at the start of their constitutional term, and even one who would not be 30 by the end of his constitutional term. Those state legislators swore an oath to the Constitution, and presumably, they too saw themselves bound by the Supremacy Clause. Yet, they elected Senators who failed to meet the constitutional requirements. Did they violate their oath? Could they have been sued in court for violating the self-executing requirements in

---

65 Id.

66 Id. at 22.

67 Id. at 23.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Article I? We think the answer has to be no and no. And we doubt Baude and Paulsen would argue otherwise. But if we are in agreement on this point, then Baude and Paulsen need to consider qualifying their statements that qualifications in Article I or Section 3 impose some sort of urgent, strong, self-enforcing, and mandatory obligation on anyone who swears an oath to the Constitution.

We think this history demonstrates that enforcement of Article I qualification rules is, in a substantial sense, discretionary and voluntary. We think it highly unlikely that a federal court would second-guess a house's exclusion or non-exclusion decision on the grounds enumerated in Article I. (Powell v. McCormack involved an alleged exclusion of a member on grounds beyond those enumerated in Article I.) Yet Baude and Paulsen argue that enforcement of Section 3 is somehow obviously mandatory. We think this conclusion is in conflict with practice from centuries of parliamentary practice, in addition to congressional practice from the antebellum era, which should be entitled to some weight.

5. Voters elect candidates who are below the age requirement in Article I

Baude and Paulsen omitted one group from their list of positions of who should go out and actively seek to enforce Section 3. Did you catch it?

Voters.

Of course, Baude and Paulsen could respond: "Voters are not part of the government." But why should that matter? Or, they could respond that voters do not have a "job . . . to figure out whether someone is legally qualified to office."[68] Is that so? In some States, for example, Florida, and perhaps many others, for voters to register, they must take an oath or affirmation to uphold the U.S. Constitution.[69] So do voters in Florida and elsewhere have an affirmative constitutional duty to enforce Section 3 via Florida state law procedures for objecting to candidates? If they fail in that duty, could the voters be sued or prosecuted? Would voting for a Section 3-covered candidate amount to giving "aid or comfort" to an enemy? (We'll come back to the "enemy" question later.) Moreover, at least some voters also serve in the government, and swear an oath to the Constitution. Do voters who hold

---

[68] Id. at 22.

[69] See FLA. STAT. § 97.051; Fields v. Askew, 279 So. 2d 822, 824 (Fla. 1973) (upholding statutory oath requirement), appeal dismissed, 414 U.S. 1148 (1974) (mem.).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

public office have an obligation to abstain from voting for a candidate who does not meet constitutional qualifications?

The absence of voters from Baude and Paulsen's list is remarkable in another way. Candidate ballot access is largely a matter of state election law. Yet, Baude and Paulsen provide an extensive list of government officials, state and federal, who they urge to enforce Section 3 pursuant to extant election laws. But many of these government officials are not connected to proceedings related to ballot control or election law in any obvious way. Why is the President on the list? Why governors? Why are governors listed at all? (Stay tuned.)

Indeed, we know of no government official who has the power to strike a candidate from the ballot on his own authority. As a general matter, when a state election law administrator or administrative body or court strikes a candidate from the ballot, it is done in the context of a challenge or contest brought by a registered voter or by another candidate. So even if Section 3 can be enforced by state election administrators, it is not self-executing; rather, as a general matter, such enforcement requires state statutes putting into effect a whole scheme of state ballot law including objections and contests. Whether the Fourteenth Amendment permits state legislatures to enact, and election administrators to enforce, Section 3 absent a federal statute authorizing such state action is, part and parcel, of what we are debating.

It is certainly true that some state election law administrators have struck candidates from the ballot absent any voter challenge or candidate contest. This limited exception has been permitted by courts in cases where there is an obvious defect on the face of a candidate's ballot petition. Such defects include a missing document, a missing candidate's signature on his statement of candidacy, etc. And even then, a candidate can object after-the-fact. But where an evidentiary hearing is necessary, state election law administrators cannot act sua sponte. This would seem to be Baude and Paulsen's position in regard to Trump, as they do not affirm that the factual "evidence" in regard to alleged insurrection is conclusive; rather, they write: "If the public record is accurate, the case [against Trump] is not even close."[70] So even Trump is entitled to some due process according to Baude and Paulsen.

---

[70] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 121.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

C. Is Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment self-executing?

The Fourteenth Amendment has five sections. Section 1 includes the Citizenship Clause, the Privileges or Immunities Clause, the Due Process Clause, and the Equal Protection Clause. These provisions are generally understood to constrain state power and recognize certain individual rights. Section 2 reduces a State's representation in Congress when that State denies adult males the right to vote. Section 3, the subject of this Article, does not impose any restrictions on state power. Nor does it recognize any individual rights. Rather, this provision disqualifies certain people from holding certain public positions in certain circumstances. And only the Congress can remove those disqualifications. Section 4 provides that "public debt of the United States . . . shall not be questioned," and that the United States and the States shall not be liable for debts based on "insurrection or rebellion" or for the "emancipation of any slave."[71] Section 4, like Section 3, does not recognize individual rights. Section 5 provides that Congress has the "power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article"[72]—that is, sections one through four.

All agree that Congress can enact legislation to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment. And, indeed Congress has long relied on this power to enact enforcement legislation. But what if Congress does not enact such legislation? The prevailing view is that Section 2, at least, can only be enforced through federal legislation.[73] There is some recent debate about whether the President can unilaterally invoke Section 4, in the absence of federal legislation, to raise the debt ceiling. But what is the effect of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, standing on its own? Stated differently, is Section 1 self-executing?

The question of whether Section 1 is self-executing has been argued to have some bearing on the question of whether Section 3 is self-executing. Some scholars contend that if Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing, then it must be the case that Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is likewise self-executing. (We think the enforcement of Sections 2 and 4 make the linkage between Sections 1 and 3 less than entirely clearcut.) Miles Lynch, for example,

---

71 U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 4.

72 U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 5.

73 Section 2 was only enforced once, following the 1870 census, and not since. See Gerard Magliocca, Our Unconstitutional Reapportionment Process, 86 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 774, 787–92 (2018).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

wrote that "[i]t would be inherently inconsistent to interpret" the language in Section 1 "as self-executing" but the language in Section 3 "as requiring enacting legislation."[74] Professor Michael Dorf explained that in light of the fact that the provisions in Section 1 are self-executing, including the Due Process Clause and Equal Protection Clauses, then Section 3 should likewise be viewed as self-executing.[75] Baude and Paulsen likewise contend that "We take it as obvious that Section One is self-executing."[76] They add, "Nobody thinks (for example) that the prohibitions of Section One are inoperative unless and until Congress enacts legislation pursuant to its Section Five legislative power to bring them to life."[77] That may be so, but the better question is in what fashion is Section 1 self-executing?

The answer to the self-execution question is two-fold. Section 1 is not self-executing in court as a set of causes of action providing affirmative relief unless Congress provides for its enforcement. Section 1 can only be wielded as a sword with federal legislation. But Section 1 can be wielded as a shield without federal legislation. Section 1 is self-executing as a set of defenses in court. The Supreme Court's leading Fourteenth Amendment cases reflect this dichotomy. Section 1 was used as a shield in The Slaughter-House Cases, United States v. Cruikshank, and Plessy v. Ferguson. Section 1 was used as a sword in Bradwell v. Illinois. Of course, the fact that a plaintiff or defendant sought to use Section 1 as a sword or shield does not mean that they prevailed on the merits. And plaintiffs have relied on Section 1983, and its historical antecedents in landmark cases like Brown v. Board of Education, Roe v. Wade, and Obergefell v. Hodges. These cases invoked federal enforcement legislation. These statutes provided the federal cause of action which made it possible to use the Fourteenth Amendment as a sword.

1. Section 1 and Treaties as a shield

Many of the Supreme Court's formative Fourteenth Amendment cases arose in a defensive posture. That is, defendants

---

74 Myles Lynch, Disloyalty & Disqualification: Reconstructing Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment, 30 WM. & MARY BILL RTS. J. 153, 206 (2021).

75 Michael C. Dorf, What It Means to Say That Section 3 of the 14th Amendment is Self-Executing, DORF ON LAW (Aug. 28, 2023), https://www.dorfonlaw.org/2023/08/what-it-means-to-say-that-section-3-of.html.

76 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 19.

77 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

asserted that some state action would violate Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. In other words, these defendants wielded Section 1 as a shield. There are many cases to choose from, but here we will focus on three. First, The Slaughter-House Cases arose from the Louisiana Attorney General's enforcement of a state law restricting the slaughtering of animals. As a defense, the defendants argued that the state law violated Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Second, United States v. Cruikshank arose from a motion to dismiss a criminal indictment on the grounds that the Fourteenth Amendment did not support the charges. (This case has some similarities with the Case of Jefferson Davis, which we will discuss below.) Third, Plessy v. Ferguson arose from a prosecution for violating a segregation law. In his defense, the defendant argued that the state law violated Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. These landmark cases did not need to rely on enforcement legislation because Section 1 was used in a defensive posture.

a. The Slaughter-House Cases

The Slaughter-House Cases (1873) was the Supreme Court's first definitive interpretation of the Privileges or Immunities Clause. The 5-4 decision construed that provision to protect only a narrow set of federal rights. Slaughter-House arose from a suit instituted by the Louisiana Attorney General against the Live Stock Dealers' and Butchers' Association of New Orleans. Specifically, the Attorney General argued that the butchers were violating a local law that restricted where animals could be slaughtered. The Louisiana Supreme Court observed that "[i]n their answer the defendants deny the right of the Attorney General to bring this suit; and they allege that the act . . . is unconstitutional."[78] The key point is that in the Slaughter-House Cases, the defendants' Fourteenth Amendment, Section 1-related rights were asserted as defenses. The majority ruled against the defendant-butchers, finding that the Privileges or Immunities Clause did not protect any sort of right to pursue a calling. And, for those keeping score at home, in regard to which Justices supported a broad interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, Chief Justice Chase dissented in Slaughter-House. Here, at least, Chase did not "knee-cap" the Fourteenth Amendment.

---

[78] State ex rel. Belden v. Fagan, 22 La. Ann. 545, 546 (1870).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

b. United States v. Cruikshank

United States v. Cruikshank (1876) arose from the Colfax Massacre.[79] More than one hundred freedmen were murdered by white militiamen. The United States indicted members of the gang, including William Cruikshank, for violating Section 6 of the Enforcement Act of 1870. That statute made it a crime to violate the "enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured . . . by the Constitution."[80] The United States argued that the lynch mob violated the rights of the freedmen to peaceably assemble and bear arms. The case turned, then, on whether those rights were rights secured by the Constitution. Those rights were secured in the First and Second Amendments. But under the rule in Barron v. Baltimore, the provisions of the Bill of Rights only constrained the federal government. In Cruikshank, the United States argued that the Fourteenth Amendment also protected the rights of peaceable assembly and the right to bear arms against wrongful invasion by individual conduct. And, the United States further argued that Congress had the power to enact laws, and here did enact such a law, that prohibited individual defendants from depriving others of rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.

After the defendants were convicted, the defendants moved to dismiss the indictment through a "motion in arrest of judgment."[81] Cruikshank argued that the Fourteenth Amendment did not protect the rights which the government sought to protect. Therefore, he contended, an indictment premised on violating these rights was deficient.[82] In other words, because these rights were not protected by Section 1, they were not protected by the Enforcement Act. Here, Cruikshank favored a narrow construction of the Fourteenth Amendment as a means to narrow the scope of the Enforcement Act. In contrast with the butchers in Slaughter-House, Cruikshank advanced a reading of Section 1 that did not protect individual rights—that is, the right of the freedmen to peaceably assemble and bear arms. But

---

79 92 U.S. 542 (1876).

80 Enforcement Act of 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 140, 141.

81 Cruikshank, 92 U.S. at 548.

82 Id. at 546 ("The parties thus convicted moved in arrest of judgment on the following grounds:—1. Because the matters and things set forth and charged in the several counts, one to sixteen inclusive, do not constitute offences against the laws of the United States, and do not come within the purview, true intent, and meaning of the act of Congress, approved 31st May, 1870, entitled 'An Act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States,' &c."). Cruikshank raised other defenses that are not relevant here.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Cruikshank's reading favored his own individual liberty. It is perhaps unsettling to frame the case in this fashion, but criminal defendants routinely mount their defenses in these terms: the defendant argued that he had the liberty to engage in the harmful acts he did, because the federal government had no license to criminalize his actions. His argument resembles that of Alfonso Lopez, who argued that he had the right to carry a gun into a school zone precisely because Congress lacked the power to criminalize his actions.[83] Lopez used a narrow construction of the Commerce Clause as a shield against his indictment. Likewise, Cruikshank used a narrow construction of Section 1 as a shield against his indictment. (Later, we will discuss how Jefferson Davis wielded Section 3 in a similar fashion as a shield against his treason indictment.)

In the federal circuit court, the opinions of the judges were divided, and the case was certified to the Supreme Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed with Cruikshank. Chief Justice Waite wrote for the Court that the rights of peaceable assembly and the right to bear arms were rights that applied only against the federal government. In the Court's view, the Fourteenth Amendment did not disturb the rule in Barron v. Baltimore. Stated differently, the Fourteenth Amendment did not prohibit private individuals from violating these rights. Waite explained that the Fourteenth Amendment did not "add any thing to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another."[84] Therefore, the Enforcement Act, which enforced federal law, including Section 1, did not prohibit private individuals from violating these rights. In short, the United States, pursuant to the Enforcement Act, could not prosecute defendants for depriving people of these federal rights.[85] Under the federal constitution, and the Enforcement Act, Cruikshank had the freedom to take the actions he did.

---

83 See generally United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995).

84 Cruikshank, 92 U.S. at 554–55.

85 Id. at 552–53 ("The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for any thing else connected with the powers or the duties of the national government, is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of, and guaranteed by, the United States. . . . [the Second Amendment] has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the national government, leaving the people to look for their protection against any violation by their fellow-citizens of the rights it recognizes, to what is called, in The City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 139, the 'powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what was, perhaps, more properly called internal police,' 'not surrendered or restrained' by the Constitution of the United States.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In short, Cruikshank successfully wielded the Fourteenth Amendment as a shield, and advanced that argument on direct appeal to the Supreme Court.

c. Plessy v. Ferguson

The posture of Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) was far simpler. The landmark separate-but-equal challenge arose when Homer Plessy was arrested for riding in the segregated train car. (John J. Ferguson was actually the Louisiana judge who presided over Plessy's trial.) The Louisiana Supreme Court upheld Plessy's conviction. Plessy then "prayed for a writ of error from [the Supreme Court of the United States], which was allowed by the chief justice of the supreme court of Louisiana."[86] Plessy argued that the segregation law violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Here, Plessy raised Section 1 as a shield.[87] As all know, the Court rejected Plessy's claim.

***

Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing, when used as a defense, with regard to state officers who took state action against the private individual defendants. Such private individuals could raise the Fourteenth Amendment as a defense, just as private individuals could raise rights in the Bill of Rights as a defense against actions taken by federal officers. Using the Constitution as a defense was and remains part-and-parcel of everyday judicial review. For example, Lawrence v. Texas arose from a criminal prosecution for the violation of a state sodomy law. The defendants raised Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment as a shield to the prosecution.[88] And they would prevail on the merits.

---

86 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 540 (1896).

87 Ex parte Plessy, 11 So. 948, 948 (La. 1892), aff'd sub nom. Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) ("He alleges that he is being prosecuted for a violation of Act No. 111 of 1890; that said act is unconstitutional; that his plea of its unconstitutionality has been presented to, and overruled by, the respondent judge.").

88 Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 563 (2003) ("The petitioners exercised their right to a trial de novo in Harris County Criminal Court. They challenged the statute as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and of a like provision of the Texas Constitution.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

d. Treaties as a shield

According to the Supremacy Clause, treaties, along with the Constitution itself, are the "supreme Law of the Land."[89] Treaties, however, are not presumptively self-executing. Rather, the Supreme Court "has long recognized the distinction between treaties that automatically have effect as domestic law, and those that—while they constitute international law commitments—do not by themselves function as binding federal law."[90] In Medellin v. Texas, Chief Justice Roberts's majority opinion observed that "[t]he label 'self-executing' has on occasion been used to convey different meanings."[91] (Indeed, Roberts' position is also and especially correct in the context of the Fourteenth Amendment.) Self-executing does not mean that a treaty simply is. Instead, self-execution means "that the treaty has automatic domestic effect as federal law upon ratification."[92] A treaty that is "non-self-executing" can only have "domestic effect" if there is federal enforcement legislation.[93]

In Medellin, a criminal defendant raised as a defense to a state murder charge an "international law obligation," which "flow[ed] from treaties" the United States had ratified.[94] In other words, the defendant sought to use supreme federal law as a shield against allegedly unlawful state action. Above, we explained that the Fourteenth Amendment can be raised as a defense, even in the absence of enforcement legislation. But in Medellin, the Court held that the relevant treaty was not-self-executing, and therefore could not even be raised as a shield without federal enforcement legislation. With regard to treaties, the concept of self-execution is more stringent: a non-self-executing treaty, without implementing legislation, cannot be wielded even as a shield.

Bond v. United States presented a different case. There, the federal government prosecuted a person for violating a statute that implemented a non-self-executing international agreement.[95] The 89 U.S. CONST. art. VI ("This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land").

---

90 Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491, 504 (2008).

91 Id. at 505 n.2.

92 Id.

93 Id.

94 Id. at 504.

95 Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 850–51 (2014) ("Although the Convention is a binding international agreement, it is 'not self-executing.' . . . Congress gave defendant raised the Tenth Amendment as a defense. In effect, she argued that the prosecution violated the separation of powers. The Supreme Court ruled that Bond had standing to raise this provision as a shield to her conviction.[96] There was no occasion to consider whether Bond had a cause of action to raise the Tenth Amendment as a sword, since the case arose in a defensive posture.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Professor Dorf observed, "Section 3 is self-executing in the exact same way that a self-executing treaty is."[97] But that observation presumes the correct analogy is to a self-executing treaty, rather than to a non-self-executing treaty, like the obligations at issue in Medellin and in Bond. We contend just the opposite is true: Section 3 more closely resembles the presumptive non-executing treaty. With treaties, as with the Fourteenth Amendment, there is no presumption of self-execution.

2. Section 1 as a sword

Today, many Fourteenth Amendment cases are litigated offensively. Plaintiffs generally rely on Section 1983, which traces its roots to the Second Enforcement Act (also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871). However, these plaintiffs cannot invoke the Fourteenth Amendment as a sword without federal enforcement legislation. One of the Supreme Court's formative cases, in which the Fourteenth Amendment was raised as a sword, was Bradwell v. Illinois. One or more federal statutes would have provided Bradwell with a cause of action to challenge the deprivation of her rights secured by the Constitution. Ex Parte Young is consistent with this principle. A plaintiff asserting an Ex parte Young claim is actually asserting a defense in anticipation of a state lawsuit, prosecution, or other enforcement action. Finally, in Bivens, the Supreme Court recognized an implied cause of action with regard to the Fourth Amendment, but this remedy has since been narrowly construed, and not expanded beyond Fourth Amendment rights to other provisions of the Bill of Rights.

---

the Convention domestic effect in 1998 when it passed the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act.").

96 Bond v. United States, 564 U.S. 211, 220 (2011) ("The individual, in a proper case, can assert injury from governmental action taken in excess of the authority that federalism defines.").

97 Dorf, supra note 75.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

a. Section 1983

In modern times, significant Fourteenth Amendment cases reach the Court in an offensive posture, often in the context of a pre-enforcement review--that is, a challenge that begins before the statute even goes into effect. In Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson,[98] the Supreme Court observed that "pre-enforcement review under" Section 1983 "was not prominent until the mid-20th century."[99] During the Civil Rights Movement, groups like the NAACP brought suits in an offensive posture to challenge state policies. These offensive posture suits, however, did not rely on the Fourteenth Amendment, standing on its own. They invoked the legal antecedents of 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which includes the Second Enforcement Act a/k/a Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871. A recent amicus brief filed in Jackson by the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights under Law observed that Section 1983 "has been used to vindicate a broad array of federal rights, including in some of [the] Court's landmark civil rights rulings."[100] The organization explained that "it is no surprise that many of this Court's landmark rulings enforcing constitutional rights were the result of successful challenges under Section 1983."[101] These cases include Shelley v. Kraemer,[102] Brown v. Board of Education,[103] Obergefell v. Hodges,[104] and others. Norma McCorvey, better known as Jane Roe, invoked Section 1983.[105] The list goes on and on. All of these offensive cases invoked federal enforcement legislation. None relied on any notion that the Fourteenth Amendment was self-executing, in the sense that it provided private individuals with a free-standing cause of action which could be raised absent federal legislation.

---

98 Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson, 595 U.S. 30 (2021).

99 Id. at 49.

100 Brief for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and 11 Civil Rights Organizations as Amici Curiae Supporting Petitioners at 4, Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson, 595 U.S. 30 (2021) (No. 21-463), https://www.supremecourt.gov/DocketPDF/21/21-463/197883/20211027165950602_Brief.pdf.

101 Id. at 14.

102 334 U.S. 1 (1948).

103 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

104 576 U.S. 644 (2015).

105 Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217, 1219 n.1 (N.D. Tex. 1970).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

b. Bradwell v. Illinois

Some of the earliest Fourteenth Amendment cases invoked Section 1 as a sword. In these cases, parties invoked federal enforcement legislation to challenge state laws as violating Section 1. Consider Bradwell v. Illinois. Myra Bradwell, a married woman in Illinois, petitioned the Illinois Supreme Court for a law license.[106] However, the Illinois Supreme Court denied Bradwell's application based on the court's interpretation of state law. That decision was rendered during the September 1869 term of the Illinois Supreme Court.[107] Circa September 1870, Bradwell appealed the case to the United States Supreme Court.[108] The transcript of record before the Supreme Court was dated September 30, 1870. Senator Matthew H. Carpenter of Wisconsin argued on behalf of Bradwell in January 1872.[109] The Supreme Court's decision in Bradwell was announced on or about April 15, 1873.[110] The Slaughter-House Cases was announced on April 14, 1873. (The reason why we specify the dates will become clear shortly.)

In Bradwell, the Court's 8-1 decision held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not protect the right of a woman to obtain a law license. Once again, Chief Justice Chase was in dissent, as he was the only Justice willing to support this broad reading of the newly-ratified amendment. (Even a brief study of Chase's jurisprudence further undermines Baude and Paulsen's claim that Chase was trying to undermine the Fourteenth Amendment.)

Justice Miller's opinion for the Court stated that "[t]he [Illinois Supreme] court having overruled [Bradwell's] claims of right founded on the clauses of the Federal Constitution before referred to, those propositions may be considered as properly before this court."[111] But [106] Bradwell's briefs are reproduced in the Chicago Legal News, which she edited. See A Woman Cannot Practice Law or Hold any Office in Illinois. Full Report of the Proceedings in the Supreme Court upon the Application of Myra Bradwell to be Admitted to the Bar., 2 CHI. LEGAL NEWS, Feb. 5, 1870, at 145, 145–46, https://perma.cc/5YNQ-J3ER.

---

[107] In re Bradwell, 55 Ill. 535, 535 (1869), aff'd sub nom. Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130 (1872).

[108] D.C. EVENING STAR at 3 (Sept. 26, 1870).

[109] D.C. Daily Morn Chronicle at 1 (Jan. 20, 1872).

[110] D.C. EVENING STAR at 1 (April 16, 1873); D.C. Evening Star at 2 (May 9, 1873).

[111] Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. 130, 138 (1873). A scanned copy of the U.S. Reports, without any notations provided by West, can be found at https://perma.cc/N9HP-8Z3X.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the opinion of the Court does not cite a precise basis on which jurisdiction was premised. Justice Miller observed, "The record in this case is not very perfect."[112] He was right. Bradwell's lawyer, Senator Carpenter, stated that that denial from the bar was a judicial act, "and that such proceedings are subject to review on writ of error or appeal, as the case may be."[113] The Court's opinion begins on Page 138 of the report. Earlier, page 133 of the reported decision states, "Mrs. Bradwell [sic] brought the case here as within the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, or the recent act of February 5th, 1867, amendatory thereto."[114] We are not certain who wrote this sentence. The writ of error, which is signed by the Clerk of the Supreme Court, alludes to the language in both statutes.[115] Bradwell's brief makes no reference to either statute.[116] Even in the face of an unclear record, we are reasonably confident that the Court would have had to rely on one or more of these statutes to resolve the case. And our view is supported by the record, likely entered by the clerk, that made its way into the United States Reports.

The first statute referenced, Section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, provided the Supreme Court with jurisdiction to review "an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution . . . upon a writ of error."[117] The second statute referenced, the Act of February 5, 1867, provided the federal courts with authority to "grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the constitution."[118]

Like the Judiciary Act of 1789, the 1867 act was enacted prior to the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. But in the wake of ratification, the 1867 Act would provide the federal courts with jurisdiction to review violations of the newly-ratified Fourteenth Amendment. (Indeed, Griffin would invoke this same statute to collaterally attack his conviction in state court.[119]) Here, Bradwell

---

112 Id. at 137.

113 Transcript of Record, Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. 130, 138 (1873) (No. 16-130), https://perma.cc/QP5F-JF2V.

114 Bradwell, 83 U.S. at 133.

115 Transcript of Record, supra note 113, at 14.

116 See Argument for Plaintiff in Error, Bradwell v. Illinois, Bradwell v. 83 U.S. 130 (1873) (No. 16-130), https://perma.cc/8AWS-C8JZ.

117 Judiciary Act of 1789, ch. 20, § 25, 1 Stat. 73,85–86.

118 Habeas Corpus Act of 1867, ch. 28, § 1, 14 Stat. 385, 385.

119 Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 12 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815) ("That the act of February 5th, [1867] under which this proceeding is brought,

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

could have wielded the federal habeas statute as a sword to challenge the Illinois Supreme Court's denial of her law license. Her argument failed on the merits, but federal legislation still provided her with a vehicle to present the argument.

There was another statute that was relevant. In 1871—after Bradwell's appeal was filed but before the case was argued—Congress enacted the Second Enforcement Act.[120] This statute would have expressly provided Bradwell with a cause of action to challenge the deprivation of her rights secured by the Constitution. Bradwell may have relied upon this statute mid-litigation as a sword, although the record is not clear on this point.

c. Ex Parte Young

Ex parte Young permits plaintiffs to assert constitutional rights offensively, even absent any express enforcement legislation. Some cases will state that a plaintiff making an Ex parte Young-type claim is asserting a constitutional right offensively. For example, Edelman v. Georgia stated that Ex parte Young "has permitted the Civil War Amendments to the Constitution to serve as a sword, rather than merely as a shield, for those whom they were designed to protect."[121] As a formalism, it is true that Ex parte Young allows a plaintiff to assert a constitutional right as a plaintiff or applicant. The right is asserted offensively. Nevertheless, these types of claims are consistent with the sword-and-shield framework we describe. Why? A plaintiff asserting an Ex parte Young claim is actually asserting a defense in anticipation of a state lawsuit, prosecution, or other enforcement action. The Ex parte Young claim acts as a bar against government wrongdoing. As a general matter, such relief compels state government officers to stop what they have been or will be doing. But such a claim cannot support a direct claim seeking affirmative relief.

Rather, Ex parte Young limits the remedy which such a plaintiff can seek to prospective negative injunctions directing state government officers to stop ongoing, imminent, or future constitutional rights violations. An Ex parte Young claim seeks negative relief; it is there to stop the state government's enforcement action, lawsuit, or authorizes this court to inquire into the authority by which the petitioner is deprived of his liberty, and to determine whether that authority is exercised in contravention of the constitution of the United States, and in such case to grant the prayer of the petitioner.").

---

[120] Second Enforcement Act, ch. 99, 16 Stat. 433–40 (1871).

[121] 415 U.S. at 664.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

prosecution. In other words, if a plaintiff or applicant seeks to assert a constitutional right offensively as a cause of action supporting affirmative relief, then Ex parte Young will not rescue his lawsuit, and federal enforcement legislation is still needed.

Judge Sutton described Ex parte Young in terms of the sword-and-shield framework:

> Private parties who act in compliance with federal law may use Ex parte Young as a shield against the enforcement of contrary (and thus preempted) state laws. That makes sense, because an existing cause of action for that relief exists: an equitable anti-suit injunction. As classically understood, anti-suit injunctions permit potential defendants in legal actions to raise in equity a defense available at law. That's what happened in Ex parte Young: Several railroad companies asserted in equity the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause as a defense against future indictment for violating Minnesota's mandatory railroad rates. But matters differ when litigants wield Ex parte Young as a cause-of-action-creating sword. In that setting—today's setting—the State is not threatening to sue anyone, precluding an anti-suit injunction from doing the work. [In those circumstances,] [w]hat is required is that Congress create[] a cause of action for injunctive relief in the statute or otherwise made § 1983 available. This follows from the longstanding notion that courts of equity cannot create a remedy in violation of law, or even without the authority of law.[122]

We agree with Judge Sutton.

d. Bivens

Of course, Bivens,[123] a very modern judicial creation, is an exception to this framework. Bivens allows private individuals to assert Fourth Amendment claims against federal officers. Since 1971, the Supreme Court has not systematically expanded this singular exception to other federal rights, even those in the Bill of Rights. And those precedents demonstrate that constitutional provisions are not [122] Mich. Corr. Org. v. Mich. Dep't. of Corr., 774 F.3d 895, 906 (6th Cir. 2014) (internal citations omitted) (emphasis added).

---

[123] 403 U.S. 388 (1971).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

automatically, or even presumptively, self-executing. In any event, we have substantial doubts that Bivens, although considered by some to be normatively desirable, could be defended as a matter of original public meaning.

In Griffin's Case, Chief Justice Chase held that the Fourteenth Amendment was not self-executing and that only a congressional statute could put it into effect (as a sword). Bivens and related case law suggested that the federal courts have an independent role to create remedies for violations of federal constitutional rights—even absent federal legislation. But we are not aware of any coordinate body of case law or scholarship suggesting that States have a role akin to Congress and the federal courts for remedying federal constitutional rights violations in a similar fashion.[124]

***

Professor Mark Graber wrote that a guest essay that Blackman and Tillman had published in the New York Times was "grossly misleading" with regard to whether the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing.[125] Graber wrote, "Contemporary justices, both conservative and liberal, aggressively wield the Fourteenth Amendment today [as did Justices from an earlier era]. Judicial conservatives do not ask permission from Congress when declaring bans on guns or affirmative action unconstitutional."[126] But they do ask for permission. In Brown v. Board of Education, District of Columbia v. Heller, Students for Fair Admission v. UNC, and countless other cases in an offensive posture, the Court declared laws unconstitutional where Congress provided enforcement legislation, such as Section 1983. But no such cause of [124] See generally Walter E. Dellinger, Of Rights and Remedies: The Constitution as a Sword, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1532 (1972).

---

[125] Mark Graber, Legislative Primacy and the Fourteenth Amendment, BALKINIZATION (Apr. 22, 2022, 7:23 PM), https://balkin.blogspot.com/2022/04/legislative-primacy-and-fourteenth.html. Our New York Times guest essay entirely relied on Chief Justice Chase's ruling in Griffin's Case. See Josh Blackman and S.B. Tillman, Only the Feds Could Disqualify Madison Cawthorn and Marjorie Taylor Greene, N.Y. TIMES (Apr. 20, 2022), https://www.nytimes.com/2022/04/20/opinion/madison-cawthorn-marjorie-taylor-green-section-3.html. Given that Griffin's Case has never been overruled, we could see how Professor Graber might write that, on originalist grounds, that is, apart from judicial precedent, we somehow erred. But his decision to characterize our opinion editorial's substance and conclusions as "grossly misleading" is part-and-parcel of the hyperbole which has taken over wide swathes of legal discourse—even among academics, and perhaps, especially among academics. What sources we rely on in our publications is a choice.

[126] Graber, supra note 125.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

action was needed in Fourteenth Amendment cases that arose in defensive postures. Again, the meaning of self-execution depends.

With the Constitution, there is no presumption of self-execution. This concept applies in different fashions to the jurisdictional grants in Article III, the qualifications in Article I, the provisions of the Bill of Rights, and the Fourteenth Amendment. Our view is that it is a gross oversimplification to simply say the Constitution is self-executing and, then, call it a day. Professor Graber wrote that "Blackmun [sic] and Tillman cite no historical evidence from the 1860s that supports their view that anyone when Section Three was framed believed courts without legislation could implement provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to 'shield' persons from liability but not as a 'sword' to impose liability."[127] This myopic focus on Section 3 disregards how the sword and shield dynamic describes offensive and defensive constitutional litigation writ large. The precise terminology of "sword" and "shield" is far less important than how constitutional rights were litigated. These precepts were well-established when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified.[128] And these [127] Mark A. Graber, Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment: Our Questions, Their Answers, at 13, n. 58.

---

[128] See, e.g., State v. John Keeran, 5 R.I. 497, 507 (R.I. 1858) (Ames, C.J.) ("this article, as it stands in our [state] constitution, admits of no such vague and general application. With us, it is the constitutional shield of one accused of crime against the sovereign many who are prosecuting him; and not a sword to cut down the power of the many, legislatively expressed, to declare what shall constitute a crime . . . ."); see also, e.g., City of Fergus Falls v. Fergus Falls Water Co., 72 F. 873, 877 (8th Cir. 1896) (Sanborn, J., dissenting) ("Now, the provision of the constitution under consideration is a shield, and not a sword. It does not lay the foundation for, or create, a cause of action or a contract. It simply preserves and protects contracts already made, and causes of action which are founded upon them, from the unlawful assaults of state legislation. Every cause of action that rests under the protection of this clause of the constitution may be legally and logically stated without referring to the law which by its terms impairs the contract, or to the constitution which protects it from that law, because the contract and its breach themselves constitute a good cause of action." (emphasis added)); cf. Kellogg v. Warmouth, 14 F. Cas. 257, 258 (C.C.D. La. 1872) (No. 7667) (Durell, J.) ("It was impossible that so large body of people should be suffered to remain exposed to the assaults of the prejudices naturally growing out of their former condition, without securing to them, through congressional legislation, a free and perfect use of the vote which the fifteenth amendment gave to them as a shield and a sword of protection for their persons, their liberties, and their property."). For an even earlier reference, Lord Mansfield stated that "A third rule deducible from the nature of the privilege, which is given as a shield, and not as a sword, is that it never shall be turned into an offensive weapon to assist fraud and injustice." Carroll v. Harrison, 49 F. Supp. 283, 289 (W.D. Va.), aff'd, 139 F.2d 427 (4th Cir. 1943) (quoting Zouch principles would have been understood by practicing lawyers at the time--especially by one of the most well-regarded lawyers in the country. This background provides a segue to a central focus in the Section 3 debate: Chief Justice Salmon Chases' federal circuit court opinion in Griffin's Case. Chase stated that Section 3, at least in the context of that case, was not self-executing. His conclusion is consistent with the understanding of self-execution we sketched above.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

II. Chief Justice Chase's Decision in Griffin's Case

In 1869, Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase presided over Griffin's Case in the federal Circuit Court for the District of Virginia.[129] Griffin had been convicted of a crime, and that case was presided over by Judge Sheffey, a state court judge. Sheffey had previously served in the (purported) confederate Virginia legislature. Griffin brought a collateral attack in federal court on the prior state court proceedings. Griffin argued that Judge Sheffey was disqualified pursuant to Section 3. Neither the procedural posture, nor the holding were simple. But most relevant for our purposes was Chase's view with regard to self-execution. He wrote "that legislation by Congress is necessary to give effect to" Section 3 of the 14th Amendment, and "only" Congress can enact that legislation.[130] Chief Justice Chase added that the removal of disqualified officeholders "can only be provided for by Congress."[131] Congress must create the procedure that would determine if a defendant violated Section 3, and that procedure would effectuate removal. One would think that this statement, issued within a year of the Fourteenth Amendment's ratification, by the Chief Justice of the United States, would be reasonably probative evidence of the original public meaning of Section 3, and whether it is or is not self-executing. But, according to Baude and Paulsen and some other recent commentators, such is not the case.

Baude and Paulsen's discussion of Griffin's Case ridicules Chase's opinion and their article reads like an effort to discredit Chase.

---

v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794, 1802 (KB 1765) (Mansfield, LCJ)); see also In re Radway, 20 F. Cas. 154, 161 (E.D. Va. 1877) (same).

[129] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

[130] Id. at 26.

[131] Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

They charge that Chase issued a "half-advisory opinion," which suggests that he lacked jurisdiction.[132] They fault Chase for not adhering to the constitutional avoidance doctrine. They challenge his application of traditional habeas law. They argue that different strands of Chase's opinion are contradictory. They allege that Chase violated judicial norms in announcing the views of his colleagues on the Supreme Court. They suggest that Chase's opinion was motivated by his political ambitions. They compare Chase's opinion with Dred Scott![133]

Each of these criticisms misses the mark. First, Chase's analysis about the self-execution issue was not expressed in jurisdictional terms. Rather, Chase had jurisdiction based on the federal habeas statute that Griffin invoked. Second, there was nothing "advisory" about Chase's opinion. The case presented several complex issues, and Chase offered alternative rationales. But with regard to the self-execution issue, Chase only decided upon an issue which was properly before him. Chase's rationales supported his final order. Third, the constitutional avoidance doctrine, as we know it today, was only formally announced in the twentieth century. A critique of Griffin's Case based on the constitutional avoidance doctrine is unfair and unfounded because it is historically anachronistic. Fourth, Chase ruled that a habeas petitioner's claim based on the trial judge's being only a de facto officer cannot succeed. Baude and Paulsen cite no contemporaneous precedents undermining Chase's understanding of traditional federal habeas law. Fifth, the alternative rationales that Chase advanced were not contradictory. Sixth, Chase did not violate any judicial norms by indicating how his colleagues viewed a mere abstract legal issue unconnected to the specific facts and parties he was addressing in Griffin's Case. To prove the point, in 1899, a unanimous Supreme Court decision favorably cited Chase's reference to how his colleagues in 1869 approached federal habeas law.[134] Baude and Paulsen do not even cite that 1899 decision.

Chief Justice Chase's opinion was, and remains, reasonably probative evidence of the original public meaning of Section 3, and whether it is or is not self-executing.

---

[132] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 45.

[133] Id. at 46.

[134] Ex parte Ward, 173 U.S. 452, 454–55 (1899).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A. What did Griffin's Case actually decide and not decide?

Prior to the Civil War, Judge Hugh W. Sheffey of Virginia had held a Section 3-triggering public position, and so, he had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Afterwards, he served as a member of the (purported) confederate Virginia legislature. Following the war, Sheffey was appointed as a state court judge by the recognized government of Virginia. Sheffey's original appointment predated ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment; thus, the lawfulness of his original appointment, at the time it was made, was not in doubt. After the Fourteenth Amendment went into effect, Judge Sheffey presided over the trial and conviction of Mr. Caesar Griffin, a black man, for shooting with an intent to kill.

Subsequently, Griffin collaterally challenged his state court conviction in federal court. He sought habeas corpus relief from a federal court in regard to his prior state court conviction. Griffin invoked the Habeas Corpus Act of 1867.[135] More specifically, in terms of relief, Griffin, who was represented by counsel, did not call for Sheffey's removal per Section 3. Why Griffin did not call for Sheffey's removal is not entirely clear: it may have been a good strategic choice—or a tactical error, particularly because Section 3's language only offers one express remedy: a disability against certain persons holding certain state and federal positions. Instead, Griffin argued that Section 3 disqualified Sheffey from having served as judge in his criminal trial, and so his (Griffin's) sentence should be vacated. Griffin prevailed in the Virginia federal district court. That case was presided over by Judge Underwood.

The state appealed. And the appeal was heard in the federal Circuit Court for the District of Virginia by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase. Chase was Chief Justice Taney's successor and a Lincoln appointee.[136]

Chase decided three primary issues. Each of these issues were capable of resolving the case before the court, and therefore, it was within judicial norms for Chase to resolve each of these issues. First, there was the question of whether Section 3 required federal enforcement legislation. No such legislation had yet been enacted. If Section 3 required such enforcement legislation, then Sheffey remained [135] Habeas Corpus Act of 1867, ch. 28, 14 Stat. 385, https://uslaw.link/citation/stat/14/385.

---

[136] We wrote about this decision in a New York Times guest essay. See Blackman & Tillman, supra note 125.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

in his position as judge. But if Section 3 did not require enforcement legislation, then Sheffey was disqualified from serving as the judge at the time Griffin was convicted, and if so, that would put Griffin's conviction in doubt.

Stated plainly, if Section 3 was not self-executing, Sheffey had been lawfully appointed because he had been appointed by the lawful, recognized Virginia government prior to enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment, and he had not been removed by the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment. In these circumstances, Griffin could not prevail. Griffin's claim was raised directly under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Second, there was the question of the so-called De Facto Officer doctrine. In modern times, the Supreme Court has explained that, in certain circumstances, the "de facto officer doctrine . . . 'confers validity upon acts performed by a person acting under the color of official title even though it is later discovered that the legality of that person's appointment to office is deficient.'"[137] Under the De Facto Officer doctrine, even if Sheffey was not a judge de jure (i.e., a judge according to law) his public acts would still be upheld as a judge de facto (i.e., a judge in fact). And, as a de facto judge, the sentence handed down by Judge Sheffey would still be enforced. If Sheffey was a judge de jure, the sentence was valid. If Sheffey was a judge de facto, then the sentence would still be treated as valid. In either scenario, Griffin loses. To be clear, the De Facto Officer doctrine was raised in opposition to Griffin's Fourteenth Amendment claim. Griffin opposed the application of the doctrine. In other words, even assuming Griffin could raise a claim directly under the Fourteenth Amendment, if the De Facto Officer doctrine was applicable, then the sentence would remain valid.

The third legal issue turned on the federal habeas statute. Federal courts, then and now, do not have the power to remedy all possible defects in state court criminal proceedings. Chase's authority as circuit justice sitting on the federal circuit court was constrained by the federal habeas statute. (Indeed, at the time, the Supreme Court was stripped of its appellate jurisdiction to review habeas decisions.) For reasons Chase develops and which we explain below, Chase ruled against Griffin on his habeas claim.

To sum up, Chase ruled in the alternative. According to Chase, Sheffey was a judge de jure, and so Sheffey's sentence was lawful. Chase suggested that if Section 3 were self-executing, and if he had [137] Nguyen v. United States, 539 U.S. 69, 77 (2003) (quoting Ryder v. United States, 515 U.S. 177, 180 (1995)).

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

found that Sheffey was a mere judge de facto, Griffin's sentence would be upheld under the De Facto Officer doctrine. And, finally, Chase held that habeas law does not provide any relief based on allegations, true or not, that the trial court judge was a mere judge de facto.

Chase ruled against Griffin on all three points. In a sense, this is not all that surprising: the evidentiary burden of persuasion and proof fell squarely on Griffin, the applicant. And no one made any argument that Griffin was a victim of prejudice and unfair procedures or that Griffin was actually innocent.

What was the precise basis of Chase's ruling? Stated differently, what did Chase decide, and what did Chase not decide? In candor, Chase discussed all three of these issues. And Chase's decision to write about all three issues has created some confusion more than 150 years later. But the fact that some are confused now, does not show that any were confused in 1869. Indeed, Baude and Paulsen point to no contemporaneous critiques of Chase's decision. That's a tell.

Chase spent the bulk of his decision discussing whether Section 3 was self-executing. Towards the end of the opinion, Chase reasoned "that legislation by Congress is necessary to give effect to" Section 3 of the 14th Amendment — and that "only" Congress can enact that legislation. Chase added that the removal of disqualified officeholders "can only be provided for by Congress."[138] Congress must create the procedure that would determine if a defendant had violated Section 3. Section 5 of the 14th Amendment emphasizes this principle: Congress, it states, "shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

But is this analysis about self-execution the holding of the case? The answer to this question turns on a careful reading of the final four paragraphs of the decision. We reproduce each paragraph, and provide headings and commentary to describe each of them.

> [1] [Chase on 14th Amendment Self-Execution] After the most careful consideration, therefore, I find myself constrained to the conclusion that Hugh W. Sheffey had not been removed from the office of judge at the time of the trial and sentence of the petitioner; and that the sentence of the circuit court of Rockbridge county was lawful. In this view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to determine the question relating to the effect of the sentence of a judge de facto, [138] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 26 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> exercising the office with the color, but without the substance of right. It is proper to say, however, that I should have no difficulty in sustaining the custody of the sheriff, under sentence of a court held by such a judge.[139]

Prior to these four paragraphs, that is, prior to Paragraph [1], above, Chase had largely developed his position that Section 3 is not self-executing—in the sense that it cannot be used as a sword or offensively to remove a Section 3-covered official. The first of these last four paragraphs, that is, the paragraph above, concludes that discussion. This paragraph and the one which immediately follows also bring up an alternative rationale for Chase's ruling: the De Facto Officer doctrine.

> [2] [Chase on Elected Federal Officials]
> Instructive argument and illustration of this branch of the case might be derived from an examination of those provisions of the constitution ordaining that no person shall be a representative or senator, or president, or vicepresident [sic], unless having certain pre-prescribed [?] qualifications. These provisions, as well as those which ordain that no senator or representative shall, during his term of service, be appointed to any office under the United States, under certain circumstances, and that no person holding any such office shall, while holding such office, be a member of either house, operate on the capacity to take office. The election or appointment itself is prohibited and invalidated; and yet no instance is believed to exist where a person has been actually elected, and has actually taken the office, notwithstanding the prohibition, and his acts, while exercising its functions, have been held invalid.[140]

The second paragraph distinguishes the legal position of elected federal officials from appointed officers, such as Sheffey—the state

---

[139] Id. at 27.

[140] Id. (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

judge at issue in Griffin's Case. In other words, although the De Facto Officer doctrine supports his ruling, which extends to an appointed state officer, Chase, in a guarded and cautious approach, points out that precedents associated with elected federal officials are not entirely on-point. For example, what would happen to the votes cast by a member of the House who was below the age of twenty-five, or a Senator who was below the age of thirty? (We discussed several such members above.) Chase suggests that the actions of these elected officials would not be held invalid.

> [3] [Chase on Habeas Corpus]
> But it is unnecessary to pursue the examination [in the second paragraph above]. The cases cited by counsel cover the whole ground, both of principle and authority. This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term, with reference to this and kindred cases in this district, and I am authorized to say that they unanimously concur in the opinion that a person convicted by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, can not be properly discharged upon habeas corpus.[141]

The third paragraph explains that a habeas claim cannot succeed based on the argument that the adjudicator is a mere de facto officer. In other words, even if a "judge" was not a judge de jure, but rather was only a judge de facto, the prisoner still could not receive relief under the habeas statute.

> [4] [Chase's Order]
> It follows that the order of the district judge must be reversed, and that the petitioner must be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Rockbridge county.[142]

The fourth and last paragraph is Chase's final order. In that final order, Chase reversed Judge Underwood's final order in the federal district court proceedings below. Underwood had granted Griffin

---

[141] Id.

[142] Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

habeas relief; Chase reversed that decision, thereby authorizing the sheriff to take Griffin into custody.

Now that we have laid out what Griffin's Case decided, and did not decide, we turn to what Baude and Paulsen thought Griffin's Case decided and did not decide.

B. Baude and Paulsen misstate the grounds of decision in Griffin's Case

Our description of Griffin's Case above reflects a case that might have been rightly decided or might have been wrongly decided—we think it was rightly decided. But either way, it was and remains in the mainstream of judicial thought. Baude and Paulse view the case very differently.

Baude and Paulsen wrote: "In re Griffin should be hooted down the pages of history, purged from our constitutional understanding of Section Three."[143] Many will know, but we believe more than a few will not, that the underscored language was Senator Charles Sumner's condign judgment against the late Chief Justice Taney—expressed on the occasion of congressional debate on a bill to pay for a Taney bust for public display.[144] Baude and Paulsen believe Griffin's Case was wrongly decided. Fair enough. But why do Baude and Paulsen resurrect such charged language against a federal circuit court decision and, in effect, its author, who wrote that decision? What purpose does this sort of language serve? And why not use normal quotation marks and concomitantly give credit to their source under prevailing academic norms? No doubt Chase, like Taney, like any of us, had his faults. Few of us are perfect. And no doubt Chase's handiwork in Griffin's Case is not a perfect opinion. Few written decisions are. We do not criticize Baude and Paulsen for a lack of charity towards Chase. Our concern is more that putting aside dispassionate language, and failing to adhere to public reason, will tend to distort the authors' sense of fair play and the readers' accurate understanding of the substantive legal issues. It is these ideals which we believe to be the goals of scholarship, and we assume that Baude and Paulsen agree with us.

Baude and Paulsen do not simply write that Griffin's Case was wrongly decided. They call it "appalling" and then worse.[145] Despite these criticisms, Baude and Paulsen recognize, quite properly, that [143] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 6 (underscore added).

---

[144] Charles Noble Gregory, A Great Judicial Character, 18 YALE L.J. 10, 21 (1908).

[145] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 10 n.14.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Griffin's Case had more than one line of argument supporting its holding. Again, the three possible lines of argument concern (i) whether Section 3 was self-executing, (ii) whether Sheffey's ruling was insulated by the De Facto Officer doctrine, and (iii) whether federal habeas law provided Griffin with a remedy. Chase discussed all three of these issues. And Baude and Paulsen take great exception with Chase's approach. We disagree. Our view is that Chase decided this fairly complex case in a decision well within the bounds of judicial norms, in 1869 and today.

Here, we pose five primary questions and criticisms in regard to how Baude and Paulsen characterize Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case. Specifically, what did Baude and Paulsen think Griffin's Case decided and did not decide?

1. Were Baude and Paulsen complaining about Chase's jurisdiction?

In regard to the last sentence of Paragraph [1], Baude and Paulsen state: "By Chase's logic, such as it was, that should have been the final line of his opinion. But strangely Chase was not actually done. [Chase] then launched into the weirdest part of his opinion, a sort of half-dictum, half-advisory opinion that cast further doubt on all that had come before . . . ."[146] Baude and Paulsen's complaint here is under-explained. What precisely is a "half-dictum" opinion? What precisely is a "half-advisory opinion"? Indeed, based on our research, we are not sure that these terms have been used in a reported case or other legal scholarship to criticize a judicial decision.[147] Judges frequently put forward alternative rationales for their ruling. The federal courts are prohibited from issuing advisory opinions; indeed, such opinions lack subject matter jurisdiction. We don't even know which half of the opinion would be advisory. Are Baude and Paulsen complaining that Chase lacked subject matter jurisdiction? In any event, Chase's announcement that his first line of reasoning (Paragraph [1]) supported his ruling did not preclude his announcing additional rationales.

Of course, Chief Justice Taney's Dred Scott opinion has been criticized because having reached a conclusion based on an absence of federal jurisdiction, Taney went on to opine on other legal issues where 146 Id. at 45 (emphases added).

---

147 A search on Westlaw revealed zero hits for the term "half-advisory opinion." We found only one hit for "half-dictum" and it was positive. See Stover v. United States, 332 F.2d 204, 206 (9th Cir. 1964) ("But we cannot call it pure dicta. If it was half dicta, we believe it good dicta." (emphasis added)).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

(by Taney's own admission) the Court lacked judicial power. By contrast, Chase's first line of reasoning was that Section 3 was not self-executing, but Chase does not express that rationale in jurisdictional terms. Indeed, even if Chase's position on self-execution should be characterized as jurisdictional, Chase still had jurisdiction in relation to Griffin's statutory habeas claim.

2. Were Baude and Paulsen complaining that Chase's decision was dicta or an advisory opinion?

Again, Baude and Paulsen do not explain what precisely their objection is. They also characterize the alternative holdings as dictum. As a formal matter, whenever alternative rationales are presented in a judicial decision, each rationale can be fairly characterized as dicta. Why? Because no individual rationale was strictly necessary to its holding.[148] But dicta of that sort is not a fair ground to criticize an opinion. In order to criticize an opinion for dicta, one must show that the adjudicator reached out to adjudicate (or, better, pre-adjudicate) facts and legal issues not properly before the court. Here, the issue of whether or not Section 3 was self-executing was before the court. Thus, contra Baude and Paulsen, Chase's alternative rationales were neither dicta (of the sort we should criticize) nor an "advisory opinion." In adjudicating this issue, i.e., the self-execution issue, Chase only decided upon an issue which was properly before him, and his reasoning on this issue supported a concrete judicial order, as opposed to merely putting forward abstract legal views. So nothing in Chase's opinion is an "advisory opinion."

3. Were Baude and Paulsen complaining that Chase violated the constitutional avoidance doctrine?

Again, Baude and Paulsen do not explain what precisely is their objection to Paragraph [1]. One might guess that their objection is that Chase failed to adhere to the doctrine of constitutional avoidance: that is, where a federal court can reach a decision on narrow statutory or other non-constitutional grounds (e.g., the habeas argument in Paragraph [3]), the court should avoid reaching and deciding the case on constitutional grounds. If this is the ground of Baude and Paulsen's

---

[148] Blackman wrote about the difference between holding and dictum in an early paper. See Josh Blackman, Much Ado About Dictum; or, How to Evade Precedent Without Really Trying: The Distinction between Holding and Dictum (Dec. 22, 2008) (unpublished manuscript), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1318389.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

objection, and they do not say clearly that it is, then we think it is somewhat misplaced.

The Supreme Court has developed multiple doctrines counseling avoidance and abstention for the federal courts. Each carries its own jurisprudential history. The constitutional avoidance doctrine is now settled law, but it appears it was only formally announced in the twentieth century. Some well-known cases which make use of that doctrine include: Rescue Army v. Municipal Court of Los Angeles[149] and, of course, Justice Brandeis' concurrence in Ashwander v. Tennessee. Valley Authority.[150] Its earliest recognizable, formal invocation, we suspect, was Siler v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co.[151] And even in Siler, the Court announced it as a rule of practice or a default, which should be adhered to, but could be "departed from" for "important reasons."[152] We suggest that a critique of Griffin's Case based on the constitutional avoidance doctrine is unfair and unfounded because it is historically anachronistic.

Still, even if Baude and Paulsen could point to pre-Siler cases applying the constitutional avoidance doctrine, in Griffin's Case there were "important reasons" not to adhere to that doctrine. What reasons? The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in 1868. Griffin's Case was decided in 1869. Now, imagine a counterfactual. Imagine that Chase had ruled narrowly, and he had only announced his narrow habeas-based ruling in Paragraph [3]. Imagine further that Chase had refrained from announcing his broader Paragraph [1] views—i.e., Section 3 requires enforcement legislation. If Chase had taken this alternate path, that very same substantial (perhaps, momentous) issue would likely arise in a different posture, maybe as much as a year or two later, in federal trial court proceedings, federal circuit court proceedings, and on direct review or a certificate of division up to the Supreme Court. In these circumstances, what would be the upshot if the Supreme Court agreed with Chase's self-execution position? If the lower courts disagreed with Chase's position and removed officials covered via the Fourteenth Amendment, then Supreme Court review would return those officials to office—not just returned, but returned as "Lost Cause" heroes. Alternatively, had the lower courts enforced Chase's

---

149 331 U.S. 549, 568 (1947).

150 297 U.S. 288, 346 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). Justices Stone, Roberts, and Cardozo joined the concurrence. See id.

151 213 U.S. 175, 193 (1909). See generally ANDREW NOLAN, CONG. RSCH. SERV., R43706, THE DOCTRINE OF CONSTITUTIONAL AVOIDANCE: A LEGAL OVERVIEW (2014), https://perma.cc/K4SH-DDKH.

152 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

(unannounced) position, then those who the amendment ultimately sought to displace would be left in positions of political power. So time would have been lost. And it is not just time which would have been lost, but also the opportunity to displace all Section 3-covered officials might be lost too. Chase's decision gave guidance to other lower federal courts how to rule in similar cases. And Chase's decision gave guidance to a loyal, Unionist Congress to act now (actually, then) to enact enforcement legislation while they continued to hold ⅔ majorities in both houses.[153]

It is not unheard of for federal judges to send signals to other judges, and indeed, to Congress through judicial decisions. To use a contemporaneous example, in 1871, Circuit Justice Joseph Bradley wrote to District Judge William Wood, encouraging him to hold that Congress had the power to enforce the provisions of the First Amendment through the newly-enacted Enforcement Act of 1870.[154] (This issue would arise later in United States v. Cruikshank (1876).)

We think Chase's decision reflects a respectful constitutional dialogue between the courts and Congress. And this dialogue may have been reciprocated, with the enactment of the Enforcement Act of 1870. About one year after Griffin's Case, Congress's Enforcement Act of 1870 created a quo warranto mechanism whereby federal prosecutors could remove office-holders who were disqualified by Section 3. Had Chase not written his opinion that addressed self-execution, Congress may not have thought or chosen to take that step. Moreover, Chase's self-execution position was one he put forward with humility. In putting it forward, Chase was only speaking for himself, and not his Supreme Court colleagues. (Again, Chase's reference in Griffin's Case to his colleagues concerned the habeas corpus statute, not the self-execution question.) If Congress believed that the Fourteenth Amendment was, in fact, self-executing, then Congress could choose to do nothing and put the nation's fate in the hands of any five of the [153] In 1866, Representative Thaddeus Stevens opined on the importance and urgency of enacting the draft version of Section 3, which was then undergoing debate. He said, "Without [Section 3], [the proposed constitutional amendment] amounts to nothing. I do not care the snap of my finger whether it be passed or not if that be stricken out. Before another Congress shall have assembled here, and before [the rest of the proposed Fourteenth Amendment] can be carried into full effect, there will be no friends of the Union left on this side of the House to carry it out . . . . [T]he House will be filled with yelling secessionists and hissing copperheads. Give us the third section or give us nothing." CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2544 (1866).

---

[154] RANDY BARNETT & JOSH BLACKMAN, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: CASES IN CONTEXT 756 (4th ed. 2021).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

eight Justices then in office in May 1869.[155] If Congress, agreed with Chase or just sought not to chance the issue being decided wrongly by the lower federal courts and the Supreme Court as it then stood, then Congress could pass a statute to allay all concerns. Baude and Paulsen see Chase as a wrongdoer, or, at least, wrongheaded. But we do not.

Baude and Paulsen accuse Chase of "knee-capping the Fourteenth Amendment."[156] We think that hyperbole gets the situation exactly backwards. We think the better view is that Chase was, in fact, reinforcing the Fourteenth Amendment. Had Chase ruled only on the more narrow habeas grounds, and then only a year or two later, in another case on direct review, put the nation on notice that the Fourteenth Amendment was not self-executing, Chase would have been setting back the effort to disqualify Section 3-covered persons, that is, many former confederates. By signaling that enforcement legislation was needed, Chase was helping to carry the provision into prompt execution. Had Chase declined to address the self-execution issue, would Baude and Paulsen really be saying (today) that Chase was a modest judge who favored the passive virtues and judicial minimalism? Perhaps, they and others might. But we doubt it. We doubt it because Chase could have, but did not, reach out to address the precise legal position of Section 3-covered judges and other officers, who unlike Sheffey, received their appointments after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified. Chase addressed the facts and law relevant to the case before him: no more, no less. Yet, today's critics give him no credit for his issuing an opinion limited to the facts before him.

The more important point is that the consequences of Chase's having taken the particular alternative minimalist approach supported by Baude and Paulsen leave us wondering if Baude and Paulsen, as well as Chase's contemporaries and subsequent commentators, would have concluded that such a minimalist approach was naively unaware of the underlying political drama, lacked transparency, and would have been perceived, not as "knee-capping the Fourteenth Amendment,"[157] but as a sucker-punch to the national gut.

---

[155] Justices 1789 to Present, SUP. CT. OF THE U.S., https://www.supremecourt.gov/about/members_text.aspx.

[156] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 49.

[157] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 49.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

4. Chase ruled that a habeas petitioner's claim based on the trial judge's being only a de facto officer cannot succeed. Baude and Paulsen say otherwise. Who was/is right?

In Paragraph [3], Chase cites multiple state cases for the proposition that "a person convicted by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, can not be properly discharged upon habeas corpus."[158] To be clear, here, Chase did not say that the De Facto Officer doctrine was correct in all procedural contexts; he merely held that a claim grounded in a trial judge's being a judge de facto and not a judge de jure cannot succeed in a habeas posture. Here, Chase's analysis was limited to the posture of the case: a collateral attack. He was not addressing how that claim might have been resolved on direct appeal. Chase offered a legal interpretation of the scope of the pre-modern habeas remedy.

Baude and Paulsen challenge Chase's position on this issue, but they do not actually directly state that Chase was wrong. Baude and Paulsen do not state that Chase mischaracterized the cases Chase had cited as authority, nor do Baude and Paulsen affirm that there were, at that time, other streams of habeas case law permitting a challenge to a criminal conviction on the grounds that the trial judge was a mere judge de facto. Instead, Baude and Paulsen argue:

> One possibility, stated in some of the cases, is that an unlawful, but de facto, officer's acts can be questioned directly, and on direct review, but not "collaterally." On this possibility, maybe the de facto officer doctrine was a defense to claims like habeas—the procedural vehicle in Griffin's Case—because habeas was a collateral attack. Habeas could not be used as a substitute for a writ of error, where the challenge would have been properly raised.
>
> But another possibility is that the de facto officer doctrine protects only technical and ordinary legal defects in an officer's appointment, not fundamental inability to exercise power, as when that power is forbidden by the Constitution. On this possibility, Judge Sheffey's acts were inherently void, and thus everything he did fell outside of his court's jurisdiction. The de > facto officer arguments in Griffin's Case—and thus the correct legal fate of Caesar Griffin—turn on these technicalities. Indeed, these technicalities were argued by the parties and they were the main subject of Judge Underwood's opinion below.[159]

[158] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 27 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So Baude and Paulsen suggest Chase could have taken another route based upon Sheffey's purported "fundamental inability to exercise power."[160] But once again, Baude and Paulsen's challenge is anachronistic. They do not cite any nineteenth century authority or pre-nineteenth century authority from any state in the Union or from any federal court, or from any court in the common law world contrary to Chase's position. We suggest that Chase's position, in 1869, was the widely (if not universally) held one. For example, Owen Dixon, later Chief Justice of Australia, in an academic paper[161] wrote: "Higginbotham C.J. [of the Supreme Court of Victoria] distinguishes between objections to the jurisdiction of a Court and objections to the validity of its constitution [that is, its membership]. In re Armstrong [1878], 4 [Victoria Law Reports] (L.) 101 the fact that a Chairman of General Sessions was invalidly appointed was held no ground for a habeas for a prisoner convicted before him."[162]

Of course, Judge Underwood's district court opinion took a contrary view, but Baude and Paulsen do not defend Underwood's opinion and its reasoning. Maybe for good reason? Underwood, like many others, were among the colorful, prominent, and newsworthy historical figures who held federal or state positions during the Civil War and Reconstruction. Underwood was appointed by Lincoln in 1863 to the federal district court. [163] Underwood was elected to the U.S. Senate by the loyal Virginia legislature, but the U.S. Senate refused to seat him.[164]

---

159 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 48 (footnotes omitted).

160 Id. (emphasis omitted).

161 Owen Dixon, De Facto Officers, 1 RES JUDICATAE 285 (1938), http://classic.austlii.edu.au/au/journals/ResJud/1938/71.html.

162 Id. at 287 n.13.

163 Brent Tarter, John C. Underwood (1809–1873), ENCYCLOPEDIA VA., https://encyclopediavirginia.org/entries/underwood-john-c-1809-1873/.

164 1 ASHER C. HINDS, HINDS' PRECEDENTS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES § 384, at 333–34 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V1/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V1.pdf.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen cite a 1963 unsigned law review note as authority for their position.[165] That note affirms that Ex parte Ward, an 1899 U.S. Supreme Court decision, stood for the position that a collateral attack in habeas proceedings on the validity of a judge's presidential appointment was disallowed even though based on constitutional grounds.[166] (We'll come back to Ex parte Ward in Part II.B.6.b below.)

Baude and Paulsen point to some pre-Griffin's Case authority, such as Hayburn's Case,[167] to support the legal narrative that Chase's use of the De Facto Officer was a choice, and not the steady application of established law. We do not find Baude and Paulsen's discussion convincing. Those cases did not involve attacking a particular judge's right to hold the position due to a disqualification, but rather involved a generic attack on the power assigned to the judge. Specifically, in those cases, the power was alleged to belong to the sovereign or to another branch, or that the judicial position itself was unconstitutional irrespective of who held it. Griffin's position, by contrast, was an attack on the particular judge's right to hold his position. No one disputes that Sheffey's judicial office was constitutional. And no one disputes that a non-Section 3-covered individual could have lawfully adjudicated Griffin's trial. So this line of cases, put forward by Baude and Paulsen, has no ready application to Griffin's Case. Recently Judge Murphy explained: "[H]istory refutes the theory that the Constitution of its own force compels courts to treat as 'void' any action taken by officers whose exercise of an office does not comport with a constitutional command. That view would treat the de facto officer doctrine itself as unconstitutional. Yet it formed part of the legal backdrop against which the founders enacted the Constitution."[168]

The student note cited by Baude and Paulsen discusses modern counter-authority supporting Baude and Paulsen's position that a

---

[165] See Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 48 n.166 (citing Note, *The "De Facto" Officer Doctrin*e, 63 COLUM. L. REV. 909, 910, 919 (1963) [hereinafter De Facto Officer Doctrine], https://www.jstor.org/stable/1120535).

[166] See De Facto Officer Doctrine, supra note 165, at 917 n.58 (citing Ex parte Ward, 173 U.S. 452 (1899)). In the parenthetical describing Ward, the Note states: "collateral attack on validity of presidential appointment disallowed even though based on constitutional grounds." Id.

[167] 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409 (1792).

[168] Calcutt v. FDIC, 37 F.4th 293, 343 (6th Cir. 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (citing Baude and Griffin's Case, and fully expounding on the scope and history of the De Facto Officer doctrine), rev'd on other grounds, 598 U.S. 623 (2023).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

disqualified judge has a "fundamental inability to exercise power,"[169] and so a decision by such a judge could be set aside in habeas proceedings. However, that line of authority first appears many decades after Griffin's Case was decided.[170] Again, we, at least, would not fault Chase for not being a clairvoyant, nor would be fault him for adhering to established habeas law. It is not convincing to suggest that Chase should have departed from established law based on a line of cases from a half-century later. All of these criticisms seem unduly harsh. Moreover, much (perhaps all) of the modern line of authority Baude and Paulsen rely on for this point relates to federal habeas proceedings "reviewing" underlying federal court convictions over federal charges where the alleged constitutional defect involved a challenge based on federal separation of powers. For example, in United States v. Allocco,[171] the President's power to recess appoint a federal judge was at issue, as was the issue of when the Senate was in recess for a constitutionally valid presidential appointment.[172] It is very unclear how that stream of authority could help Griffin, who was convicted in state court proceedings involving a state judge on state charges.

Still, even if we cannot impose on Chase the obligation to be a clairvoyant, we can ask if Chase was in some meaningful sense wrong on the narrow habeas issue. Was he? Think about it this way. Some people have thought, and some continue to think, that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment encompasses an actual cornucopia of rights. Some do not. It is a matter of legitimate disagreement and debate. One reason some people do not see the cornucopia is that there is no specific language in the Fourteenth Amendment announcing what rights are created by the Due Process Clause and what the boundaries of those rights are. The same is true for habeas corpus. Baude and Paulsen's article teaches that constitutional amendments change prior constitutional law. We do not disagree. But there is nothing in Section 3 about habeas corpus.

To put it another way, and leaving aside for now the issue of whether authorizing federal legislation is necessary to enforce Section 3, we note that Section 3 imposes a disability on some persons in some circumstances. Section 3 says that certain persons in certain circumstances shall not hold certain government positions. Section 3

---

169 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 48 (emphasis omitted).

170 See Johnson v. Manhattan Ry., 61 F.2d 934 (2d Cir. 1932), aff'd, 289 U.S. 479 (1933).

171 305 F.2d 704 (2d Cir. 1962).

172 See generally id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

does not say, using any express language, what should happen if notwithstanding Section 3's limitations, a Section 3-covered person is elected to, appointed to, or holds a position contrary to law. Likewise, if a state judge holds a position contrary to Section 3, can a state court criminal conviction be attacked collaterally in federal habeas proceedings? Nothing in the text of Section 3 answers that question with anything approaching clarity.

Again, nothing in the text of Section 3 upsets prior understandings of the scope of the habeas remedy. So even if Section 3 upset some prior law (which it undoubtedly did) was there any good reason for Chase to think background habeas law had been changed by Section 3? In this situation, is it any surprise that Chase looked to Congress to provide guidance for applying Section 3 on both direct review and in regard to collateral habeas proceedings? No, it is no surprise at all. Moreover, it was on this limited habeas point that Chase pointed to his colleagues' expressing agreement with his position.

Finally, in 1870, Congress expressly created a procedure through which those holding Section 3-covered positions could be removed from their positions by federal prosecutors.[173] This mechanism was not available when Griffin was convicted. Specifically, a federal, but not a state, prosecutor can seek a writ of quo warranto to remove an incumbent officer from office. This language authorizes a single traditional remedy: a writ of quo warranto. Congress did not create a remedy that would allow the States to remove a federal official from his elected or appointed position. Nor did Congress create a more limited remedy allowing the States to remove a candidate for a federal elected position from the ballot. Here, the writ of quo warranto remedy, on the motion of a federal prosecutor, and only a federal prosecutor, permits a federal court, and only a federal court, to determine whether a specific person has the legal right to hold an office. (Professor Samuel Bray explained this writ during the kerfuffle over who was the actual director of the CFPB.[174])

We draw two general conclusions from this Enforcement Act. First, Congress did not grant the States any role to enforce Section 3. This task was given to federal prosecutors. Indeed, the state courts had no role to play in this matter. Section 8 of the Enforcement Act stated that the federal courts had exclusive jurisdiction over claims brought under the Enforcement Act. That's a tell too.

---

[173] Second Enforcement Act, ch. 99, 16 Stat. 433, 438 (1871).

[174] Samuel Bray, English or Mulvaney at the CFPB? Time for Quo Warranto!, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Nov. 25, 2017, 10:41 AM), https://reason.com/volokh/2017/11/25/english-or-mulvaney-at-the-cfp/.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Second, Congress included Section 14 in the Enforcement Act after Chase's decision. It is reasonable to presume that Congress was aware of Griffin's Case. Congress could have responded to Griffin's Case by enacting a statute saying that Section 3 was self-executing. And Congress could have given the States a role in these or analogous removal or election processes. But instead, Section 14 expressly delegates Section 3-enforcement to a federal prosecutor—and critically, only the federal courts (and not state courts) play a role in that process. Moreover, as recounted in a recent biography, Chase was close to the Congress that drafted and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, and later enacted the Enforcement Act.[175] That is some reason to believe that Chase's views were consistent with those in Congress. Indeed, as we will discuss later, Griffin's Case may be understood as a signal to the Reconstruction Congress about what measures would pass muster both before him, amongst his Supreme Court colleagues, and the lower federal and loyal state judiciaries.

There are more than a few Reconstruction Era cases touching on Section 3. Some recent scholarship has cited these cases in support of the position that officeholders were purportedly removed absent implementing legislation.[176] One such case is United States v. Powell.[177] Powell was a prosecution brought under Section 15 of the 1870 Act. It was bought, not to enforce abstract Section 3 qualifications absent authorizing legislation, but to enforce a concrete federal criminal statute. So there was federal statutory authority. Moreover, the prosecution came with all the constitutional protections (then) normally associated with federal criminal protections—procedural and substantive.

5. Baude and Paulsen argue that Chase was wrong about retroactivity Section 3 was ratified in the wake of the Civil War. Again, it provides:

---

[175] See WALTER STAHR, SALMON P. CHASE: LINCOLN'S VITAL RIVAL 546(2022) (noting that Congress considered a proposed version of what would become the Fourteenth Amendment, which was drafted by Chase)

[176] Roger Parloff, After the Cawthorn Ruling, Can Trump Be Saved From Section 3 of the 14th Amendment?, LAWFARE (June 7, 2022, 1:32 PM), https://www.lawfaremedia.org/article/after-cawthorn-ruling-can-trump-be-saved-section-3-14th-amendment.

[177] 27 F. Cas. 605 (C.C.D. N.C. 1871).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any state legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.[178]

At a minimum, this provision was designed, ultimately, to disqualify from holding certain state and federal positions (a "Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state"), certain people who had held certain state or federal positions ("a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any state legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state"), and had sworn an oath to the Constitution in connection with those positions, and afterwards engaged in insurrection or rebellion. There were two lists: a list of positions which could trigger disqualification, and a list of positions from which a wrongdoer would be disqualified from holding. These two lists of positions were textually distinct. (We will revisit these textualist arguments supra in Part V.)

Section 3 would impose a future disqualification based on past conduct. That is, a person could be disqualified after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment for conduct that occurred before the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. Section 3 could also impose a future disqualification based on future conduct. In other words, a person could be disqualified after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment for conduct that occurred after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Furthermore, Section 3 may also impose a past or retroactive disqualification based on past conduct. In other words, the language of Section 3 can be read in this way also: after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, a person could be deemed retroactively disqualified for conduct that occurred before the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.

---

[178] U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen do not recognize how far back retroactivity can go. Indeed, without a clear theory of retroactivity, Section 3 could sweep to past conflicts, including the Mexican-American War, and apply to conduct from prior to Section 3's ratification even where the officeholder's term of office ended prior to Section 3's ratification. In Griffin's Case, Chief Justice Chase understood these risks, and addressed them in a candid fashion. His opinion laid out a roadmap to understand retroactivity and with regard to the De Facto Officer doctrine. Chase's roadmap had two other important implications. First, Chase explained that because Section 3 was not self-executing, only a federal statute could put it into effect. Second, a state statute would not suffice. The idea that the Fourteenth Amendment, absent express federal statutory authorization, allowed the States to operationalize Section 3 only makes sense if state governments could be trusted. But the Fourteenth Amendment and enforcement legislation were enacted precisely because state institutions, state officials, and state courts were not considered trustworthy by the national government. Indeed, the idea that Section 3 permitted States, via ballot control, to limit voter and candidate participation for federal positions and to do so absent express federal authorization seems (at least to us) novel and very unlikely.

a. Section 3 operates retroactively and prospectively

Section 3 might be thought to operate in two ways: retroactively and prospectively.

Under one view, Section 3 might impose a retroactive disability on covered persons in their current positions. In other words, covered persons who hold positions contrary to Section 3 would be removed from their positions by some process. If they were appointed after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, the effective date of their removal is backdated to the date of their appointment. If they were appointed before the enactment of Section 3, the effective date of their removal is backdated to the date on which the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified. In such circumstances, the covered person's prior acts might be determined to be void (or, possibly, voidable), and the covered person may face personal liability for the public acts he had taken during the period where he acted absent good authority. Indeed, the de jure government might sue the covered person for restitution: that is, the return of any compensation or other emoluments paid while holding office.

Under the second view, Section 3 might impose a disability on covered persons against their holding a position in the future. And if a covered person holds such a position contrary to Section 3, some legal process would effectuate removal, but such a removal is not backdated. Here, the covered person's removal takes effect at the conclusion of some legal process. Because the removal is not backdated, we do not think there would be any likely occasions for the De Facto Officer doctrine to apply. Concomitantly, such a person would not face any personal liability for the public acts he had taken during the period in which he held his position. In other words, a covered person's public acts prior to his removal would be upheld because prior to removal the covered person held his position de jure, and not de facto.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Both alternatives above have an element of retrospectivity–both would impose a burden based on conduct that had been completed prior to the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment. Both alternatives are consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment, as both, in some fashion, effectuate removal of covered persons. But the first alternative more greatly offends ex post facto principles and retrospectivity norms.

Section 3 does not explain which of these two choices to apply. And Griffin did not actually move to have Sheffey removed. Given these facts, is it any wonder that Chase believed that these issues, as well as other Section 3-related policy choices were for Congress to decide?

b. Disqualifying Jefferson Davis, Alexander Stephens, and West Hughes Humphreys

Consider a hypothetical. A person took an oath to the Constitution as a member of Congress. After his terms concluded, he actively and voluntarily joined the (purported) confederacy. Did this former-member of Congress violate his oath of office? Baude and Paulsen state the answer is unequivocally yes.

> [E]ven after the rebellion had been defeated, Southern States had audaciously sent to Congress, to serve as U.S. Senators and Representatives, men who had notoriously violated previously sworn oaths to support the U.S. Constitution by subsequently engaging in or supporting secession, rebellion, and civil war against the authority of the United States (to say nothing of those now serving again in their state governments). These men who arrived in Washington included several who had held prominent positions in the rebel Confederacy: "four Confederate generals, four colonels, several Confederate congressmen and members of Confederate > state legislatures, and even the vice president of the Confederacy, Alexander Stephens."[179]

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen offer one example by name to illustrate this oath-breaking: Alexander Hamilton Stephens of Georgia.[180] Before the Civil War, Stephens had served eight terms in the U.S. House of Representatives from 1843 through 1859.[181] In November 1861, he began serving as vice president of the (purported) confederacy.[182] At that time, Stephens was no longer serving a term in the United States Congress. Baude and Paulsen assume that Stephens "violated" his oath to the United States when he became vice president.[183] But this assumption is tenuous.

The pre-Civil War oath Stephens took while serving in Congress was basically the same one members had taken since 1789, and it is basically the same one taken today. It states: "I, A.B. do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be) that I will support the Constitution of the United States." The words are forward-looking. And if you think these words last unto eternity, then that oath bound Stephens in 1861, and ever-after. If so, then Baude and Paulsen would be correct to assert that Stephens violated his oath when he became vice president of the (purported) confederacy.

But there is another view: oaths of office last as long as the holder (lawfully) remains in his position. Thus, when an elected term lawfully ends, the holder's oath no longer has force. During

---

[179] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 4 (emphasis added); see also AKHIL REED AMAR, AMERICA'S UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION 421 (2012) ("[S]ection 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment imposed special political disqualifications on officials who had not merely sided with the Confederacy, but in the process betrayed previously sworn oaths." (emphasis added)); AKHIL REED AMAR, AMERICA'S CONSTITUTION: A BIOGRAPHY 377 (2005) [hereinafter AMAR, BIOGRAPHY] ("Suspicion of the South's good faith ran especially high in the mid-1860s because a large percentage of Southern leaders had in fact treasonably betrayed their antebellum Article VI oaths to uphold the federal Constitution.").

[180] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 4 (citing AMAR, BIOGRAPHY, supra note 179, at 377).

[181] Chad Morgan, Alexander Stephens (1812–1883), NEW GA. ENCYCLOPEDIA (June 6, 2017), https://www.georgiaencyclopedia.org/articles/government-politics/alexander-stephens-1812-1883/.

[182] Alexander Stephens, AM. BATTLEFIELD TR., https://www.battlefields.org/learn/biographies/alexander-stephens.

[183] See also AMAR, BIOGRAPHY, supra note 179, at 377 ("Suspicion of the South's good faith ran especially high in the mid-1860s because a large percentage of Southern leaders had in fact treasonably betrayed their antebellum Article VI oaths to uphold the federal Constitution.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

congressional debates over Section 3, for example, Senator Reverdy Johnson of Maryland distinguished between the "legal obligation of the oath" and the "moral obligation" of the oath.[184] Even if the moral obligation may extend beyond the holder's term in office, the legal obligation "expire[s] at the termination of the term of office to which the party had been elected or appointed."[185] We think this view is the overwhelmingly predominant view. This has been Congress's understanding since 1791. In 1791, some members of the House returned for a second consecutive two-year term. If forward-looking oaths last unto eternity, then a returned House member would have no cause to take his oath again. But the practice has always been to mandate oaths for all House members at the start of any two-year term. Likewise, new oaths were taken by senate members who were returned to the Senate by the voters, or prior to the Seventeenth Amendment, by the state legislatures. Moreover, President George Washington took a new oath of office when his second term began. To this day, members of Congress have to take current oaths without regard to prior oaths that they may have taken in prior terms, or for service in regard to the other chamber, or without regard to having held some other government position which required the same oath. The same is true for second term presidents and a variety of other and lesser positions we are all familiar with. Federal district court judges who are elevated to the federal circuit court, or elevated to the United States Supreme Court, also take a new oath of office. When one swears as a witness to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth in court, does that oath of truthfulness extend beyond that trial, and into, for example, a subsequent trial with different parties? Could one be held in contempt of court for lying a few months later in an entirely different proceeding? We think the answers to these questions are no.

In 1861, at the time Stephens was elected to the (purported) confederate congress, and then to the position of vice president of the (purported) confederacy, Stephens was not a member of the U.S. Congress. His last term had already ended in 1859. So did Stephens violate his oath? It is a matter reasonable people can dispute. But Baude and Paulsen are wrong to state the answer is unequivocally yes.

Why does this question matter? Under the prevailing view, a person like Stephens could not be accused of violating his constitutional oath from before the Civil War. Part of Section 3's 184 See, e.g., CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2898–99 (1866). There were similar comments about the scope of Article VI oaths from other members, including Senator John Sherman of Ohio. Id.

---

185 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

achievement was to eliminate the need to consider that issue. Section 3 reached back and disqualified certain people who had taken a constitutional oath for covered positions, even if they were no longer holding that covered position when they committed a Section 3-related offense. Stephens could have been disqualified pursuant to Section 3. Section 3 took off the table any consideration that a covered person violated his oath or committed perjury when he took it. This facet of Section 3 thus reduced the moral opprobrium attached to any finding of Section 3 liability. Chase also alluded to this point in Griffin's Case. Chase stated: "[O]ne of the objects of . . . [S]ection [3] was to provide for the security of the nation and of individuals, by the exclusion of a class of citizens from office . . . ."[186] This is not the tone of a discussion relating to an odious crime.

That analysis goes some distance towards resolving any issue concerning Section 3's coverage of the (purported) vice president of the (purported) confederacy. What about the confederacy's (purported) president? A Section 3 disqualification would not turn on whether Senator Jefferson Davis was still in office when he went rebel.[187] Davis could have been disqualified pursuant to Section 3 based on his oath before he went rebel.[188]

We offer one more example to illustrate the point about retroactivity. Baude and Paulsen affirm that any wrong for which a person should be disqualified for under Section 3 would also be an impeachable offense.[189] With this affirmation, we might expect scores

---

[186] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 25–26 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

[187] Jefferson Davis' Farewell Address (Jan. 21, 1861), reprinted in THE PAPERS OF JEFFERSON DAVIS, https://jeffersondavis.rice.edu/archives/documents/jefferson-davis-farewell-address; see also Jefferson Davis's Farewell, U.S. SENATE, https://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/history/minute/Jefferson_Davis_Farewell.htm. We assume that Davis's farewell address was a lawful resignation, but Section 3 liability does not hinge on this issue.

[188] Lest there be any doubt, our position is that former U.S. Senators and Representatives who took their Article VI oath and then actively and voluntarily joined the confederacy were all squarely covered by Section 3. See Blackman & Tillman, supra note 8, at 35. That said, enforcement requires a statute.

[189] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 124 ("And if a candidate for President, or an already-elected President, is constitutionally disqualified from office by Section Three, then that disqualification should be enforced by state election officials, by electors, by Congress through the impeachment process, and by the Vice-President, cabinet and, Congress in carrying out the Twenty-fifth Amendment." (emphasis added)); id. at 29 n.90 ("An officeholder who has engaged in insurrection or rebellion or given aid and comfort to enemies of the United States has surely committed a 'high Crime or Misdemeanor' within the meaning of

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

of impeachments and disqualifications of then-current, or perhaps even former,[190] "officers of the United States," who gave aid and comfort to the confederacy. Yet only one person was impeached in regard to Civil War wrongdoing. Who was it?

It was not Jefferson Davis or Alexander Stephens, who both had served in the United States Congress. It was West Hughes Humphreys. Who was he? In 1861, hundreds, if not thousands, of elected and appointed, federal and state, officials and officers in seceding States supported the confederacy, and then took positions in the rebel national and state governments. More than a dozen United States judges in seceding States became judges in the (purported) confederate courts. Humphreys was one such judge.[191] He was impeached, convicted, and disqualified for supporting the (purported) confederate government.[192] Humphreys remains one of only three defendants in U.S. history to have been disqualified by the Senate.

Why did Congress impeach only him? Why did Congress focus like a laser beam on him alone among former U.S. officials, officers, and judges? Unlike the other judges, Humphreys, for whatever reason, failed or chose not to resign from his Union position before taking his Article II, section 4's description of the scope of the impeachment and removal power." (emphasis added)).

---

190 Baude wrote that the Senate can try an impeachment of a former "officer of the United States. See Will Baude, Does the Chief Justice Preside over an Ex-President's Impeachment Trial?, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Jan. 15, 2021, 7:24 AM), https://reason.com/volokh/2021/01/15/does-the-chief-justice-preside-over-an-ex-presidents-impeachment-trial/. See generally Brian Kalt, The Constitutional Case for the Impeachability of Former Federal Officials: An Analysis of the Law, History, and Practice of Late Impeachment, 6 TEX. REV. L. & POL. 1 (2001). In this Article, we take no position on whether the Senate can try a former-office holder who was impeached while still in office. In this Article, we take no position on whether the House can impeach a former-office holder who is no longer in office.

191 Amy H. Sturgis, West H. Humphreys, TENN. ENCYCLOPEDIA, https://tennesseeencyclopedia.net/entries/west-h-humphreys/; Kaitlin E. O'Brien & Ian Binnington, West H. Humphreys: A Civil War Impeachment, Powerpoint Presentation, https://sitesmedia.s3.amazonaws.com/history/files/2013/11/Kaitlin-E.-O%E2%80%99Brien-work-with-Ian-Binnington-summer-2013.pdf.

192 3 ASHER C. HINDS, HINDS' PRECEDENTS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES, ch. LXXIV, §§ 2385–97, 805–20 (1907), https://www.govinfo.gov/content/pkg/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3/pdf/GPO-HPREC-HINDS-V3.pdf; id. § 2390 (reproducing articles of impeachment, and Article I expressly alleging that Humphreys violated his oath).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

confederate one.[193] Humphreys violated his Article VI oath, and he was held accountable for it.

However, the case was less clear for others who were out of office when they went rebel, or who actively and lawfully resigned their Union positions prior to going rebel. They presented a more difficult case precisely because it was not clear if they violated their oaths. As an aspirational matter, one could say that Humphreys and all these other judges violated their oaths, but as a legal matter, other than Humphreys, the others who had resigned prior to going rebel probably did not. (The House may have also concluded, contra Baude, that a former official, e.g., one who had resigned, could not be impeached and disqualified, but it was still possible to impeach Humphreys precisely because he had not resigned.)

Section 3 avoided this issue: it covered people who had previously taken an oath, but were no longer in office. Such persons could still be subject to future disqualification. Moreover, Section 3 pinned liability on those persons who had taken prior oaths to uphold the U.S. Constitution, without conditioning liability on their having violated that oath or having committed perjury when taking it.

We do not doubt that Baude and Paulsen can find records of many in the 1860s who would have characterized Stephens and others similarly situated just as they (Baude and Paulsen) do: people who had violated their oaths. But the fact that none of these people were impeached provides some evidence against their position. Moreover, these scattered statements, untethered to actual enforcement actions taken, are simply evidence of original intent and expectations. In interpreting Section 3, our goal ought to be to understand Section 3's words and the parliamentary and legal history of oath-taking which it incorporated.

These debates about Stephens, Davis, and Humphreys raises an even deeper question: how far back could Section 3 reach?

c. How far back would a retroactive Section 3 reach?

There is another possibility in regard to retroactivity. This view might even more greatly offend our intuitions rooted in fair play and due process—so hang on.

Section 3 makes three temporal references. First, Section 3 applies to a person "having previously taken an oath" in a covered position. We think this language would squarely include a person who swore such an oath before and after the Fourteenth Amendment was [193] See O'Brien & Binnington, supra note 191.

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ratified. Indeed, the hook to disqualify most rebels was that they had previously sworn an oath to the Constitution before the Civil War began. Second, a Section 3 disqualification is triggered if a person "shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof." Baude and Paulsen emphatically contend that this provision was not restricted to the Civil War. Under their reading, the word "shall" refers to conduct both before and after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified. Again, the hook to disqualify rebels was that they engaged in insurrection. But, Baude and Paulsen contend, this provision was by no means limited to the Civil War.

These first two temporal references should not be controversial. But the third temporal problem is not so clear. The disqualification element of Section 3 begins, "No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state," if he is subject to a Section 3 disqualification. What does "shall" mean here?

If "shall" only has a prospective meaning, then the disqualification element would read "No person shall [after this amendment is ratified] be a Senator or Representative in Congress, [etc] …." Under this reading, the amendment was prospective in regard to its effects, but allowed for retrospectivity in relation to the elements establishing the disability. This reading of Section 3's first "shall" would not raise any unique concerns regarding retrospectivity. But that is not the only reading.

In the offense element of Section 3, Baude and Paulsen contend that the word shall refers to a period of time both before and after the Civil War. That is, Section 3 was not limited to disqualifying confederates rebels, but will apply to future insurrections as well. What if "shall" has the same meaning in the disqualification element of Section 3 as it does in the offense element? What if the Fourteenth Amendment retroactively disqualified people prior to 1868, who had engaged in an insurrection before 1868? The Fourteenth Amendment could be read in this fashion: "No person shall [ever] be a Senator or Representative in Congress, [etc] . . . ." Under this reading, the amendment allows for retrospectivity in regard to all its elements, including the elements establishing liability and the disability created.

Your first response might be, there is no way the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment would have intended this result. This response falls for the fallacy of original intentions. (More on that later.[194]) The [194] See infra subpart V(E).

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

original public meaning of a constitutional text does not always neatly map onto the intentions of those who framed the document. Sometimes constitutional text leads to unanticipated consequences. Look no further than debates over the Eleventh Amendment. Baude and Paulsen do not concede this point; rather, they have emphatically embraced it.

Your second reaction might be, so what? Why would it matter if a person, who left office before the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, was retroactively disqualified from office after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified? He was already out of office, so who cares? Yet this question resembles the question presented in Griffin's Case: What happens to the actions of a person who was disqualified by virtue of Section 3? Are those actions invalid, or are those actions saved by something akin to the De Facto Officer doctrine? We suggest that these questions were on Chief Justice Chase's mind—and he alluded to this situation in his opinion.

Chase offered a hypothetical. "Now, let it be supposed that some of the persons, described in the third section, during the war with Mexico, gave aid and comfort to the enemies of their country . . . ."[195] He then asked, "Is it a reasonable construction of the amendment which will make it annul every official act of such an officer?"[196] Baude and Paulsen dismiss this statement, as part of a "parade of horribles [that] assumes, without argument, the correctness of his own apparent policy prejudices."[197] They add a dismissive parenthetical "(so?),"[198] as if to ask, "So what?" This hyperbole is poorly placed. Many modern readers may have misunderstood the relevance of Chase's reference to the Mexican–American War. But the legal issues arising from that war would have been well known to Chase's generation.

In 1868, in addition to Chief Justice Chase, there were all sorts of Republicans, former Republicans, and others who supported the Fourteenth Amendment. Some of them were former Whig Party members, former Unionist Party members, former Free Soil Party members, former American Party members (a/k/a Know Nothing Party members), not to mention many other members of many other smaller long-forgotten parties and independents. Abraham Lincoln was one such person, and Lincoln had opposed President Polk's war: the Mexican-American War. And that may be the primary reason he was a one-term Congressman.

---

[195] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 25 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

[196] Id.

[197] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 40.

[198] Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Lincoln actively opposed a declared war between belligerents which recognized one another internationally. It was not messy—it was not like the Civil War. Mexico was an "enemy" nation of the United States.[199] Was Lincoln's speech in public and private proscribed under Section 3?[200] Did he give aid and comfort to an enemy of the United States? Baude and Paulsen develop all sorts of precedents in regard to speech; they have very general views on the subject. But they put forward no grounded, clear rule of law to decide how far Section 3 could limit First Amendment rights and free speech principles during war time. What they are sure about is that Section 3 overturns prior constitutional law, including prohibitions on retroactivity. Under Baude and Paulsen's view, there are substantive questions to be asked and answered: Does Section 3 repeal, at least in part, the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment and then extant free speech norms? Did Section 3 disqualify those who had opposed a declared war? Could Section 3 have retroactively disqualified those who were convicted of violating the Alien & Sedition Act—if any were still alive? Did Section 3 repeal, at least in part, the Speech or Debate Clause? Did Section 3 repeal, at least in part, the Judge of the Elections Clause?[201] Baude and Paulsen have no theory to explain how prior provisions of the constitution were modified by Section 3. (We will address this question below.)

Had Lincoln survived until 1868, would he have been a Section 3-covered person? Would his conduct during the Mexican-American War have disqualified him from holding future office? Baude and Paulsen's theory leave us with no clear answers. Of course, he was dead by 1868, so neither then nor now could he be disqualified in the sense

---

[199] CARLTON F.W. LARSON, ON TREASON: A CITIZEN'S GUIDE TO THE LAW 136 (2020) ("Only five wars have been formally declared under the United States Constitution: the War of 1812, the Mexican-American War, the Spanish-American War, World War I, and World War II. All the convictions under the Constitution for adhering to the enemy have come in one of these wars. In each case, the countries against which we declared war were enemies from the moment of the declaration of war until the final conclusion of peace, and the provision of aid and comfort to them constituted treason.").

[200] Speech delivered by Abraham Lincoln in the House of Representatives, January 12, 1848, reprinted in MODERN LATIN AMERICA: SUPPLEMENT FOR THE 8TH EDITION, BROWN U. LIBR., https://library.brown.edu/create/modernlatinamerica/chapters/chapter-14-the-united-states-and-latin-america/primary-documents-w-accompanying-discussion-questions/abraham-lincoln-on-the-mexican-american-war-1846-48/.

[201] See supra section I(B)(2) (noting that under Baude and Paulsen's view of the impact of Section 3, each house may no longer be the "sole" judge of its own elections).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

of being actively removed. But the analysis does not stop there. The rabbit hole goes deeper. In the same sense that we can ask if Judge Sheffey was actually a judge for Griffin's Case, we can also ask: If Lincoln were a Section 3-covered person, was he ever President? And if his actions brought him under the aegis of Section 3, what becomes the status of his official acts?

Now you might respond: Of course, Lincoln was President. Two elections and a universe of public records confirm that. But it is not quite that easy. Baude and Paulsen explain that later constitutional amendments are superior to prior constitutional provisions, and a fortiori, it follows that later amendments certainly can upset legal conclusions established under prior law. As to retrospectivity: if you will allow the position-triggering element, the oath, and the offense element to be evaluated for pre-1868 conduct, why not also allow the disqualification to reflect holding positions prior to 1868? What is the principled grounds (if any) for the distinction? Indeed, textualists would favor a reading where the same word, used twice in the same sentence, has the same meaning. In Section 3, "shall" is such a word. And that meaning would include both the period before and after 1868. But it is not the text that distinguishes the two readings. Rather, it is the sense that one reading more greatly offends our dearly held moral intuitions about fair-play and justice. As to retrospectivity, that ship had already sailed in Calder v. Bull (1798), when the Supreme Court limited the scope of the Ex Post Facto Clause to criminal proceedings. That ship reached port when the Senate in 1837 retrieved the 1834 Senate Journal and proceeded to expunge the prior Senate's censure of President Jackson.[202] Indeed, we suggest anyone favoring late impeachment should be untroubled by the retrospectivity possibilities and concerns we raise here.[203] [202] Senate Reverses a Presidential Censure, U.S. SENATE, https://www.senate.gov/about/origins-foundations/parties-leadership/senate-reverses-a-presidential-censure.htm.

---

[203] See Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Constitutional and Moral Imperative of Immediate Impeachment, THE BULWARK (Jan. 8, 2021, 5:37 AM), https://www.thebulwark.com/the-constitutional-and-moral-imperative-of-immediate-impeachment/ ("There is a fair argument that the Constitution would permit impeachment, conviction and disqualification from future office even of a former president, in order to impose the punishment of disqualification."); Baude, supra note 190.("President Trump has been impeached, and the trial seems unlikely to begin until he is no longer the President. There is some dispute about whether the Senate can try an impeachment of an ex-official. But it has done so in the past, most famously in the case of ex-Secretary of War William Belknap, and for reasons adequately covered by others I think that is proper.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Is it really that implausible to think that Section 3 could apply retroactively to a person who was already out of office? Retrospective law-making is an American tradition. Consider the case of Senator Hiram Revels, who was the first black person elected to the United States Senate.[204] His Senate term began in 1870. At the time, did he meet the requirements of being a citizen for seven years? After all, stretching from 1857 to 1863, Dred Scott was still the law of the land, and the Fourteenth Amendment was only ratified in 1868. Some senators argued that Revels was not qualified. But the Senate administered the oath to Revels, in effect retroactively applying Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment 's citizenship provision. Prior to 1868, Revels might not have experienced life as an American citizen for seven years. Under Dred Scott (1857), he was not a citizen. But the Fourteenth Amendment changed all that. Section 1 apparently retroactively made Revels a citizen for the time period he had experienced life as a non-citizen. And the Senate seated Revels.

So what follows? Here we pose a hypothetical: If Lincoln was never President, and if some strong version of the De Facto Officer does not apply, it means all the bills that were presented to him, were not presented to a President, and all the bills he signed in the last ten days prior to the end of Congress's adjournment were not signed by a President. Every one of those latter bills was a pocket veto. One such bill was the Treason Act of 1862.[205] That's the statute that Jefferson Davis was tried under.

So you see, Chase had some good reason, in Griffin's Case, to distinguish the position of elected officials from others covered under Section 3.[206] He had good reason to consider the De Facto Officer doctrine. He had good reason to flag the Mexican-American War. He also had good reason to flag these issues to the public and Congress. Baude and Paulsen characterize Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case as a "power grab."[207] It was anything but that. Chase left it to Congress to define the scope of Section 3's retroactivity and to define the limits of how far the De Facto Officer doctrine should apply. He put Congress on notice that it could, if it so chose, distinguish elected officials and [204] Hiram Revels: First African American Senator, SENATE HIST. OFF.: SENATE STORIES BLOG (Feb. 25, 2020), https://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/senate-stories/First-African-American-Senator.htm.

---

[205] Baude and Paulsen discuss the Second Confiscation Act at some length. See Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 81–84. We discuss this statute below. See infra subpart IV(B).

[206] For a discussion of this issue, see infra subsection II(B)(5)(g).

[207] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 47.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

appointed officers, and that the scope of the habeas remedy was one for them to decide, and until they do so, he would apply settled law. If this is not judicial humility, then what is? All these issues were difficult to resolve. Humility, and not hyperbole, is the order of the day—for Chase, as well as for those of us who would second-guess his judgments.

d. A theory for how constitutional amendments modify or repeal earlier provisions of the Constitution

It is well known that certain constitutional amendments modify or even repeal earlier provisions of the Constitution. These changes can be made expressly. For example, the Twenty-First Amendment stated clearly that "The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed."[208] Prohibition was repealed, though the States were granted some constitutional authority to regulate "intoxicating liquors."[209] Likewise, the Eleventh Amendment restricted the "judicial power" of the federal courts that had been originally granted by Article III—though exactly what that amendment accomplished remains debated to this day.[210] The Twelfth Amendment modified the process by which the President and Vice President are elected.[211] And the Seventeenth Amendment provided for the direct election of Senators.[212] Other amendments modify earlier provisions of the Constitution without an express statement. For example, in the Three-Fifth Clause, the phrase "other Persons" referred to slaves.[213] The Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery.[214] As a result, the Three-Fifth Clause no longer operated. This repeal was clear, even if not express.

Other amendments are expressly prospective. The Seventeenth Amendment, which provided for the popular election of senators, would not affect the terms of senators already elected by state legislatures: "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution." Similarly. prohibition under the Eighteenth

---

208 U.S. CONST. amend. XXI.

209 Id.

210 U.S. CONST. amend. XI.

211 U.S. CONST. amend. XII.

212 U.S. CONST. amend. XVII.

213 U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 3.

214 U.S. CONST. amend. XIII.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Amendment was expressly prospective; it would only go into effect "one year from the ratification of this article." The Twentieth Amendment, which changed when the President's term began, and also when Congress assembled, was also expressly prospective. That amendment would "take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article." The Twenty-Second Amendment imposed a two-term limit for the presidency. But the amendment included fairly intricate rules to ensure it was not applied retroactively: "But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term."[215]

For the Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Seventeenth, and Twenty-First Amendments, it was fairly obvious which earlier-in-time provisions were being amended. But what about Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment? Which (if any) earlier-in-time provisions of the Constitution were modified?

Baude and Paulsen tell us that "Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment modifies or qualifies what otherwise might have been thought the dictates of the First Amendment."[216] Stated differently, in the absence of Section 3, it would violate the First Amendment to disqualify a person from certain positions for engaging in protected speech. But with Section 3, the argument goes, a person could be disqualified for engaging in otherwise protected speech, notwithstanding the First Amendment. This is a robust and sweeping claim. Section 3 says nothing at all about modifying the First Amendment. Yet for Baude and Paulsen's argument to work, Section 3 would have had to sub silentio modify the freedom of speech. But how was it modified? And what are the contours of Baude and Paulsen's theory? They offer nothing close to a generally-applicable theory that would extend beyond Trump's case.

Consider the example of Congressman Clement Vallandigham of Ohio. Vallandigham, a Democrat, served in Congress from 1858 to 1863. He was a prominent critic of President Lincoln's prosecution of the Civil War.[217] In 1863, after his last term as a Representative had

---

215 U.S. CONST. amend. XII, § 1.

216 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 53.

217 Representative Clement Vallandigham of Ohio, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: HIST., ART, & ARCHIVES,

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ended, he gave a fiery anti-war speech. He was later charged by a military commission with "publicly expressing . . . his sympathies with those in arms against the Government of the United States."[218] The charge was akin to Section 3's "giving aid and comfort to enemies"-language. Vallandigham claimed that his speech was protected by the First Amendment. Yet, he was still convicted. The case made its way to the Supreme Court. However, the Supreme Court held that it lacked the authority to hear his appeal from the military tribunal.[219] Thus, the Court had no occasion to consider the First Amendment issue. Today, the widely held view is that Vallandigham's speech should have been protected by the First Amendment. For example, Chief Justice Rehnquist questioned the decision to "arrest[] and try[] Vallandigham, who had simply expressed views strongly critical of the administration."[220]

Could Vallandigham have been disqualified pursuant to Section 3, for giving aid and comfort to confederates and the confederacy–actual wartime enemies? Stated differently, would the First Amendment prohibit the use of Section 3, based on Vallandigham's speech? Or, did Section 3, enacted in 1868, retroactively repeal the Free Speech Clause and its protections, that Vallandigham otherwise would have enjoyed when he gave his speech in 1863? Baude and Paulsen do not tell us. They are noncommittal. They state: "It is conceivable (though we do not prejudge the point) that [Congressman] Vallandigham's anti-military efforts could be covered by Section Three. And yet it is also quite plausible that his efforts would be protected by free speech."[221] Which is it? Why are they noncommittal? We very much appreciate a cautious approach. Our problem is that Baude and Paulsen have engaged with the issue, but they do not answer it, and they put forward no rule thatcould provide us with an answer. Instead, they reproduce case histories and illustrate how they were resolved by the courts or by Congress. But they do not explain which precedents ought to be followed and why.

Baude and Paulsen assert that their view on the interplay between Section 3 and prior constitutional provisions is not just plausible, but emphatically correct. Indeed, they affirm: "essentially all https://history.house.gov/Historical-Highlights/1800-1850/Representative-Clement-Vallandigham-of-Ohio/.

---

218 Id.

219 See Ex parte Vallandigham, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 243, 253–54 (1864).

220 WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, ALL THE LAWS BUT ONE: CIVIL LIBERTIES IN WARTIME 73 (1998).

221 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 60.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction."[222] If they want to represent that they understand Section 3's original public meaning, then they should be able to articulate how Section 3 would be applied to one of the most prominent antiwar critics who had served in Congress. Did Vallandigham face liability under Section 3 for his speech or actions or both? If they can't resolve the status of Vallandigham's speech and conduct during the 1860s in light of Section 3—an issue that the Nation and the Reconstruction Congresses were familiar with—how can Baude and Paulsen provide guidance resolving the status of Trump's 2021 speech and other conduct in light of Section 3? If you cannot resolve the former, how is it possible to resolve the latter?

Baude and Paulsen should also be able to discuss whether Abraham Lincoln could have been disqualified for his opposition to the Mexican–American War for his conduct and speeches during the time he served in the House.[223] Did Section 3 retroactively repeal, in any way, the traditional protections of the Speech or Debate Clause? Baude and Paulsen state that "Section Three can be easily harmonized with other parts of the Constitution, such as Article I's Speech or Debate Clause," but we do not see where they ever explain how they arrived at the conclusion.[224] Indeed, the phrase "Speech or Debate" appears nowhere else in their article. Members of Congress, including Jefferson Davis and Clement Vallandigham, gave speeches on their chamber's floor supporting or tending to support the (purported) confederacy.[225] Thus, it is likely that this sort of conduct would have been on the minds of those who framed and sought to understand Section 3 in 1868. Yet, Baude and Paulsen provide no concrete answers.

Let's state the issue more clearly through a series of hypotheticals. Imagine that the United States finds itself in a declared war against a recognized belligerent foreign nation. Which of the following acts, if any, singly or collectively, by a member of Congress would trigger disqualification under Section 3:

1. Voting against a declaration of war;
2. Speaking against continuing the war on the floor;
3. Voicing the view that the war is unjust and illegal on and off the floor;

---

[222] Id. at 103.

[223] See supra subsection II(B)(5)(c).

[224] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 52.

[225] See supra subsection II(B)(5)(b).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

4. Voicing the view that those who fight and support the war are sinful, deserving of G-d's wrath, and the moral opprobrium of neighbors, and that who oppose the war (even unlawfully) deserve G-d's bounty, praise, and the good will of neighbors;
5. Condemning those who fight in the war and those who do not seek to lawfully escape any duty to fight;
6. Repeating all these views in public and private, communications with the member's constituents, the public, and the media;
7. Voting against funding the armed forces in relation to prosecuting the war;
8. Voting against providing funding to the Justice Department in relation to prosecuting deserters;
9. Asking the public to vote against the administration and all other elected officials who support the war;
10. Urging like-minded voters to coordinate their opposition to the war "by all legal means";
11. Promising that if a majority of like-thinking members and a candidate for President should prevail at the next election, the new administration would use the government and its resources to pardon those who had already violated the law in opposing the government's war policies;
12. Promising that the new, like-thinking administration would seek to punish those who had promoted and prosecuted the war, for any legal violation they had committed, no matter how inconsequential and even if those violations were not connected, in any way, to war itself.

Careful readers should see historical analogs in at least some of the hypotheticals above. Would any or all of the hypotheticals above permit Section 3 sanctions against the member? If Baude and Paulsen cannot clarify what their position is in regard to these Vallandigham-lite and Vallandigham-like hypotheticals above and how they arrived at that position, then they do not have a theory of constitutional change or a fully fleshed-out theory of the scope of Section 3. We think they need both.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

e. Retroactivity in Griffin's Case

Chase raised concerns about retroactivity in his Griffin's Case opinion. The prior two sections illustrate a few of the implications of Section 3-related retroactivity. Baude and Paulsen's response is that the Fourteenth Amendment changed prior law, and that it was so understood as breaking with past retrospectivity principles. Of course, Baude and Paulsen are correct on this narrow point. Chase and Congress and the country also knew that Section 3 imposed a retroactive burden of some sort. But what sort? Chase still needed to know what particular retroactive burdens the Fourteenth Amendment imposed.

Again, Chase reasoned that if Section 3 is applied retroactively, absent authorizing legislation, then covered persons' subsequent official acts may be void or, at least, otherwise in doubt. The reliance interests which would be upset, both private and public, would be significant and that such retrospective liability is not consistent with traditional ex post facto and retrospectivity principles. All this counsels against imposing a retroactive disability. On the other hand, Chase also states, as a potential alternative basis for his holding, that Sheffey's public acts are saved under the De Facto Officer doctrine. If the latter position based on the De Facto Officer doctrine is correct, then the feared undesirable consequences associated with imposing retroactive liability are muted. Baude and Paulsen see Chase as having issued two inconsistent positions.

Now consider how the Congress and loyal public opinion may have understood Chase's opinion. If Chase was wrong about the Fourteenth Amendment being non-self-executing, could and should Congress have relied on the Supreme Court and the loyal federal judiciary to correct Chase's mistake?

No appeal to the Supreme Court was possible in Griffin's Case. Chase would have the last word in that particular litigation. Why? Because of the Act of March 27, 1868.[226] This statute was a set of jurisdictional and other reforms, famously discussed in Ex parte McCardle,[227] which sought to restrict Supreme Court appellate review in order to insulate from Supreme Court review what is, and what was sometimes called, Radical Reconstruction. But there would be other circuit justices in other circuits who might rule differently from Chase. The optics of that potential circuit split would be bad—as the resulting rights accruing to Section 3-covered persons would vary circuit by [226] Act of March 27, 1868, ch. 34, 15 Stat. 44.

---

[227] Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506, 509–10 (1868).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

circuit. Likewise, if the Congress took this approach, and risked one or more circuit splits, they would be leaving Chase's decision intact in Virginia: the former capital of the former (purported) confederacy. Such a circuit split would have created significant problems across the Nation. Congress could also take the approach that even if no direct appeal was possible in Griffin's Case, the decision could be overruled in a subsequent Supreme Court case arising under the Court's remaining appellate jurisdiction or, possibly, under its original jurisdiction. But if Congress trusted the Court's members, then it would not have passed the Act of March 27, 1868. And, of course, waiting for the same issue to reach the Supreme Court might be undesirable: as it left Section 3's ultimate objective in limbo until such a case should be decided in accord with Congress's Section 3-related objective.

To put it another way, Congress responded to Griffin's Case by passing substantive enforcement legislation: just as Chase thought Congress needed to do.[228] The Enforcement Act of 1870 was passed about a year after Chase issued his Griffin's Case opinion. Admittedly, individual members might have had any number of reasons to pass this legislation. But the key reason we suggest was not that its members feared Chase was wrong on the self-execution issue, but that they feared, as a legal matter, Chase was correct. What do we mean by correct? Correct in the sense that Congress's members feared that (at least) four other of the eight Supreme Court Justices (in office in May 1870) agreed with Chase, along with a substantial number of judges on the inferior courts.[229] Indeed, at this juncture, when the Enforcement Act of 1870 was enacted, the Supreme Court included: 5 Lincoln appointees (including Chief Justice Chase), 2 Grant appointees, as well as Grier—the author of the majority opinion in The Prize Cases (decided Mar. 10, 1863). Surely no one can impugn the loyalty of these men. If, in fact, so many judges and Justices agreed with Chase, is not that some good reason to think that Chase's position was in the heartland of the mainstream of legal thinking for his day? Is not that some reason to think his position credible, if not creditable?

Baude and Paulsen see Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case as chock full of "weird[] thing[s]"—an incoherent outlier, aggressively deciding issues not properly before the court, and making arguments in

---

[228] See, e.g., Enforcement Act of 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 140. The Enforcement Act of 1870 is also known as the "Civil Rights Act of 1870," the "First Ku Klux Klan Act," and the "Force Act."

[229] Justices 1789 to Present, SUP. CT. OF THE U.S., https://www.supremecourt.gov/about/members_text.aspx.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

tension with itself.[230] We see something else—an opinion within the mainstream, in dialogue with the Congress and the loyal populace. But most of all, we see Chase's opinion as a constitutional roadmap.

f. Chase's roadmap to understand Section 3 and retroactivity

Going forward, we will assume that a retroactive disability could only be imposed starting either when the person took his position or when the Fourteenth Amendment was enacted–whichever is later–but not beforehand.

In other words, this is our understanding of how Chase saw Section 3: If the disability is imposed prospectively, then the applicability of the De Facto Officer doctrine need not be reached. But if the disability is imposed retroactively, then the De Facto Officer doctrine is the default rule, but Congress is free to upset that default rule. Likewise, even if Congress displaces the De Facto Officer doctrine, that is not enough reason to expand the reach of the habeas remedy—which has its own jurisprudential history apart from the De Facto Officer doctrine. The default rule for the habeas remedy is that it does not reach claims based upon the illegality of the composition of the trial court. But here too, Congress is free to upset that default rule.

Chase's opinion referenced legislation that operated prospectively. In February 1869, both houses of Congress approved a joint "resolution respecting the provisional Governments of Virginia and Texas."[231] (A joint resolution is a statute.) The joint resolution provided, in part:

> That the persons now holding civil offices in the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas, who cannot take and subscribe the oath presented by the act entitled "An Act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, shall, on the passage of this resolution, be removed therefrom.[232]

In other words, under the February 1869 statute, if a person was currently holding a "civil office[]" in Virginia and Texas could not take

---

230 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 45.

231 Res. No. 8, 40th Cong., 15 Stat. 344 (1869), https://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/ampage?collId=llsl&fileName=015/llsl015.db&recNum=377.

232 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the Ironclad Oath,[233] then they would be removed from office. Chase reasoned that the officeholders who were unable to take the Ironclad Oath would likely be subject to the disqualification element of Section 3. Stated differently, those subject to disqualification pursuant to Section 3 would be removed pursuant to the February 1869 act. From this statute, Chase drew an inference: Congress did not regard officeholders in Virginia, who were already subject to disqualification under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which had been ratified in 1868, "as having been already removed from office."[234] If Section 3 had been self-executing, a Section 3-covered person would already have been removed from office, and the February 1869 joint resolution would have been unnecessary. Chase added that this joint resolution further supports his conclusion that Section 3 did not "effect[] an immediate removal of the officers."[235] Indeed, Chase found "strong confirmation" for his position in this joint resolution.[236] In short, subsequent legislation would be necessary to remove Section 3-covered persons from office.

Professor Magliocca has expressed the view that the reason Chase may have taken the position that congressional enforcement mechanisms may have been necessary in Griffin's Case was that, during Reconstruction, Virginia was not a properly reconstructed State, and so, the State was not in a position to make statutes to enforce Section 3.[237] In that situation, only Congress could do so. In correspondence, Professor Magliocca identifies the key features of Reconstruction as a lack of representation in Congress and military governance. (The authors thank Professor Magliocca for his willingness to clarify his position in private correspondence. Such cooperation among scholars who disagree with one another has become all too rare.)

Still, Magliocca does not say that elections were not held at that time for state positions. He does not say that the state legislature was not meeting or was disabled from making laws—including election

---

[233] Act to Prescribe an Oath of Office, ch. 128, 12 Stat. 502 (1862), https://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/ampage?collId=llsl&fileName=012/llsl012.db&recNum=533; Margaret Wood, Oath of Office, LIBR. OF CONG. BLOGS: IN CUSTODIA LEGIS (Jan. 6, 2015), https://blogs.loc.gov/law/2015/01/oath-of-office/.

[234] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 27 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

[235] Id.

[236] Id. at 26.

[237] Gerard N. Magliocca, Amnesty and Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, 36 CONST. COMM. 87, 105 n.92 (2021).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

laws—even if subject to review by federal military authorities. More importantly, he does not tie the disabilities Virginia faced during this period to any inability to make state election law that might recognizably enforce Section 3. In 1869, the precise legal status of Virginia was murky: was it reconstructed or unreconstructed? Chase said "It is unnecessary to discuss here the question whether the government of Virginia, which seems to have been not provisional, but permanent, when transferred from Alexandria to Richmond, became provisional under the subsequent legislation of congress."[238] We suggest that Chase did not tie his conclusion to the precise status of Virginia at this time.

g. Enforcement by the States

Chase's roadmap had two other important implications. First, Chase explained that because Section 3 was not self-executing, only a statute could put it into effect. But not just any statute: federal or state. It had to be a federal statute. Second, a state statute would not suffice. In Chase's view, a state statute could not operationalize Section 3—at least not absent congressional authorization. He wrote that Section 3 would be made "operative" by the "legislation of congress in its ordinary course."[239] Chase explained that specific proceedings "are indispensable" to "ensure effective results" under Section 3, and these proceedings "can only be provided for by congress."[240] Chase expressly tied his analysis to Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which "gives to congress absolute control of the whole operation of the amendment."[241]

Congress understood how to assign a role to the States to implement Section 3. For example, on June 25, 1868, about two weeks before the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified on July 9, 1868,[242] Congress enacted a statute that set conditions for the readmission of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress.[243] Section 3 of this Act provides, in part:

---

238 Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 27.

239 Id. at 26.

240 Id.

241 Id.

242 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution: Civil Rights (1868), NAT'L ARCHIVES, https://www.archives.gov/milestone-documents/14th-amendment.

243 An Act to Admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, to Representation in Congress, ch. 70, 15 Stat.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> [N]o person prohibited from holding office under the United States or under any State, by section three of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, unless relieved from disability as provided by said amendment . . . .[244]

Through this statute, Congress required the States to deem ineligible those individuals who were disqualified from holding "any office in either of said States."[245] (We think this phrase only concerns state positions in "said states" and not federal positions.) This statute demonstrates that Congress understood how to assign the States a role to enforce Section 3. And this statute was self-executing upon its enactment.

Of course, even in the absence of federal legislation, a state could pass a statute and mirror Section 3's "qualifications," and any such state statutory "qualifications" could extend to its own officials and officers (subject to federal constitutional constraints). This is a power states had before, during, and even after the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment for state positions.[246] But absent congressional authorization, a state statute (even one mirroring Section 3's "qualifications") could not apply to federal officials and officers. Chase read Section 5 as giving Congress a monopoly over enforcement of Section 3.

---

73 (1868), https://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/ampage?collId=llsl&fileName=015/llsl015.db&recNum=106.

244 Id. § 3.

245 See generally id.

246 See 2 JOSEPH STORY, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES: WITH A PRELIMINARY REVIEW OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF THE COLONIES AND STATES BEFORE THE ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION 678 n.1 (Thomas M. Cooley ed., 4th ed. 1873) (explaining that a "State may provide for judicially inquiring into the holding of a state office in violation of this provision"); see also U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 805 (1995) ("In short, as the Framers recognized, electing representatives to the National Legislature was a new right, arising from the Constitution itself. The Tenth Amendment thus provides no basis for concluding that the States possess reserved power to add qualifications to those that are fixed in the Constitution.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Two state cases which have been discussed[247] are: Worthy v. Barrett,[248] and In re Tate.[249] The latter relies entirely upon the former case. Worthy was a case heard in state court, involving a state position, county sheriff, and it was adjudicated under state law. The state statute incorporated by reference Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. The cause of action was a state cause of action, not a federal one. Judge Reade stated:

> Our statute provides that "no person prohibited from holding office by section 3 of the Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as Article XIV, shall qualify under this act or hold office in this State." Acts of 1868 ch. 1. sec. 8.
>
> The Fourteenth Article of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, sec. 3, is as follows . . . .[250]

Thus, Section 3 furnishes the categories for which disqualification would apply. But Section 3 was not applied directly. Actually excluding a person from office still required a state statute supplying a cause of action. A state legislature can supply such a statute for a state position because a state always has authority to do so (subject to a few federal constitutional limitations). But there is no such coordinate authority for a state legislature to supply a statute which would remove a person from a federal position or deny that person a line on the state ballot for a federal elective position—at least, there is no such authority absent a federal authorizing statute. We are not aware of any such case, where absent federal authorizing legislation, a candidate for a federal elective position was denied a position on the state ballot[251] based on purported Section 3 disqualification.

---

247 See Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 101; Parloff, supra note 176.

248 63 N.C. 199 (1869).

249 63 N.C. 308 (1869).

250 Worthy, 63 N.C. at 200 (emphasis added).

251 The secret, written paper ballot was implemented at different times in different states. When we speak about keeping a candidate off the ballot, we are also speaking about instructions to elections officials not to count and tabulate "votes" cast for purportedly disqualified candidates and/or not to grant a certificate of election to a candidate with the greatest number of "votes" because that candidate has been purportedly disqualified. Even if there is no physical, mechanical, or electrical "ballot," judges of election and elections administrators control many other aspects of election administration that, in effect, can exclude a candidate.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen characterize Worthy as standing for the proposition that "a state sheriff was disqualified under Section 3."[252] And Professor Mark Graber wrote that in Worthy and Tate, the "State courts in the absence of federal legislation determined whether persons were disqualified from holding office because of their participation in the insurrection."[253] But those restatements of the two cases are not correct. Worthy stood for the proposition that a state officer could be disqualified under a state statute that incorporated or mirrored Section 3's terms. That a state had such power over its own officers was true before, during, and after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. Section 3 was not self-executing, it required a statute, and here the statute was applied to state officers–not any federal positions. Again, Baude and Paulsen's characterization of Worthy is not correct.

To make the point a different way, the Fourteenth Amendment was in some ways a constitutional revolution. It expanded federal power vis-a-vis traditional state power.[254] It did so because the experience of the Civil War and early Reconstruction showed that state institutions failed and that the Nation's hopes and aspirations rested, not with the traditional legal system as a whole, federal and state, but with the national government. In short, the States and state governments could not be trusted.[255]

The Fourteenth Amendment and contemporaneous federal Reconstruction legislation, both that which implemented the Fourteenth Amendment and other Reconstruction legislation, were enacted precisely because state institutions, state officials, and state courts were not considered trustworthy by the national government. The idea was to make federal institutional authority paramount. Indeed, the very sort of powers that Baude and Paulsen believe could be used by state authorities, absent federal authorizing legislation implementing Section 3, could have been used by former confederates (and their sympathizers) to disqualify freedmen and other loyal persons

---

252 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 101.

253 Graber, supra note 118 at 11.

254 See United States v. Washington, 20 F. 630, 631 (C.C.W.D. Tex. 1883) ("The fourteenth amendment is a limitation upon the powers of the state and an enlargement of the powers of congress."); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 255 (2000) (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("The Fourteenth Amendment directly empowers Congress at the same time it expressly limits the States.").

255 See GEORGE WASHINGTON PASCHAL, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES DEFINED AND CAREFULLY ANNOTATED xxiv (W.H. & O.H. Morrison, Law Booksellers 1868) (explaining that the purpose and effect of the Reconstruction era amendments was to "enlarge[] the powers of the nation, [and] abridge[] those of the States").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

in former confederate states from holding elective positions.[256] Nor would judicial review solve this problem. Southern state judges were not known for remaining staunchly unionist during the Civil War and Reconstruction. In our view, the idea that the Fourteenth Amendment automatically entrusted state institutions with an independent enforcement power over Section 3 or the Fourteenth Amendment is flatly ahistorical.

The idea that the Fourteenth Amendment, absent express federal statutory authorization, allowed the States to operationalize Section 3 only makes sense if state governments could be trusted. But the whole point of the Fourteenth Amendment was that they could not be trusted. Ask yourself: in 1868, who could have believed that Section 3 was a grant of power to the States? Our argument here is not that allowing States to enforce Section 3 against federal officials and officers risked "abuse" (which it certainly did), but that any argument that Section 3 was a grant of power to state institutions was not one, which in 1868, was likely to be understood to arise in connection with the Fourteenth Amendment's and Section 3's text, history, or purposes. Baude and Paulsen point to floor debate in Congress reporting that Section 3 was "self-executing." We do not see that they reported any sources–any–suggesting that the scope of self-execution extended to the States, particularly those States which had recently rebelled against the national authority. And it was these latter States that the Fourteenth Amendment was directed against.

Chase, in Paragraph [2] above, put Congress on notice that elected officials stand in a different legal position from appointed officers. And Congress followed Chase's advice. The Enforcement Act of 1870 established a federal quo warranto procedure which provided for prospective removal of a Section 3-covered officials and officers, but there was a carve out. It did not apply to legislators.

We suggest that Chase saw no tensions among the different strands of his opinion. He was responding to the legal issues before him, and he was providing a roadmap for Congress and the political process. It was for Congress to prescribe enforcement measures and those detailed measures would resolve any such tensions through the normal political process.

---

[256] See, e.g., Vicki C. Jackson, Printz and Testa*: The Infrastructure of Federal Supremacy*, 32 IND. L. REV. 111, 122–27 (1998). In other words, disqualification is a two-edged sword. See generally, e.g., Tom Ginsburg, Aziz Z. Huq & David Landau, The Law of Democratic Disqualification, 111 CALIF. L. REV. (forthcoming 2023), https://ssrn.com/abstract=3938600.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Let's assume Baude and Paulsen are correct that Section 3 is self-executing as a matter of original public meaning. Let's further assume that States have a coordinate power with Congress to enforce Section 3. Section 3's proscription precludes Section 3-covered persons from "holding" certain "office[s]" and other listed positions. It does not, on its face, give or grant any power vis-a-vis the organization of state ballot procedures. Indeed, many (if not all of) the earliest efforts to enforce Section 3 were quo warranto proceedings by federal prosecutors to remove persons allegedly in office contrary to Section 3 or its early statutory analogues. As Baude and Paulsen repeatedly tell us: the Constitution is a text, and that text is law. Section 3 prohibits a covered person's holding the listed positions, and not his participating in elections for those positions. Saying Section 3 authorizes state ballot control mechanisms over federal positions amounts to an inference akin to a protective jurisdiction. And what we mean by protective jurisdiction is a legal fiction; something not otherwise directly supported by the text.

To put it another way, Baude and Paulsen are putting their paper forward as part-and-parcel of the rule of law project via original public meaning. They also acknowledge that the "centralized, government-administered [secret] ballot did not come to America[] until the late Nineteenth Century."[257] If that is the case, then Section 3 was not written with our current election system in firm view. It follows that if Section 3 (old law) applies to modern state balloting schemes (new law), then an argument has to be made to support that position. But Baude and Paulsen do not make any such argument. They just assume that if the quo warranto remedy to remove a Section 3-covered person was available under Section 3, then it follows that Section 3 also allows ballot restrictions at election time to prevent a Section 3-covered person from running for a listed position. But that is hardly obvious. Indeed, given that Congress authorized federal officials to carry out quo warranto actions against Section 3-covered persons, but later Congress expressly removed that power from U.S. enforcement officials, does it really make sense to think that Congress or the public believed that the States, but not the federal government, retained an unauthorized and independent Section 3 enforcement power?

During the postbellum era, the secret, written ballot was introduced. To implement the new voting regimes, states introduced administrative and/or judicial frameworks to control ballot access. State administrative bodies and state courts regularly determine ballot challenges based on qualifications—including Article I and Article II

---

[257] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 23 n.65.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

qualifications for elected federal positions. If this practice was never actually authorized by Congress, the practice certainly appears to be one which Congress has long acquiesced in. Nor is the result surprising. The background understanding of Article I, Article II, and the Constitution of 1788 as a whole was that the States and new federal government would divide and share political power. Powers would be enjoyed concurrently. States were not only components, in a sense, of the national government, but the federal government relied upon the States to carry out many functions without which the federal government could not function. Indeed, the power of the States was seen, by some, as a protection against future federal overreach. In that world, one could make a reasonable argument in support of the position that Articles I and II permitted States to monitor federal qualifications for elected positions on the state ballot.

But in 1868, it was a different world. States were not trusted institutions. Section 3 and the Fourteenth Amendment as a whole were a projection of federal power against the States. So the idea that Section 3 permitted States, via ballot control or other elections procedures, to limit voter and candidate participation for federal positions and to do so absent express federal authorization seems (at least to us) very unlikely. And that question hinges on whether Section 3 was self-executing in the sense that it could be used offensively in a suit or proceeding brought by a private person. Chase answered that question with a no. Today, the question for us is: Was Chase correct or not?

h. How could the States enforce Section 3 with regard to the presidency?

In light of Chief Justice Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case, the States would have no role in enforcing Section 3–at least, absent congressional authorization. But we acknowledge that a state may try to enforce Section 3. This part addresses how that enforcement may roll out. We believe there are two primary approaches which a state could attempt to block a presidential candidate from being awarded a state's electoral votes based on a (purported) Section 3 disqualification. The first approach would involve a state statute authorizing state elections officers to block the (purportedly) disqualified presidential candidate from appearing on the ballot. This approach is not likely to prevent write-in votes. As far as we are aware, no such state statute actually exists. And we do not think the Supremacy Clause, standing by itself, permits (much less obligates) state officials to enforce Section 3.

The second approach would be to prohibit electors from voting for a (purportedly) disqualified presidential candidate. Under the principle from U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton, states cannot add additional qualifications for the president, but in light of Chiafalo v. Washington, it is conceivable that the States have the authority to direct presidential electors to not vote for a disqualified candidate. To be sure, Chiafalo did not reach or have occasion to reach this issue.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

(1) Does any state statute expressly incorporate Section 3 as a qualification for President?

As far as we are aware, no State has enacted a statute that expressly blocks a presidential candidate from appearing on the ballot based on a Section 3 disqualification. Some states have laws that expressly reference the qualifications for the President that appear in Article II: a candidate must be thirty-five years old, a natural born citizen, and fourteen years a resident of the United States. We have not purported to undertake a fifty-state survey to determine if some states have statutory provisions generally referencing qualifications in the federal Constitution, or something to that effect, which could incorporate Section 3.[258]

In states that lack such an express statute, the secretaries of state would not have the power to remove a candidate from the ballot on the basis of a (purported) Section 3 disqualification. A recent opinion from the New Hampshire Attorney General demonstrates this point.[259] The relevant state law "does not afford the Secretary of State discretion to withhold a candidate's name from the ballot on the grounds that the candidate may be disqualified under Section Three when a candidate has not been convicted or otherwise adjudicated guilty of conduct that would disqualify a candidate under Section Three."[260] Rather, the state

---

[258] The National Association of Secretaries of States has published an index of presidential qualification laws in all states. See generally NAT'L ASS'N OF SEC'Y OF STATE, SUMMARY: STATE LAWS REGARDING PRESIDENTIAL BALLOT ACCESS FOR THE GENERAL ELECTION (2020), https://www.nass.org/sites/default/files/surveys/2020-07/research-ballot-access-president-Jan20_0.pdf

[259] N.H. Att'y Gen. Off., Opinion Letter on The Applicability of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution to Presidential Primary Candidates in the State of New Hampshire (Sept. 13, 2023), https://www.doj.nh.gov/news/2023/documents/20230913-section-3-14th-amendment-guidance.pdf

[260] Id. at 3. The New Hampshire Attorney General also explained that: "For the purposes of this guidance as applied to Mr. Trump, it is not necessary to determine what, if any, conviction or adjudication might permit the Secretary of State to decline to place a presidential primary candidate's name on the ballot . . . ." Id. at 4 n.3 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

can only "review[] the sufficiency of a declaration of candidacy," and cannot "hear[] disputes over whether a candidate is disqualified under Section Three."[261] Likewise, the declaration of candidacy only references the well-known requirements set out in Article II, Section 1, Clause 4 of the Constitution: age, citizenship, and residency. New Hampshire state law does not "empower[] or permit[] the Secretary of State to engage in independent investigation or to conduct an adjudicative process related to a candidate's qualifications under Section Three."[262]

We think the New Hampshire Attorney General's analysis is sound. (And for those keeping score at home, Footnote 1 of the opinion states, "For purposes of this letter, I assume that Section Three applies to the Office of the President."[263]). We also think this opinion provides further reasons why state officials cannot determine whether a presidential candidate is disqualified pursuant to Section 3.

(2) The Supremacy Clause does not empower Secretaries of State to enforce Section 3

We address an alternative argument. In New Hampshire, the Attorney General determined that state law does not authorize the Secretary of State to remove from the ballot a candidate based on a (purported) Section 3 disqualification. But would the New Hampshire Secretary of State, who is bound by the Supremacy Clause, still be required to enforce Section 3? In other words, even in the absence of a state statute, does the federal Constitution itself require the Secretary of State to remove a candidate from the ballot based on Section 3?

There is a threshold problem with this alternative argument: it presumes that Section 3 is self-executing. In Griffin's Case (1869), Chief Justice Chase held that Section 3 was not self-executing. If Chief Justice Chase was correct, then the role of implementing Section 3, or, at least, authorizing Section 3's implementation, falls initially, squarely, and exclusively with Congress. In the absence of such a federal statute, state officials have no obligation and no power to enforce Section 3–even where a state statute otherwise authorizes such enforcement.

For argument's sake, let's assume that Section 3 does not require federal implementing legislation. In those circumstances, would the Supremacy Clause permit or require a secretary of state to

---

[261] Id. at 2.

[262] Id. at 3.

[263] Id. at 1 n.1 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

determine whether a candidate for federal office is disqualified under Section 3? Stated differently, could a state's secretary of state or any other state elections official, who takes an oath to the federal Constitution, place a candidate on a ballot that he believed to be disqualified by Section 3?

Baude and Paulsen advance a related argument. They criticize a recent decision from the Arizona Supreme Court.[264] In that case, the plaintiff sought to make use of Arizona state election law procedures to give effect to Section 3 by excluding three incumbents from the primary ballot. In short, Hansen, an Arizona voter, claimed that state representative Finchem, U.S. Representative Gosar, and U.S. Representative Biggs had participated in an insurrection on January 6, 2021 in Washington, D.C. The trial court had denied Hansen all relief. The appeal went directly to the state supreme court, which affirmed the judgment below.

The Arizona Supreme Court held that a relevant state statute enforced qualifications for office, and it did not enforce *dis*qualifications from office. Relevant, for our purposes, the court reasoned that the state statute "does not provide a private right of action to invoke the [Fourteenth Amendment's] Disqualification Clause against the Candidates." Baude and Paulsen describe the Court's reasoning as "muddied," "unfortunate[]," "cryptic[]," and "nonsensical."[265] (Their hyperbole is not just reserved for jurists long dead—the members of a state's highest court, here interpreting their own state statute, are at the receiving end of such charged language as well.) We don't understand why Baude and Paulsen have any doubt as to what was the basis of the Arizona Supreme Court's holding. Nothing was "cryptic." The highest court of Arizona addressed the scope and meaning of one of its own state statutes. The text of the statute referred to "qualifications" and not to "disqualifications." Section 3, as Baude and Paulsen repeatedly state, starts with "No person shall be"—so, the Arizona Supreme Court understood it to be a disqualification, rather than a qualification. The state court drew a distinction under state law between qualifications and disqualifications. And this distinction has roots in election law. Probably, the earliest post-independence American decision on this point was Hall v. Hostetter in the Kentucky

---

[264] Hansen v. Finchem, U.S. Representative Paul Gosar, and U.S. Representative Andy Biggs, No. CV2022-004321, 2022 WL 1468157 (Ariz. May 9, 2022) (en banc).

[265] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 25.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Court of Appeals.[266] Here, Kentucky's highest court recognized that this distinction had "a good deal of plausibility," and proceeded to rule that as a matter of Kentucky law "qualifications" also encompassed "disqualifications." The court defended its position for two pages. But, one judge—apparently, a deeply committed textualist!—dissented from the court's holding, producing a 2-to-1 decision. We don't hold up the majority or dissent in Hostetter as a correct interpretation of Kentucky law. Rather, we suggest that the Arizona Supreme Court's analysis was not "nonsensical," but was at a minimum "plausible." And in no sense was it "cryptic."

Further, Baude and Paulsen charge that the Arizona Supreme Court was wrong as a matter of federal constitutional law. They write, "Congress's power to enforce federal law, including constitutional law, is not exclusive of the states, and the states regularly enforce federal law including federal constitutional law in their own courts."[267] Here, Baude and Paulsen cited the Supreme Court's decision in Tafflin v. Levitt.[268]

This citation was misplaced. Tafflin was not about causes of action; it was about jurisdiction. The majority opinion mentions the phrase "cause of action" only once, and in passing. We were surprised by this citation. Why? We doubt jurisdiction-focused arguments advance Baude and Paulsen's position. Moreover, Baude and Paulsen's bringing up Tafflin did not advance their argument because any discussion of jurisdiction should have red-flagged the historical tradition that Article III is not self-executing.[269] Rather, legislation is needed to create federal courts, to assign jurisdiction, and to create federal causes of action. Again, Congress has not created any federal cause of action with regard to Section 3. And when Congress did enact 266 56 Ky. (17 B. Mon.) 764 (1856) ("[I]t is insisted that the ineligibility of a sheriff for a third term is a mere disqualification, which does not apply to a marshal, who is only required by the constitution to have the same qualifications as sheriffs, but is not subjected to the same disqualifications. There is a good deal of plausibility in the argument in support of the last position, and we have felt its force; but after a careful examination of the constitution, we have come to the conclusion that the words, qualifications and qualified, are used therein, in their most comprehensive sense, to signify not only the circumstances that are requisite to render a citizen eligible to office, or that entitle him to vote, but also to denote an exemption from all legal disqualifications for either purpose.").

---

267 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 25.

268 Blackman discussed the limits of Tafflin and its tension with Printz v. United States in Josh Blackman, State Judicial Sovereignty, 2016 U. ILL. L. REV. 2033.

269 See supra subpart I(A) (discussing how the grant of Article III jurisdiction to the lower courts is not self-executing).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

such a process through the Enforcement Act of 1870, the federal courts had exclusive jurisdiction to hear the quo warranto suits brought by federal prosecutors.[270] State courts and state election officials had no role in this process.

Baude and Paulsen invoke another federal courts chestnut. They write that "in some circumstances state law not only can but must enforce Section Three."[271] Specifically, "[u]nder the rule of Testa v. Katt, where a state does open its courts to a[n] [analogous state] cause of action, it must apply federal law evenhandedly to that cause of action."[272] Baude and Paulsen contend, "If the [Arizona Supreme] [C]ourt meant to distinguish federal constitutional qualifications from state statutes [mandating qualifications], it seems to have violated Testa [v. Katt]."[273] Again, we do not think that Baude and Paulsen correctly read what the Arizona court held as a matter of state law. But we also think they are incorrect with regard to Testa and federal law.

If the Arizona Supreme Court had meant to distinguish federal constitutional qualifications from state statutory qualifications, would that distinction have violated Testa v. Katt? No. Testa v. Katt stands for the proposition that state courts of competent jurisdiction must be open to federal statutory causes of action created by Congress if the state court is already open to analogous causes of action under state law. It is a (default) mandatory nondiscrimination principle. Testa has not one word to say about state courts being open to federal causes of action purportedly provided in the U.S. Constitution, in the absence of federal legislation.

So Testa is not on-point here, and Baude and Paulsen point to no other on-point authority suggesting that Testa has expanded or ought to be expanded to cover purported causes of action provided in the Constitution. We should also be hesitant to determine how the Fourteenth Amendment, ratified in 1868, should be enforced in light of Testa v. Katt, a Supreme Court precedent from 1947. Indeed, there is some originalist argument to be made that Testa and its progeny went too far.[274]

---

270 Second Enforcement Act, ch. 99, 16 Stat. 433, 438 (1871).

271 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 25.

272 Id.

273 Id.

274 Haywood v. Drown, 556 U.S. 729, 756–57 (2009) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("[T]he Constitution did not impose an obligation on the States to accept jurisdiction over such claims . . . . The Constitution instead left the States with the choice—but not the obligation—to entertain federal actions." (internal citations omitted)); id. at 752 ("This historical record makes clear that the

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Now one might reason by analogy: if causes of action in federal statutes must be enforced in state courts under Testa's mandatory nondiscrimination principle, then causes of action in the federal constitution must also be enforced in state courts. After all, both the federal constitution as well as federal statutes are the supreme law of the land per Article VI and, therefore, binding upon every state court and every state court judge. But that proves too much. The Supreme Court has rejected the proposition that "the Supremacy Clause creates a cause of action . . . ."[275] Moreover, U.S. treaties with foreign states are also part of the supreme law of the land, but there is no presumption that they are self-executing.[276] And the Reconstruction Congress well understood how to enact federal statutes–which, of course, were self-executing.[277] But Congress has taken no such action with regard to Section 3. And in the absence of such federal legislation, state courts should hesitate before extending Testa to this novel context.

Still, we recognize that the law here is not entirely clear. For that reason, we note that a State could attempt to obviate the Testa issue and enact a statute that expressly incorporates Section 3 as a qualification for the President. What then?

(3) What about a hypothetical state statute that expressly incorporates Section 3 as a qualification for President?

We are not aware of any state statutes that expressly incorporates Section 3 qualifications as a ballot control mechanism for a presidential candidate. And we do not think that Section 3, by virtue of the Supremacy Clause, imposes a freestanding obligation on state

---

Supremacy Clause's exclusive function is to disable state laws that are substantively inconsistent with federal law—not to require state courts to hear federal claims over which the courts lack jurisdiction."); see also, Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 968 (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("That language [the Supremacy Clause] commands state judges to 'apply federal law' in cases that they entertain, but it is not the source of their duty to accept jurisdiction of federal claims . . . ."). For more criticism of Testa, see Blackman, supra note 268, at 2048–51.

275 See, e.g., Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Ctr., 575 U.S. 320, 326 (2015). See supra note 19 (discussing how the Supremacy Clause is not self-executing as a sword).

276 See supra subsection I(C)(1)(d) (discussing that treaties are presumptively not self-executing).

277 See supra subsection II(B)(5)(g) (discussing enforcement statute enacted on June 25, 1868).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

officials to determine whether a presidential candidate is disqualified by Section 3.

Still, to demonstrate how a state law could purport to block a presidential candidate from the ballot based on a Section 3 disqualification, we consider a hypothetical state statute–enacted by the state legislature absent express authorization from a federal statute. This hypothetical statute expressly empowers a state official to determine whether a presidential candidate is disqualified pursuant to Section 3, and to prevent such a candidate from appearing on the presidential ballot. Moreover, to make the hypothetical sound, this statute provides the affected candidate with all the basics of due process, including ample notice, an evidentiary hearing before a neutral magistrate, appellate review through the state court system, with an ultimate appeal to the United States Supreme Court. Would such a statute be constitutional? (Again, we assume for argument's sake that a Section 3 disqualification extends to the presidency.)

In our view, because Section 3 requires federal enforcement legislation, such a state statute would not be constitutional. Congress would have to create a specific procedure to determine whether a person is disqualified under Section 3, or, at least, authorize the states to do so. But assume further for argument's sake that we are wrong on the self-execution point. Would such a hypothetical state statute be constitutional? We think not.

Section 3 says nothing at all about appearing on a ballot. A person squarely disqualified by Section 3 can run for any office he wishes. And he can even be elected to that office. The disability would only kick in when the person seeks to actually "hold" a covered position. Again, we think that Section 3 requires some federal enforcement legislation. State officials cannot make these determinations on their own in the absence of federal legislation specifying the applicable process or authorizing the state to do so—even if a state statute purports to authorize such decisionmaking by state election officials. But there is an even deeper problem with a state official blocking a candidate from the ballot—Congress always retains the power to relieve a person of a Section 3 disability by a 2/3 vote of each house. Any attempts to preemptively remove a person from the ballot anticipates that Congress will not relieve such a disability. As a matter of realpolitik, perhaps this prognostication is sound. But as a matter of constitutional authority, this prediction denies the people the practical ability to vote for a candidate who would have been otherwise eligible and would have been able to hold the position should Congress have granted a Section 3 amnesty. (For this reason, any ballot-access challenges in court based on Section 3 would be categorically unripe-- the disqualification would only begin after the person actually holds or attempts to execute the duties of the covered position.)

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Consider a far more mundane example. Article I, Section 2 provides that a Representative "when elected, [shall] be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." In practice, this provision means that a candidate must be an inhabitant of a state on election day.[278] But that requirement does not attach at any earlier point--not when the candidate declares his candidacy, not when a primary election is held, and not when the general election ballots are printed. The inhabitancy requirement only kicks in when the representative is "elected" on election day. Under the rule in U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton, it would be unconstitutional for a state to require a candidate to be an inhabitant of that state prior to election day, in order to appear on the ballot. Such a state law would be adding additional qualifications for holding a congressional seat.

Section 3 applies even further down the road--not on election day, but at the instant in which a disqualified person attempts to hold the covered position. This argument is supported by the text of the qualifications in Article I and the text of the restrictions in Section 3: these provisions begin with the phrase "No person shall be. . . ."[279] The qualifications in Section 3 track the qualifications in Article I. In our view, both sets of qualifications, which use similar language, only apply when the elected official's constitutional term begins.[280] And, in our view, both sets of qualifications should be tested (at earliest) when the member-elect's constitutional term begins, or when Congress first meets (which may be after the beginning of the constitutional term), or as late as when the member-elect seeks to take his oath of office. By contrast, Article II does not state "No person shall be"—that is hold—[278] See Schaefer v. Townsend, 215 F.3d 1031, 1037 (9th Cir. 2000), cert denied sub nom. Jones v. Schaefer, 532 U.S. 904 (2001) ("California's requirement that candidates to the House of Representatives reside within the state before election violates the Constitution by handicapping the class of nonresident candidates who otherwise satisfy the Qualifications Clause." (emphasis omitted)).

---

[279] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 ("No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.") (emphasis added); U.S. CONST. art. I, § 3, cl. 3 ("No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."); U.S. CONST. am. XIV, § 3 ("No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State . . . .").

[280] See supra Part I.B.3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

a position. But rather, in two places, the text refers to a person being eligible for the position.[281] Eligible could mean either "eligible to hold office," and so function like the qualifications in Article I, or it could mean "eligible to be elected to office."[282] We think that the different language used in Article I and Article II suggests that these phrases have different meaning. As a result, the Article II eligibility standards would take effect at the time of the election, and not at the start of the president-elect's constitutional term or when the president-elect chooses to take his oath after the start of his term. As a result, a presidential candidate who is 34 years old on election day would never be eligible for the presidency. However, when we are dealing with a Section 3 disqualification, as applied to the presidency, we are not dealing with the Article II language of eligibility, but rather with the Article I language of No person shall be. And those requirements kick in much later.

We will assume for present purposes that a Section 3 disqualification extends to the Presidency. With this assumption in place, any potential disqualification would only arise on inauguration day, that is, at the start of the president's four-year term. And it is impossible for state election officials to know whether Congress would waive the disability if the candidate won the election. We imagine that if a disqualified candidate in fact was actually elected President, there would be some significant pressure on Congress to remove that disability. But we cannot be certain that such pressure would in conjunction with the candidate's own party members amount to two-thirds of both houses of Congress.

Enforcing Section 3 through ballot access would, in effect, add an additional requirement beyond those stated in the Fourteenth Amendment: that is, such a purported Section 3 disqualification would apply to a person seeking the presidency before inauguration day. Powell v. McCormack and Term Limits held that Congress and the [281] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5 ("No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.") (emphasis added).

---

[282] Compare, e.g., Carson v. McPhetridge, 15 Ind. 327, 331 (Ind. 1860) ("The term eligible, as used in our Constitution, relates to capacity . . . of being elected to, an office."), with Brady v. Howe, 50 Miss. 607, 626 (1874) (defining "eligibility" in the state constitution as a "disqualification . . . is "to take and hold" a position), with State ex rel. Schuet v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, 99 (1871) ("The term 'ineligible' means as well disqualification to hold an office, as disqualification to be elected to an office.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

States cannot add additional qualifications for members of Congress. These cases did not have occasion to consider whether additional qualifications can be added for presidential candidates.[283] However, the lower courts have extended the holding of Powell to the qualifications for the presidency in Article II. Chief Judge Posner wrote that Congress could not modify the requirement "that the President [must] be at least 35 years old . . . ."[284] Derek Muller observed, "courts have occasionally treated the holding in U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, which found the qualifications for members of Congress enumerated in the Constitution as exclusive, applicable to presidential elections, too."[285] Recently, California attempted to require presidential candidates to submit their tax returns, but this policy was ruled unconstitutional.[286] And the Arizona legislature passed a bill that would require presidential candidates to submit a birth certificate, but that bill was vetoed.[287]

There is another reason why such prognostication is constitutionally problematic: Congress retains the power to lift a Section 3 disability even after inauguration day. The Twentieth Amendment provides that "if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified." This provision expressly contemplates that the President-elect may not be qualified to hold office but may later become qualified. Again, assuming that a Section 3 disability extends to a person holding the office of the President, Congress could relieve that disability at any time during a President-elect's four-year term. Once the disability is relieved, under the Twentieth Amendment, the President-elect would become the President. The operation of the Twentieth Amendment strongly suggests that the States cannot 283 Our analysis above focuses solely on the Section 3 qualifications, rather than the differently worded eligibility standards set out in Article II and the Twelfth Amendment. Section 3's language tracks Article I's qualifications language, and not Article II's and the Twelfth Amendment's eligibility language.

---

284 Herman v. Local 1011, United Steelworkers of Am., 207 F.3d 924, 925 (7th Cir. 2000).

285 Derek T. Muller, Scrutinizing Federal Electoral Qualifications, 90 IND. L.J. 559, 571 (2015) (footnotes omitted).

286 Stephanie Becker & Kate Sullivan, California Supreme Court Says Law Requiring Presidential Candidates to Turn over Tax Returns Is Invalid, CNN (Nov. 21, 2019, 2:57 PM), https://www.cnn.com/2019/11/21/politics/california-tax-returns-trump/index.html

287 Derek Muller, 2011 Flashback: Could Arizona Determine Whether Presidential Candidates Were "Natural Born Citizens"?, ELECTION L. BLOG (Sept. 14, 2023, 12:52 PM), https://electionlawblog.org/?p=138710

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

preclude a candidate from appearing on the ballot simply because he may or may face a Section 3 disability on election day.

Again, consider a far more mundane example. Assume a prevailing presidential candidate is elected who is thirty-four years old on inauguration day. At that time, the Vice President can act as the President. And, once the President-elect turns thirty five, he can be sworn in as President. This waiting game works so long as the President-elect will turn thirty-five at some point during his four-year term. By similar logic, a person disqualified under Section 3, who is not qualified on inauguration day, could become qualified at any point before his term ends. But to draw a contrast, this process would not work for a presidential candidate who was not a natural born citizen, or who would be below the age of thirty-one on inauguration day. It would be impossible (absent a constitutional amendment having retroactive effect) for that candidate to ever become qualified during the four-year term for which he was elected.

In short, if Term Limits extends to the presidency, then the States cannot disqualify a presidential candidate from appearing on the ballot based on a (purported) Section 3 disqualification. But there may be some other vehicle by which a State could engineer the same result.

(4) What about a hypothetical state law that restricts who electors can vote for?

There is another approach by which a State could attempt to block a candidate who is (purportedly) disqualified under Section 3 from being awarded the state's electoral votes. And this approach could be framed in such a way as to avoid the question of whether Section 3 is self-executing. Indeed, this approach may not have to rely on Section 3 at all. This approach begins with two provisions of the Constitution of 1788 that gave the States power to regulate elections of federal officials.

First, the Congressional Elections Clause provides, "The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators."[288] The Congressional Elections Clause affords the States some latitude regarding the "Manner of holding Elections" for congressional races. For example, Moore v. Harper observed that this provision gave the

[288] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 4, cl. 1.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

States discretion to hold elections by ballot or by voice vote.[289] But Congress retains the power to alter any regulations the state adopts concerning congressional elections, with the exception of the places of choosing Senators.

Second, the Presidential Electors Clause provides, "Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the congress."[290] If the Congressional Elections Clause gave the states some latitude, the Presidential Electors Clause gave the States a similar, and, perhaps, broader power. And unlike the Congressional Election Clause, Congress may not "make or alter such Regulations" for appointing electors. McPherson v. Blacker observed that the Presidential Electors Clause "was manifestly used as conveying the broadest power of determination" in appointing electors.[291] And Bush v. Gore described "the state legislature's power to select the manner for appointing electors [as] plenary."[292] Indeed, this provision gave the States the power to direct the appointment of electors without regard to the people casting any votes.[293] In the early Republic, some state legislatures directly chose their state's electors.[294] The South Carolina legislature continued to appoint its electors through 1860, and nothing in the Constitution would prevent a state from returning to this practice.[295]

Can the President Electors Clause be used as a manner to enforce qualifications for the presidency? (Again, we will assume for argument's sake that a Section 3 disqualification extends to the Presidency.) Professor Derek Muller contended that under the Presidential Electors Clause, the States have even greater latitude regarding the "Manner" of appointing presidential electors. He wrote that "because the legislatures may choose the manner by which it selects its electors, it follows that it may restrict the discretion of the election process through an ex ante examination of candidates'

---

289 600 U.S. 1, 25–26 (2023).

290 U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 2.

291 146 U.S. 1, 27 (1892).

292 531 U.S. 98, 104 (2000).

293 McPherson,146 U.S. at 25 (accepting as a premise that "the legislature possesses plenary authority to direct the manner of appointment, and might itself exercise the appointing power by joint ballot or concurrence of the two houses, or according to such mode as designated").

294 Id. at 29.

295 Id at 32.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

qualifications."[296] We do not think that Muller suggests that the Presidential Electors Clause expressly delegates to the States the power to determine whether a presidential candidate meets the requisite qualifications. Rather, this authority is granted implicitly. Given the fact that the States have the greater power to direct the appointment of electors without regard to the people casting any votes, the States have the lesser power to present to voters only qualified candidates. In other words, the "manner" of appointing electors may include the power to remove from the ballot electors pledged to a presidential candidate who does not meet the constitutional qualifications. To our knowledge, no state has a law on the books that bars from the ballot electors who are pledged to a presidential candidate who is disqualified under Section 3.[297]

Would such a hypothetical statute have a Term Limits problem? Again, the Section 3 disqualification only kicks in when a person attempts to hold a covered position--and not a moment sooner. With regard to the President (assuming the Presidency is covered by Section 3), that disqualification would begin on inauguration day–at the earliest. The electors, however, are appointed prior to inauguration day, and prior to the joint session of Congress that tabulates the electors' votes. It seems to follow from Thornton that this hypothetical state law would be adding additional qualifications--that is, under Thornton, a mere candidate or president-elect, cannot be disqualified by Section 3, prior to actually holding the office. Of course, here the restriction is applied against the electors and not against the candidate.

We think this argument is likely correct, but we hesitate slightly because of Chiafalo v. Washington. That case held that the States have [296] Muller, supra note 285, at 604. See also Derek T. Muller, Weaponizing the Ballot, 48 FLA. ST. U. L. REV. 61, 104–05 (2020) ("The 'manner' in presidential elections need not be exercised by the people as other constitutional provisions command, because the states choose the mode of appointment. The state may add qualifications to the office of presidential elector. The state may fix the qualifications of the voters. And the state might investigate the qualifications of candidates.").

---

[297] Indiana Law provides that an elector can be disqualified under Section 3, but the statute says nothing about whom the elector can vote for. IN Code § 3-8-1-6 (2021)("Sec. 6. (a) A candidate for the office of President or Vice President of the United States must have the qualifications provided in Article 2, Section 1, clause 4 of the Constitution of the United States. (b) A candidate for the office of presidential elector or alternate presidential elector must have the qualifications provided in Article 2, Section 1, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States and Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."). [Seth: PLEASE CHECK] broad power to place conditions on the votes of electors.[298] We do know know to what extent Chiafalo may have limited the applicability of the Term Limits doctrine with regard to presidential electors. Again, a State can direct the appointment of electors without even holding an election. And a state can direct their electors to vote for the particular candidate to whom they are pledged. Given all that, does it stand to reason that the States can exercise the lesser power of limiting the types of candidates that electors can vote for?

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Consider a state statute that bars an electors from casting a vote for, or being pledged to, a candidate, who: (1) is not thirty-five years old on election day; (2) was not born in a state or federal territory;[299] (3) failed to produce a long-form birth certificate;[300] (4) failed to provide all federal and state tax returns over the past decade;[301] (5) engaged in conduct that would trigger a Section 3 disqualification; or (6) was indicted in a federal or state court.[302]

Would any or all of these restrictions be valid under Chiafalo? Indeed, none of these restrictions would turn on the nuances of Section 3 or self-execution. A State is simply regulating how its electors cast their votes. And if it would be illegal for electors to vote for a particular candidate, then a State would also likely have the power to remove that 298 See, e.g., Chiafalo v. Washington, 140 S. Ct. 2316, 2324 (2020) ("And the power to appoint an elector (in any manner) includes power to condition his appointment—that is, to say what the elector must do for the appointment to take effect."); id. at 2324 ("And nothing in the Constitution expressly prohibits States from taking away presidential electors' voting discretion as Washington does. The Constitution is barebones about electors."); id. ("Or—so long as nothing else in the Constitution poses an obstacle—a State can add, as Washington did, an associated condition of appointment: It can demand that the elector actually live up to his pledge, on pain of penalty. Which is to say that the State's appointment power, barring some outside constraint, enables the enforcement of a pledge like Washington's."); id. ("Article II includes only the instruction to each State to appoint, in whatever way it likes, as many electors as it has Senators and Representatives (except that the State may not appoint members of the Federal Government).").

---

299 This statute would have excluded two recent presidential candidates: Senator John McCain, who was born in the Panama Canal Zone, and Senator Ted Cruz, who was born in Canada.

300 There were attempts to disqualify President Obama from the ballot on this ground.

301 California attempted to impose a similar qualification on presidential candidates (President Trump in particular) but did not attempt to impose the restriction on whom the electors could vote for.

302 This restriction would not require any factual determinations. A court could simply take notice of a federal or state indictment; no conviction would be necessary.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

particular candidate from the ballot altogether. After all, when voters cast a vote for a presidential candidate, they are really voting for a slate of electors. The candidate's name is merely a proxy for that slate. Would this approach be valid? We admit the answers to these questions are unclear after Chiafalo. Our view is that the better answer is that Term Limits should preclude each statute, but this result is hardly clear.

6. Baude and Paulsen argue that Chase violated judicial norms in announcing his colleagues' views.

Griffin's Case was decided in a very different time. In the 1860s, members of the Supreme Court still rode circuit. Indeed, a Circuit Justice could hear a case twice—first on the circuit, and again if the case was certified for Supreme Court review. And going back to the Marshall Court, members of the Supreme Court would often discuss how to resolve pending cases on the circuit, in an effort to promote inter-circuit uniformity. This context helps to explain an aspect of Chase's opinion that Baude and Paulsen ridicule.

In Griffin's Case, Chief Justice Chase stated that he was "authorized to say" that all of his colleagues on the Supreme Court concurred "that a person convicted by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, can not be properly discharged upon habeas corpus."[303] Chase's colleagues did not opine on Chase's broader and important self-execution position, nor did they opinion on the De Facto Officer doctrine per se. All they agreed to was Chase's views on the narrow question of the scope of the habeas remedy. Baude and Paulsen misread what Chase was conveying with this statement. Moreover, Baude and Paulsen charged that Chase violated some unwritten judicial ethics norm. Finally, Baude and Paulsen do not acknowledge that in 1899, the Supreme Court favorably quoted Chase's opinion on this exact point. None of those later Justices were troubled by Chase's opinion or that he communicated the views of his colleagues. Chase's purported breach of judicial norms escaped any criticism until 2020. Indeed, to this day, circuit court judges routinely circulate draft opinions to their colleagues, to flag potential issues that warrant attention. Baude and Paulsen failed to establish that Chase did anything wrong in 1869.

---

[303] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 27 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

a. Baude and Paulsen's criticism of Chase's announcement

The issues raised by Griffin with regard to the federal habeas statute would not be limited to his case. Similar arguments were already being advanced in many other contexts. The judiciary was no doubt aware of how these issues could arise on collateral review. In his opinion, Chief Justice Chase addressed this question. Chase wrote:

> This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term, with reference to this and kindred cases in this district, and I am authorized to say that they unanimously concur in the opinion that a person convicted by a judge de facto acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, can not be properly discharged upon habeas corpus.[304]

In discussing this passage, Baude and Paulsen wrote:

> Chase represented that the full Supreme Court unanimously agreed with him that on the de facto officer question. "This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term," Chase asserted, "with reference to this and kindred cases in this district." The full Court had apparently decided the de facto officer question, in secret, without having announced the fact in any case decision or written opinion in some form of advisory preemptive appellate jurisdiction!?
>
> To be sure, judicial norms were looser back then, but the whole thing was highly irregular even by the standards of the day. Charles Fairman, whose account defends the whole affair as an urgent workaround to stop Judge Underwood, nonetheless acknowledges that "[i]t was most unusual to hear a Justice on circuit declare that he was authorized to announce the opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Court on a matter pending in the Circuit Court." Fairman further acknowledges technical problems with this maneuver, because the only issue in front of the full Court was an original writ

304 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> of prohibition in Ex Parte State of Virginia, where the Court had granted a stay despite manifest procedural flaws. Somehow the Court's non-ruling in a dubious vehicle became a second-hand advisory opinion on a legal question of great importance.[305]

First, let's correct a few points. (At this juncture, it may be helpful to review the final four paragraphs of Chase's opinion, which we discussed in Part II.A above.) The argument at issue here, i.e., the argument Chase's colleagues agreed to, relates to the scope of habeas relief. That is the argument developed in Paragraph [3]. Chase's colleagues did not opine on Chase's broader and important self-execution position developed prior to and in Paragraph [1]. Likewise, Chase's colleagues did not agree to Chase's partially developed discussion relating to the De Facto Officer doctrine in Paragraph [2]. All they agreed to was Chase's views on the narrow question of the scope of the habeas remedy. Contra Baude and Paulsen: this was not a wholesale adoption by the Court's members of the De Facto Officer doctrine. And contra Baude and Paulsen, this was not "a legal question of great importance,"[306] particularly because it in no way addressed whether officers in Judge Sheffey's position could be removed in habeas proceedings. According to Chase, they cannot. Here, we think Baude and Paulsen misread Chase.

Second, Chase did not state that the Supreme Court "decided" this issue in the "last term." That's reading too much into the text. Rather, Chase stated that the "judges of the Supreme Court" gave the issue "consideration" at the last term. Judges can have views on legal issues; they can discuss those issues in chambers and in conference, and they can make those views public. It is desirable that they do so. Here, the other Justices gave Chase permission to announce their views. If Griffin's Case could have been appealed to the Supreme Court, then it would have been less than cautious for the other Justices to have voiced their views in this fashion. But, as Baude and Paulsen acknowledge in a footnote, Griffin's Case was not subject to appeal to the Supreme Court. (We discussed this statute, which was analyzed in Ex Parte McCardle, above.) In effect, the other Justices expressed a view on an abstract legal issue, not connected to any one specific case, and Chase reported their views in his Griffin's Case opinion. Moreover, the other Justices shared their views without opining on the specific facts of Griffin's Case. They gave Chase permission to share their [305] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 46–47 (footnotes omitted).

---

[306] Id. at 47.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

views on a legal issue which had been discussed during the prior Supreme Court term, and not in relation to the specific facts before Chase.

There is evidence going back to the Marshall Court that circuit Justices would often discuss pending cases with each other. Gerard Magliocca published a definitive treatment of Justice Bushrod Washington, including discussion of his practices while riding circuit. Magliocca wrote, "When the justices were uncertain about how to resolve their circuit cases, they would turn to one another for help."[307] Specifically, "Many such letters were exchanged among Chief Justice Marshall, Justice Joseph Story, and Justice Washington."[308] Magliocca points to one letter from John Marshall to Bushrod Washington, in which, apparently, Washington persuaded Marshall to change his approach on a pending case.[309] Chief Justice Chase also engaged in this practice, while riding circuit. In June 1869, Chase sent a letter from Richmond to Justice Nathan Clifford about federal habeas corpus law.[310]

Magliocca suggests that "this sort of communication might be deemed improper, in that another justice was not part of the circuit court that heard the arguments." Even assuming Magliocca's criticism is correct, it is not on-point in regard to Chase's correspondence with his colleagues. Here, Chase was discussing his colleagues' views on an abstract legal issue, apart from the specific facts and parties before him, and that abstract legal issue had received consideration by the court's members before, and would certainly arise again. Furthermore, Magliocca points out that "[p]art of the motivation for these inquiries was to make circuit decisions uniform without resorting to Supreme Court review, though sometimes these exchanges made clear that the

---

307 GERARD MAGLIOCCA, WASHINGTON'S HEIR: THE LIFE OF JUSTICE BUSHROD WASHINGTON 88 (2022).

308 Id.

309 Letter from John Marshall to Bushrod Washington (July 13, 1821), in PAPERS OF JOHN MARSHALL DIGITAL EDITION (Charles Hobson ed.) ("I thank you for the opinion you have been so good as to give me in the case on which I consulted you. I have from the first thought it doubtful but shall decide it in conformity with your opinion.").

310 Letter from Salmon P. Chase to Justice Nathan Clifford (June 22, 1869), in 5 THE SALMON P. CHASE PAPERS: CORRESPONDENCE, 1865–1873, at 309 (John Niven ed., 1998) ("I find no instance in which a justice of the Supreme Court has ever allowed a writ of habeas corpus to bring before him a person imprisoned in any district not included in any district not included in the circuit to which he was allotted.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Supreme Court needed to hear arguments on a tough issue."[311] Indeed, that is akin to what Chase was trying to do—to publicize the already-existing uniformity amongst the various Circuit Justices.

Finally, a contemporary press account found nothing to criticize about Chase reporting the view of his colleagues.[312] We have been unable to find anyone at the time who thought this part of the opinion was improper.

b. The Supreme Court in 1899 favorably quoted Chase's opinion on the very ethical issue raised by Baude and Paulsen

Baude and Paulsen think Chase's and his colleagues' transparency is somehow objectionable. Is it? It is well known that the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit circulates draft opinions to other circuit judges, that is, to judges who are not on the panel charged with "deciding" the case before the appellate court. Magliocca, who clerked on the Second Circuit, observed that the correspondences between Justice Washington and his colleagues was "similar to the way that some modern circuits operate when judges seek revisions to panel opinions rather than calling for an en banc hearing of the full circuit court."[313]

The judges on a Second Circuit panel exchange e-mails and memoranda with their non-panel colleagues. And the panel judges very well may revise their draft opinion in response to what they receive. Indeed, that's the purpose of this process. And in some cases, an opinion will note that en banc review was or was not triggered. What is done here is not in public, and it is not well documented. But it is the practice of federal judges, and several other circuits have practices similar to Second Circuit practice.[314] This is basically what Chase did. He discussed a legal issue with colleagues, and he reserved the ultimate decision for himself. The difference between what Chase did, in 1869, and Second Circuit practice, today, is that Chase was transparent and 311 MAGLIOCCA, supra note 307, at 88.

---

312 BALTIMORE SUN, May 12, 1869 ("The Chief Justice stated, in the conclusion of his opinion, that the subject received the consideration of the judges of the Supreme Court at the last term with reference to this and kindred cases in that district, and he was authorized to say that they unanimously concurred in the opinion that a person convicted by a jury, and sentenced in court held by a judge de facto, acting under color of office . . . cannot properly be discharged upon habeas corpus.").

313 MAGLIOCCA, supra note 307, at 88 n.82.

314 See generally Neal Devins & Allison Orr Larsen, Weaponizing En Banc, 96 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1373 (2021).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

documented what he and his colleagues had done. Yet Baude and Paulsen would fault Chase? For what? For improving on today's practice?

There is a further reason why Baude and Paulsen's criticism of the Chase Court misses the mark. The Supreme Court favorably cited Chase's discussion of the views of his colleagues.

In Ex parte Ward (1899), Chief Justice Fuller, for a unanimous Court, held:

> We need not, however, consider the elaborate argument of counsel in this behalf, since we regard the well-settled rule applicable here, that where a court has jurisdiction of an offense and of the accused, and the proceedings are otherwise regular, a conviction is lawful, although the judge holding the court may be only an officer de facto, and that the validity of the title of such judge to the office, or his right to exercise the judicial functions, cannot be determined on a writ of habeas corpus. In Griffin's Case, Chase, 364, 425, Fed. Cas. No. 5,815, this was so ruled, and Mr. Chief Justice Chase said: 'This subject received the consideration of the judges of the supreme court at the last term, with reference to this and kindred cases in this district; and I am authorized to say that they unanimously concur in the opinion that a person convicted by a judge de facto, acting under color of office, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, cannot be properly discharged upon habeas corpus.'[315]

Baude and Paulsen do not cite Ex parte Ward in their article. Baude and Paulsen do not cite Ex parte Ward in regard to the scope of the habeas remedy. And Baude and Paulsen do not cite Ex parte Ward in relation to their discussion of Chase's and his colleague's ethics in Griffin's Case.

We do not reproduce this passage to illustrate that the rule of law announced by Chase as to the scope of the habeas remedy remained good law in 1899, some 30 years later. (It did.) Instead, we reproduce

---

[315] Ex parte Ward, 173 U.S. 452, 454–55 (1899).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

this passage because it shows that a successor Supreme Court saw nothing wrongful with Chase's reporting his colleagues' views. Indeed, Chief Justice Fuller not only quotes Chief Justice Chase's view on the scope of the habeas remedy, but he also quotes Chase's announcing his (Chase's) colleagues' views. Fuller would hardly do that if he thought Chase and his colleagues had acted wrongfully.

The practices discussed above by the Second Circuit, and in Ward, arise in the context of judicial decision-making. Even outside this context, there is a tradition of the Chief Justice of the United States articulating the views of his colleagues on issues of national importance. In 1937, the Senate Judiciary Committee invited Chief Justice Hughes to testify about President Roosevelt's Court packing bill.[316] Hughes declined to testify in person. Rather, he intended to submit a letter that would be signed by all nine Justices. But he was only able to secure approval from two other members: Justice Brandeis (the leader of the Court's liberal wing) and Justice Van Devanter (one of the four conservative horsemen). Hughes wrote in his letter to the Senate:

> I have not been able to consult with the members of the Court generally with respect to the foregoing statement, but I am confident that it is in accord with the views of the justices. I should say, however, that I have been able to consult with Mr. Justice Van Devanter and Mr. Justice Brandeis, and I am at liberty to say that the statement is approved by them.[317]

Hughes's letter opined on the constitutionality of the bill. He suggested that cases must be heard by all members of the Court, and not, as the bill would require, by "divisions" or panels. Hughes wrote, "The Constitution does not appear to authorize two or more Supreme Courts or two or more parts of a Supreme Court functioning in effect as separate courts."[318]

For generations, Hughes's letter has been praised as an act of judicial statesmanship. He opined on a matter of pressing concern, in a timely fashion. He also weighed in on the constitutionality of a provision of the bill. Unable to quickly obtain the views of all of his

---

316 See Richard D. Friedman, Chief Justice Hughes' Letter on Court-Packing, 22 J. SUP. CT. HIST. 76, 79 (1997), https://core.ac.uk/download/pdf/232690607.pdf.

317 Text of Hughes Letter, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 23, 1937, at 1, https://perma.cc/4PG7-59ZK.

318 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

colleagues, Hughes stated that the entire Court would likely agree with him. He may not have been correct. Indeed, Professor Friedman suggests that Hughes "expressed more confidence than he was entitled to, for the Brethren certainly were not unanimous in approving his statement on the constitutionality of separate panels."[319] According to Friedman, Stone and Cardozo disagreed with the message, but remained silent at the next conference, because the letter was already public. Hughes went out on a limb, and did not accurately express the views of his colleagues. Yet the letter was instrumental in halting the Court packing plan. The letter was published on the front page of the New York Times. More recently, Chief Justice Roberts sent a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee concerning potential ethics reform on the Supreme Court. Roberts suggested that legislation imposing an ethics code on the Supreme Court would be unconstitutional.[320] It is not clear if all of his colleagues agreed to that statement.[321] Roberts also "attach[ed] a Statement of Ethics Principles and Practices to which all of the current Members of the Court subscribe."[322] Hughes and Roberts follow a tradition of Chief Justices who articulated the views of their colleagues on matters of national importance outside of judicial decision-making.

c. Chase's purported breach of judicial norms escaped any criticism until 2020

If Baude and Paulsen were correct here, and Chase's reporting his colleagues' views was a violation of some judicial norm or ethical rule, then one would think that Chase's contemporaries and later commentators would have had something to say on this issue. Did any judges, state or federal, or former Justices chastise or criticize Chase and his colleagues? Members of the bar? Academics? Members of Congress? The press? Anyone at all? The only criticism reported by 319 Friedman, supra note 316, 82.

---

320 Letter from Chief Justice John G. Roberts, Jr. to Senator Richard J. Durbin (Apr. 25, 2023), https://int.nyt.com/data/documenttools/supreme-court-ethics-durbin/cf67ef8450ea024d/full.pdf.

321 Josh Blackman, Chief Justice Roberts's Letter to Senator Durbin, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (April 26, 2023, 5:39 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/04/26/chief-justice-robertss-letter-to-senator-durbin/.

322 Josh Blackman, The Supreme Court's Statement of Ethics Principles and Practices, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (April 27, 2023, 12:45 AM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/04/27/the-supreme-courts-statement-of-ethics-principles-and-practices/.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen of Chase's Griffin's Case opinion is Trump-era and post-Trump-era criticism. And the only prior critique of Chase, on this issue, which Baude and Paulsen point to is from Professor Charles Fairman, writing in 1971. Fairman offered the tepid critique that Chase's announcement was "unusual."[323] We think Baude and Paulsen erred by casually eliding from "unusual" to "irregular." That something happens infrequently does not make it improper or a violation of judicial ethics.

In any event, Fairman actually defended Chase's decision to state the views of his colleagues.[324] Fairman acknowledged that Chase's announcement was "unusual," but "the occasion was unusual."[325] Here, District Judge Underwood had ordered the release of several prisoners based on the argument that judges who presided over their cases were disqualified by Section 3. And, more importantly, Underwood attempted to insulate his rulings from review by deciding the cases alone in the Circuit Court, and while Chase was absent. With this approach, there could not be a certificate of division, so a case could not be certified to the Supreme Court. This strategy did not go unnoticed by the third-parties in the press.[326] In January 1869, Chase wrote to Underwood, asking him to wait till Chase arrived in Richmond, rather than proceeding to decide the cases by himself.[327]

Although we do not adopt Fairman's position, Baude and Paulsen cite Fairman as authority. Fairman supported Chase's conduct. Fairman observed, "Here a District Judge, persisting in an abuse of power, was menacing the authority of the State judiciary." Fairman wrote that "prompt action was needed," as all of the "Justices were clear that the District Judge was wrong."[328] And Chase's expressing the views of his colleagues was such prompt action. According to Fairman, "the Court took this direct way to assert its supervisory power and put an end to the mischief" by Judge Underwood.[329] Baude and Paulsen charge Chase with violating judicial norms. However, Chase, his 323 CHARLES FAIRMAN, RECONSTRUCTION AND REUNION 1864-88, PART ONE 607 (1971).

---

324 Id. at 607.

325 Id.

326 Id. at 604.

327 Id. at 604 ("If any such application has been made I will join you in hearing it. It may be heard here if you can attend. If not let it be postponed till I can come to Richmond.").

328 Id. at 607.

329 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

colleagues, and Fairman, agreed that this statement was an appropriate response to Underwood's (purported) misbehavior. At the end of the day, Fairman was no critic of Chase.

The January 1869 letter was not Chase's first attempt to reach out to Underwood concerning his rulings and with Underwood's efforts to insulate his rulings from review. In November 1868, Chase had already sent a letter to Underwood on the same topic.[330] Chase asked Underwood, "would it not be best to postpone the decision till next week & then we can confer on the subject." Chase explained that an 1866 statute restricted when the Circuit Court could hold terms in Richmond.[331] Specifically, under the statute, only the Chief Justice could adjourn terms. Yet, Chase pointed out that Underwood, absent authorization from Chase, was "holding, doubtless, an adjourned term, and the legality of it becomes important."[332] Fairman saw nothing objectionable about the substance, or tenor of Chase's letter. And neither do we.

How do Baude and Paulsen describe this November 1868 letter? They charge, "Chief Justice Chase then wrote to Underwood with a 'veiled threat,' floating the possibility that a recent statute could be interpreted to deprive Underwood of his ability to hold the circuit court . . . ."[333] Baude and Paulsen recharacterization of a legal discussion between judges sharing circuit court duties does not withstand scrutiny. There was no threat, veiled or otherwise. Certainly, Fairman did not characterize Chase's conduct in such terms. We see no indication that Chase's contemporaries or later historians have viewed Chase's conduct as anything other than correct.

Again, Chase expressed the view that Underwood acted without authority by hearing cases during an adjourned session of the Circuit Court. Chase argued that Underwood's adjourning the session might not be lawful, and that the statute required the Chief Justice to adjourn the session. Baude and Paulsen do not say Chase was wrong on the law. Indeed, Fairman suggests Chase was right on the law. If Chase was right, how was his conferring with Underwood anything like a "threat"? Perhaps ironically, if Underwood had held court during an adjourned

---

330 Id. at 603–04.

331 Id. at 603 n.155 ("He pointed to an Act of Congress of May 21, 1866, 14 Stat. 51. That statute provided that the Circuit Court hold terms in Richmond on the first Monday in May and the fourth Monday in November; special our adjourned terms might be held 'as may be ordered and prescribed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. . . . .'").

332 Id.

333 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 36 n.122 (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

session, his actions could possibly be saved by the De Facto Officer doctrine. In those circumstances, Underwood and anyone relying on his prior judgments would assert a position ad idem with Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case. Doesn't this counterfactual suggest yet another reason to think Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case was substantially correct?

As we explained, the sources cited by Baude and Paulsen indicate that Chase asked for Underwood to modify his practice so that both Chase and Underwood could evaluate the decision for the Circuit Court on appeal, and that would allow the Circuit Court to issue a certificate of division to the Supreme Court. Chase was trying to assist appellate review; Underwood was trying to frustrate it. Again, modern readers may think it strange that a Chief Justice would ever have any correspondences with an inferior court judge. But in the 1860s, the Circuit Justice would routinely hold court with the District Judge. They worked together, and necessarily, had to have discussions on this and many other procedural issues relating to Circuit Court administration and practice. There is nothing inappropriate here—and certainly not a veiled threat.

d. Griffin's Case has been cited repeatedly without criticism for more than 150 years

We criticize Baude and Paulsen's critique of Griffin's Case. Their assertion that the Chief Justice violated ethical norms and that he threatened Judge Underwood is, at best, hyperbole. Our critique relates to these points, but they are equally apt in relation to all too many of the substantive critiques Baude and Paulsen put forward in relation to Chase's Griffin's Case opinion. Baude and Paulsen only tell one side of a complex story, and they do so in hyperbolic terms.

Baude and Paulsen take the position that Chase is wrong on the self-execution issue, wrong on the habeas issue, wrong on judicial ethics, and wrong on just about everything (or nearly everything) else. If there is any point Baude and Paulsen suggest Chase decided correctly, we missed it.

Again, they speak of Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case with the same scorn that Charles Sumner derided Chief Justice Taney, who had been discredited for his Dred Scott opinion. If Baude and Paulsen are correct, one would think that they could point to multiple, independent, substantive critiques of Griffin's Case from the 150-plus years between 1869 and 2020—including judicial decisions–aligning with their views. But Baude and Paulsen do not point to any such string of authorities. And that's a tell. Albeit, we acknowledge that the intellectual landscape began to shift during and after Trump's term.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But, prior to 2020, courts, federal, state, and foreign have cited Chase's decision in Griffin's Case for many (perhaps all) of its major legal positions. We see no report of any pre-2021 case citing it otherwise than favorably. We already mentioned how the Supreme Court favorably cited Griffin's Case in Ex Parte Ward.[334] There are many more such citations. Griffin's Case has been cited for the proposition that Section 3 was not self-executing.[335] Griffin's Case has been cited in regard to habeas law.[336] Griffin's Case was cited in regard to constitutional construction.[337] Griffin's Case was cited in regard to legislative or statutory construction.[338] Griffin's Case was cited in regard to the status of West Virginia and Virginia during and after the Civil War.[339] Griffin's Case was cited in regard to the De Facto Officer

---

334 See Ex parte Ward, 173 U.S. 452, 455 (1899).

335 See Cale v. City of Covington, 586 F.2d 311, 316 (4th Cir. 1978) (citing Griffin's Case for its sword-&-shield reasoning); In re Brosnahan, 18 F. 62, 81 n.73 (C.C.W.D. Mo. 1883) (McCrary, J., concurring) (same); State v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599, 616 (Ala. 1875) (Stone, J.) (same); see also Va. Op. Att'y Gen. No. 21-003, at 3 (2021)("[T]he weight of authority appears to be that Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is not 'self-executing'—put another way, it is possible that Congress may need to pass implementing legislation to make this provision operative." (citing Griffin's Case)), https://www.oag.state.va.us/files/Opinions/2021/21-003-Carter-issued-1-22-21.pdf.

336 Daniels v. Towers, 7 S.E. 120, 121–22 (Ga. 1887) (Bleckley, C.J.) (citing Griffin's Case favorably in regard to its habeas holding); In re Sheehan, 122 Mass. 445, 449 (1877) (Gray, C.J.) (same).

337 Edye v. Robertson (The Head-Money Cases), 18 F. 135, 143 n.26 (C.C.E.D. N.Y. 1883) (Blatchford, Justice) (citing Griffin's Case in regard to constitutional construction), aff'd, 112 U.S. 580 (1884); Duane v. City of Philadelphia, 185 A. 401, 403 (Pa. 1936) (Kephart, C.J.) (same); Coyle v. Smith, 113 P. 944, 948 (Okla. 1911) (Williams, J.) (same).

338 Ex parte Klune, 240 P. 286, 287 (Mont. 1925) (Callaway, C.J.) (citing Griffin's Case in regard to statutory construction); Brooke v. Turner, 30 S.E. 55, 56 (Va. 1898) (Riely, J.) (same); Sartain v. State, 10 Tex. Ct. App. 651, 654 (1881) (White, P.J.) (same); Deaney v. Linen Thread Co., 118 A.2d 28, 36 (N.J. 1955) (Heher, J., dissenting) (same).

339 Woodland v. Newhall's Adm'r, 31 F. 434, 439 (C.C.W.D. Va. 1887) (Paul, J.) (citing Griffin's Case for the proposition that the state government in West Virginia was the lawful and recognized government of the entire state of Virginia); Commonwealth v. Chalkley, 61 Va. (20 Gratt.) 404, 409 (1871) (Joynes, J.) (citing Griffin's Case for the proposition that the restored government of Virginia was the lawful government); In re Gunn, 32 P. 948, 955 (Kan. 1893) (Allen, J., dissenting) (citing Griffin's Case favorably for the doctrine.[340] Griffin's Case was cited in regard to oaths.[341] Griffin's Case was cited in regard to other provisions of law.[342] Griffin's Case was even cited by a foreign court.[343]

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Moreover, contemporary press accounts in 1869 praised Chase's decision. It could be expected that southern newspapers would sympathize with the decision.[344] But northern newspapers, which had no favor for former confederates, also agreed with Chase. Consider a few samples. The New York Tribune observed that Chase's decision was "mainly notable . . . and for its reversal of Judge Underwood's remarkable decision of last fall under which a general jail delivery was begun."[345] The newspaper continued, "By the construction of the Chief-Justice the ineligibility of certain judges, under the Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment, does not go to the extent of invalidating their official actions, prior to their removal from office."[346] The Baltimore Sun opined that Chase could not "have decided [the case] in any [other] way" than by "reversing the decision of the incompetent and partisan Underwood."[347] Indeed, The Chicago Tribune commended proposition that political decisions taken by the elected branches in regard to the organization of Virginia were conclusive on the courts).

---

340 Calcutt v. FDIC, 37 F.4th 293, 343 (6th Cir. 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (citing Baude and Griffin's Case, and fully expounding on the scope and history of the De Facto Officer doctrine), rev'd on other grounds, 598 U.S. 623 (2023).

341 State v. Stephens, 664 S.W.3d 293, 304 n.46 (Tex. Crim. App. 2022) (Slaughter, J., dissenting) (citing Griffin's Case for the history of congressionally imposed oaths).

342 McGovern v. Mitchell, 63 A. 433 passim (Conn. 1906) (Hamersley, J.) (citing Griffin's Case for multiple legal propositions).

343 Toronto Ry. Co. v. City of Toronto (1918), 51 D.L.R. 69 (Can. Ont. C.A.) (Meredith, C.J.O.) (citing Griffin's Case favorably in regard to habeas law), rev'd on other grounds, (J.C.P.C. 1920).

344 STAUNTON (VIRGINIA) SPECTATOR, May 18, 1869 ("The decision by Chief Justice Chase in the Caesar Griffin case is treated silently by the Radicals and argumentatively by the Democrats. The former don't care about saying anything on the subject; the latter regard it as a true and logical opinion rendered by a just and able judge, who does not swerve from the right to pamper to party prejudices.").

345 NY TRIBUNE, May 11, 1869.

346 Id.

347 BALTIMORE SUN, May 12, 1869.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Chase for avoiding politics, and deferring to Congress.[348] And there were many more such accounts.[349]

Professor Gerard Magliocca located one newspaper editorial that was critical of Griffin's Case,[350] which Professor Graber cited.[351] The editorial stated that "The report of [Chase's] opinion was not given verbatim in the papers at the time, so that it could not be said to perfectly represent the positions taken by the Chief Justice." (This piece, dated June 7, 1869, came about a month after the other newspaper articles cited above were published.) The editorial stated further, "A fuller report and a better understanding of the position he has taken may clear up his legal reasoning," but the author observed that if "the public mind should distrust [Chase's] political bias, he has only himself to thank." It is difficult to put much weight on an editorialist who didn't even read Chase's reasoning, and was partial to the theory that Chase was politically biased. Still, we don't doubt there were some other criticisms of this decision. But this editorial should be balanced against the weight of praise we have cited above.

---

348 CHICAGO TRIBUNE, May 13, 1869 ("Chief Justice Chase is holding a session of the United States Court at Richmond, Virginia, and, as usual, most of his time is occupied in reversing the decisions of the erratic Judge Underwood of that district. . . . Of course Judge Chase had to reverse this remarkable judgement and return the prisoners to the jails to which they had been condemned. The decision of the Chief Justice, though in its direct effect upon the cases before him no more than any rational person might expect, is important from the cumulative authority it gives the often-repeated, but so little understood, decision of all the courts, that in matters purely political the judiciary will always accept the action of the national legislature as final.").

349 See, e.g., NY HERALD, May 12, 1869 ("Master Underwood, the exuberant but rather empty-headed personage who is United States Judge in the district of Virginia, some time ago discovered a mare's nest. He found that certain Virginia judges were ineligible under the fourteenth amendment, and though they were left alone by the appropriate legislation, he, on his own account, proceeded to set free from Virginia jails all persons condemned by those judges. His judgements have been reviewed by Chief Justice Chase, who tells Underwood that the appropriate legislation should have been his guide, and that the decisions of de facto judges are always entitled to respect.").

350 "Justice Chase and the Fourteenth Amendment," The Bangor (Me.) Daily Whig and Courier, June 7, 1869, p. 3 (reprinting an editorial from the Boston Journal) ("The Fourteenth Amendment . . . is the sheet-anchor of our great acquisitions by the war, and too much care cannot be taken in establishing precedents for its construction, It is such inestimable guaranties as [Section One], which as some think, Judge Chase would make dependent upon the public convenience or the floundering will of a majority of Congress.").

351 Graber, supra note 118, at 10 n.44 ("Thanks to Gerard Magliocca for sharing this clipping.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Could all of these jurists and journalists have been so wrong to have relied on such a misguided decision from the Chief Justice of the United States? And how could Griffin's Case have escaped any criticism until 2020? The more likely explanation is that Baude and Paulsen misread Griffin's Case, and they failed to place the decision in its proper historical and intellectual context.

Professor Mark Graber charged that "[n]othing in the text or history of the Fourteenth Amendment provides any reason for thinking that any member of Congress or politically active citizen other than Salmon Chase . . . thought that the Thirteenth Amendment, Section One of the Fourteenth Amendment, and Section Four of the Fourteenth Amendment were self-executing, but that Section Three required implementing legislation."[352] Graber's claim really is that Salmon P. Chase was the only sentient being in the 1860s who expressed the view that Section 3 was not self-executing. We could even begin to think of the work needed to show that this sentiment was never expressed anywhere by any person during this time period. But we don't have to engage in such a herculean task. The judicial decisions that cite Chase's case with regard to self-execution suffice to prove that Graber's categorical statement is unsupported.

Graber also charged that Chief Justice Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case "is the only historical material Blackmun [sic] and Tillman present from the 1860s that supports their view that Americans when Section Three was framed did not believe that provision was self-executing." We had thought a decision from the Chief Justice of the United States from months after the amendment was ratified would be persuasive authority. But wait—there's more! Professor Graber seems to have missed two relevant statements that Professor Kurt Lash identified.[353] First, Representative Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania explained that Section 3 "would be remedied by congressional enabling legislation."[354] Stevens said that Congress "must legislate to carry out many parts of" the amendment. He added that "It will not execute itself . . ." We acknowledge that Stevens was referring to different aspects of the Fourteenth Amendment, and there were different versions of Section under consideration, but his statement is consistent with Chase's conclusion that Section 3 requires enabling legislation.

Second, Professor Lash brought forward a colloquy from the ratification debates in Pennsylvania. (As best as we can tell, Professor

---

352 Graber, supra note 118, at 10.

353 Kurt Lash, The Meaning and Ambiguity of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, https://ssrn.com/abstract=4591838 at __ 38.

354 Lash, , supra note 340, at 19.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Graber cites zero records from the ratification debates, instead focusing exclusively on debates from the Thirty-Ninth Congress.) Thomas Chalfant served in the Pennsylvania House of Representatives in 1867.[355] Professor Lash explained that Chalfant thought that "of course there would have to be some kind of trial prior to a person's disqualification" under Section 3.[356] Chalfant said, "But, you will say, and say properly, that in order to make this section of any effect whatever, the guilt must be established."[357] Lash observed that "Chalfant assumes his colleagues agree that disqualification under Section Three cannot take place absent some kind of a prior judgment regarding the person's guilt." And, that judgment would have to flow from some sort of process established by Congress. Lash, who reviewed the "hundreds of pages of debate in the Pennsylvania assembly," concluded that "no member appears to have denied Chalfant's basic assumption that Section 3 required enabling legislation."

Albeit, we are not certain if Chalfant was stating that Section 3 required enabling legislation, or whether enabling legislation would be a good policy. We lean towards the former reading, but acknowledge some uncertainty. Still, Chalfant's statement is consistent with Chase's conclusion that Section 3 requires enabling legislation.

Other commentators have endorsed Baude and Paulsen's views about Griffin's Case. Former-judge J. Michael Luttig and Professor Laurence Tribe wrote that Griffin's Case was "poorly reasoned" and "Baude and Paulsen decisively dismantle[d] Griffin as a precedent."[358] We believe that any claim that the case is "poorly reasoned" is based on a misreading of Griffin's Case. We do not suggest Griffin's Case was perfect, but, as Ex parte Ward and any number of other federal, state, and foreign cases show, it was in the mainstream of judicial thought.

We suggest that, as in court proceedings, the better practice might have been for Tribe and Luttig to have waited a reasonable amount of time for contrary views to percolate in the literature before a rush to judgment. Again, Griffin's Case is not perfect—no decision

---

355 Thomas Chalfant, ARCHIVES: PA. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, https://archives.house.state.pa.us/people/member-biography?ID=7463

356 Lash, supra note 340, at 38.

357 We thank Professor Lash for providing us a copy of Chalfant's colloquy.

358 J. Michael Luttig & Laurence H. Tribe, The Constitution Prohibits Trump from Ever Being President Again, THE ATLANTIC (Aug. 19, 2023), https://www.theatlantic.com/ideas/archive/2023/08/donald-trump-constitutionally-prohibited-presidency/675048/.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

is. But it is defensible, for the reasons we described above and for others we discuss below. To say that the case is "decisively dismantle[d]" is hyperbole, perhaps, infected by the perceived needs of today as some perceive those needs. Those immersed in the present moment should hesitate before concluding they understand the Fourteenth Amendment better than the Chief Justice who presided during that era, and generally sought to give that constitutional amendment broad effect (indeed, broader than his colleagues) in cases like The Slaughter-House Cases and Bradwell v. Illinois.

C. Griffin wielded Section 3 as a "sword"

In our view, Griffin invoked Section 3 in an offensive posture, that is, as a cause of action in support of affirmative relief, but he lacked a federal statute authorizing his doing so. We do not put this view forward as an after-the-fact invention or ahistorical gimmick which merely accommodates otherwise inconsistent or difficult to explain prior case law. Our position is that this is what Chase was saying in 1869, how he was understood, and how courts and commentators understood the Fourteenth Amendment until . . . until about 2020, and more recently, by Baude and Paulsen. For example, in Cale v. Covington (1978), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, held:

> It is true that in [T]he Civil Rights Cases [(1883)] the [Supreme] Court referred to the Fourteenth Amendment as self-executing, [and] when discussing the Fifteenth, but it is also true that earlier in the opinion, discussing s 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the [Supreme] [C]ourt stated: "in order that the national will, thus declared, may not be a mere Brutum fulmen [a mere warning without effect], the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation." The Civil Rights Cases did not overrule Ex parte Virginia, and any apparent inconsistency between the two just quoted statements in [T]he Civil Rights Cases may be resolved, we think, by reference to the protection the Fourteenth Amendment provided of its own force as a shield under the doctrine of judicial review. See the dissent of Mr. Justice Harlan in the Civil Rights Cases quoted infra. See also the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. at 81, where the Court, referring to the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, > had stated that when it is a State dealt with and not alone the validity of a State law, the matter should be left until Congress should has exercised its power or some case of State oppression by denial of equal justice in its courts claims a decision at the hands of the Supreme Court. Another early opinion, not by the Supreme Court but by Chief Justice Chase sitting as a Circuit Justice, is Griffin's Case, 11 Fed. Cases 7 (C.C.D. Va. 1869), which held that the third section of the Fourteenth Amendment, concerning disqualifications to hold office, was not self-executing absent congressional action . . . With this understanding in mind, we believe that the Congress and Supreme Court of the time were in agreement that affirmative relief under the amendment should come from Congress.[359]

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And what authority did the Fourth Circuit look to and cite: Griffin's Case. Former Fourth Circuit Judge Michael Luttig, who recently wrote that Griffin's Case was "poorly reasoned," seems unaware of his former court's precedents.[360]

We don't doubt that there are some exceptions to the sword-and-shield framework which we have put forward. Bivens is one exception; Takings Clause cases and inverse condemnation proceedings, another.[361] We suspect other exceptions may exist where [359] Cale v. City of Covington, 586 F.2d 311, 316 (4th Cir. 1978) (emphases added). We note that Cale was decided after Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908) and after Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651 (1974). If, as we have argued and as Chase held, Section 3 is not self-executing for the purpose of seeking affirmative relief, then Ex parte Young cannot fill the legal gap in Baude and Paulsen's theory. See supra subsection I(C)(2)(d). A voter or candidate seeking to exclude Trump from the ballot is seeking positive relief via state administrative or judicial action. The relief sought by the voter or candidate is that the state strike Trump from the ballot. And as Judge Sutton explained, such relief still requires a federal statute. See Mich. Corr. Org. v. Mich. Dep't. of Corr., 774 F.3d 895, 906 (6th Cir. 2014) ("But matters differ when litigants wield Ex parte Young as a cause-of-action-creating sword. In that setting—today's setting—the State is not threatening to sue anyone, precluding an anti-suit injunction from doing the work. [In those circumstances,] [w]hat is required is that Congress create[] a cause of action for injunctive relief in the statute or otherwise made § 1983 available." (internal citation omitted)).

---

[360] Luttig & Tribe, supra note 358.

[361] Knick v. Twp. of Scott, 139 S. Ct. 2162, 2171 (2019) ("Because of 'the self-executing character' of the Takings Clause 'with respect to compensation,' a property owner has a constitutional claim for just compensation at the time of the concrete property rights are in dispute under Article III's equity prong, as opposed to the law prong. There may be other exceptions too. But they are individually and collectively exceptions–often of recent judicial creation. The historically dominant view is what was put forward by Chase in Griffin's Case. Our view is that this sword-and-shield framework undermines Baude and Paulsen's core position: they believe that the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing. If Baude and Paulsen believe all constitutional provisions are self-executing in both senses–as a sword and shield, we think they are in error. If they believe that Section 3 is distinguishable from other constitutional provisions, and yet Section 3 is self-executing in both senses, as a sword and shield, even if other constitutional provisions are not, then we fail to see how they distinguish Section 3 from other constitutional provisions.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

III. Chief Justice Chase's Decision in the Case of Jefferson Davis

Chief Justice Chase presided over another case that had implications for Section 3. Yet, Baude and Paulsen only mention that case in passing.[362] While most people have never heard of Caesar Griffin—indeed, there are some records suggesting his first name was actually Caspar—the other case involved one of the best-known confederates: Jefferson Davis.[363] Yes, Chase presided over the treason prosecution of the former president of the (purported) confederate government.

What Baude and Paulsen do say about the case employs hyperbole rarely seen in legal scholarship. Baude and Paulsen characterize Chase's position as "bonkers," and they support their position on atextualist consequentialist grounds.[364] But not everyone has shared Baude and Paulsen's views on this point. In Cramer v. United States, Justice Robert H. Jackson, as did the Solicitor General, taking." (quoting First Eng. Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 315 (1987))).

---

362 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 43–44.

363 Foreign News, England, THE DAILY DISPATCH (Richmond), Nov. 18, 1868.

364 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 43.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

favorably cited the Case of Jefferson Davis.[365] Justice Jackson and the Department of Justice did not think the decision was "bonkers."

What makes Baude and Paulsen's drive-by treatment even more striking is that Chase is reported to have made a statement that provides support for Baude and Paulsen's position. The standard version of the Case of Jefferson Davis is the version as reported by Federal Cases. The decision ends with these paragraphs:

> THE CHIEF JUSTICE. Very well. The certificate of disagreement has been made, as requested by the defendant. It may be filed, and a copy forwarded immediately to Washington.
>
> Whereupon the court adjourned.
>
> No further proceedings were had in the cause. The proclamation of general amnesty by the president of the United States at the end of December, 1868 effectually disposed of the criminal prosecution, and the certificate of disagreement rests among the records of the supreme court, undisturbed by a single motion for either a hearing or a dismissal. At a subsequent term of the circuit court, the indictments against Mr. Davis were, on motion of his counsel, dismissed.
>
> THE CHIEF JUSTICE instructed the reporter to record him as having been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment [against Davis] should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of [Section 3] the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States.[366]

This statement, standing on its own, might seem to suggest that Section 3, in the absence of federal enforcement legislation, was self-executing. Although Professor Gerard Magliocca considers this statement at some length, Baude and Paulsen do not even mention it.

---

[365] Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1, 25 n.38 (1945) (Jackson, J.); see also Kawakita v. United States, 190 F.2d 506, 517 n.14 (9th Cir. 1951) (same).

[366] 7 THE FEDERAL CASES COMPRISING CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES, DART–DUNBAR, CASE NO. 3,583–CASE NO. 4,130, at 102 (West. Publ'g. Co. 1894) [hereinafter 7 FEDERAL CASES], https://perma.cc/AL7X-UDU4.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Just as well. This statement is not the slam dunk it seems at face value. And it isn't even clear when, if ever, Chase actually made this statement. Moreover, the case was reported by a former confederate general who allegedly plotted to kidnap Abraham Lincoln. Not exactly a neutral source. Plus, the reporter admitted that he revised Chase's opinions, years later, sometimes with and sometimes without the Chief Justice's knowledge. Oh, and the reporter was Judge Sheffey's lawyer in Griffin's Case. There are many good reasons to discount this statement.

Still, even if we assume this statement was an accurate representation of Chase's views during (or, even, after) the Davis trial, we can reconcile the Case of Jefferson Davis with Griffin's Case. Griffin was an applicant; he sought to use Section 3 as a sword, that is, offensively as a cause of action supporting affirmative relief, but he could not do so without enforcement legislation. By contrast, Davis sought to use Section 3 as a shield–as a defense in a criminal prosecution, and he could do so without enforcement legislation. The two cases can be reconciled. How was Section 3 used as a shield? Davis's position was that Section 3 displaced federal criminal treason-related prosecutions, and furthermore, Section 3 was the exclusive punishment which could be brought against Section 3-covered persons. We take no position whether or not this position was correct on the merits. Our point is that this framing in regard to how Section 3 was used permitted Davis to invoke Section 3 absent enforcement legislation.

A. What did Chase's Opinion in the Case of Jefferson Davis case decide, and not decide?

After the Civil War, Jefferson Davis, the former president of the (purported) confederacy, was indicted on federal treason charges. His lawyers argued that Section 3 displaced all federal criminal treason-related prosecutions in favor of disqualification as the exclusive punishment for those falling within Section 3's reach.[367] Thus, Section [367] Judge Richardson of the Fourth Circuit contended that Davis's "defense team made the astonishing argument that, because § 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment was a punishment and not a qualification, he could not be convicted for treason under the Fifth Amendment's prohibition on double jeopardy." Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F.4th 245, 278 n.16 (4th Cir. 2022) (Richardson, J., concurring) (citing Dwight J. Davis, The Legal Travails of Jefferson Davis: A Review and Lessons Learned, 23 J.S. LEGAL HIST. 27, 73 (2015)). And, Richardson wrote, it was Chief Justice Chase himself who suggested the idea to Davis's defense team, as it would allow a procedural ruling that might "save Chase from making a

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

3 foreclosed a prosecution under the federal treason statute. We take no position whether or not this position was correct on the merits. This position, which invoked Section 3 as a defense, did not need to rely on federal enforcement legislation.

If you're looking for a clear statement of how Chase viewed the question, you're out of luck. And the absence of any such opinion is due to how the federal courts were structured in 1868. At the time, federal criminal prosecutions were tried before the federal circuit court, and certain cases were heard by the District Judge and the Circuit Justice sitting together.[368] As you might have surmised, the two judges at this trial, which was held in Richmond, Virginia, were District Judge Underwood and Chief Justice Salmon Chase. Under the rules in effect, a federal criminal prosecution could be appealed to the United States Supreme Court if the district court judge and the circuit justice decision on the question of whether or not secession is treason." Id. (citing C. Ellen Connally, The Use of the Fourteenth Amendment by Salmon P. Chase in the Trial of Jefferson Davis, 42 AKRON L. REV. 1165, 1196 (2009)). Richardson's position baffles us. There is not one word about double jeopardy or the Fifth Amendment mentioned anywhere in the reported decision. The Sixth Amendment is discussed by Chase, but it is difficult to see how this could be a source of confusion for Judge Richardson or anyone else. As to Chase's having suggested the argument to Davis's attorneys, we would not be a bit surprised if that claim were true. See generally CYNTHIA NICOLETTI, SECESSION ON TRIAL: THE TREASON PROSECUTION OF JEFFERSON DAVIS 295–96 (2017); Carlton F.W. Larson, The Forgotten Constitutional Law of Treason and the Enemy Combatant Problem, 154 U. PA. L. REV. 853 (2006). And given the political realities at the time, we would not be a bit surprised if the prosecutors thanked Chase for doing just that. We add: Even if Davis's jury were selected from a venire of Virginia Unionists and other men who sat the war out, without openly supporting the rebels, how could anyone have any confidence that it would convict? See Francis MacDonnell, Reconstruction in the Wake of Vietnam: The Pardoning of Robert E. Lee and Jefferson Davis, 40 CIV. WAR HIST. 119, 122 n.5 (1994) ("[T]he government doubted its ability to convict Davis before a Virginia jury, and an innocent verdict in favor of the Rebel leader would have caused intense embarrassment."); ELI N. EVANS, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN: THE JEWISH CONFEDERATE 365 (1988) ("The Johnson government, it seemed, was afraid it would be disgraced by the failure of its case against Davis."); FREDERICK J. BLUE, SALMON P. CHASE: A LIFE IN POLITICS 263 (1987) ("Whether a conviction would be possible from a Richmond jury was uncertain."); id. at 264 (Chase, during 1866–1867, "feared that a Richmond jury would never convict a fellow southerner . . . ."). The prosecutors might have felt as if they had just won the lottery when Chase put forward a legal position amounting to kicking the can down the road without the government's being publicly humiliated by a divided jury or, worse, an actual unanimous acquittal. Again, the case was being heard in Richmond, Virginia—the former rebel capital.

---

368 Judiciary Act of 1802, 2 Stat. 156, 159, § 6.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

disagreed. Specifically, the two judges would submit a certificate of division to the Supreme Court.

The American Law Review, published in 1869, offered an account of the trial, including detailed descriptions of arguments made by counsel for the defense and the government.[369] After the arguments were submitted, there would be no unanimous resolution of the case. The report states, "After a brief consultation, the following certificate of division of opinion was made by the court."[370] The certificate provides, in part:

> The question arose, whether, by the operation and effect of the third clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, the defendant is exempted from liability to indictment or prosecution for treason in levying war, participating or engaging in the late Rebellion. And upon that question the judges [Underwood and Chase] were opposed. And thereupon the said point is, upon the request of the said defendant, stated under the direct[ion] of the said judges, and certified under the seal of the said Circuit Court to the Supreme Court of the United States at its next session.[371]

The American Law Review report of the case observed, "The certificate, with an exemplification of the record, was filed in the Supreme Court at the beginning of the December Term."[372] A copy of this certificate can be found in the National Archives.[373]

The certificate does not say how each of the Judges voted. Nor does it say why the judges cast their votes. What we do know is that Chase voted one way, and Underwood the other. We do not know that Chase would have voted the same way and for the same reasons had he 369 United States v. Jefferson Davis, 3 AM. L. REV. 368 (1869), https://perma.cc/Y9PG-6TCB. A reproduction of the full issue can be found at https://bit.ly/44PsUHz.

---

370 Id. at 372.

371 Id.

372 Id.

373 Certificate of Division, Case of Jefferson Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63 (C.C.D. Va. 1867–1871) (No. 324), https://perma.cc/K7QC-4YZJ. Appellate Jurisdiction Case Files in Record Group 267, Records of the Supreme Court of the United States, at the National Archives. The record from the Supreme Court case can be found at https://perma.cc/FFK7-GHQD.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

been the lone decision-maker where his vote was both determinative and precedent setting.

For all we know, Chase may have voted in opposition to Underwood to ensure the Supreme Court could decide the issue promptly—such a position would have the benefit of nation-wide legitimacy and uniformity across circuits. A letter from Chase to Judge Underwood in January 1869 concerning Griffin's Case provides some support for this theory. Chase wrote, "The best and quickest way of obtaining an authoritative & final decision of the point which has arisen is to certify to a division of opinion in the Caesar Griffin case now in the Circuit Court on appeal."[374] Remember, at the time, the Supreme Court could only hear such an appeal if there was a certificate of division.[375] This practice would not have been uncommon. There is some circumstantial evidence that in United States v. Cruikshank, Circuit Justice Joseph Bradley intentionally registered disagreement with the District Judge (and future Justice) William Wood, even though he agreed with Wood on the merits, for the purpose of allowing the Supreme Court to hear the case.[376]

We have found no contemporaneous public source discussing Chase's reasons for how he voted on this case. The 1894 report of the case in Federal Reports, the version used by most scholars and courts today, states that Chase took the position that the Fourteenth Amendment barred the treason indictment against Davis. Recently, this view of the case has been put forward to show that Chase believed that Section 3 was self-executing.

However, we have found a contemporaneous source which states just the opposite of the position ascribed to Chase in Federal Cases. An article appeared in the Richmond Daily Dispatch on December 7, 1868. The article stated that, "It was generally believed that the Chief Justice was in favor of sustaining the motion to quash [the indictment of Davis], while Judge Underwood wished to overrule it. But the Chief Justice stated in private conversation that he wished it distinctly understood that he had expressed no opinion on the subject."[377]

Again, there is no contemporaneous public source explaining why Chase voted the way he did. And the case would never be decided

---

374 Fairman, supra note 324, at 604-05.

375 Fairman, supra note 324, at 602.

376 Barnett & Blackman, supra note 154, at 756.

377 The Case of Jeff. Davis, Disagreement of the Court, THE DAILY DISPATCH (Richmond), Dec. 7, 1868.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

by the Supreme Court. Within a few weeks of the case's referral to the Supreme Court, President Andrew Johnson announced an amnesty and the treason charges were no more. Eight years later, and after Chase's death, another account of Chase's opinion would be published.

B. Chase's opinion in the Case of Jefferson Davis as reported by Bradley T. Johnson

Modern readers may take for granted that all reported versions of a case will be largely identical. But for much of Anglo-American legal history that assumption would have been wrong. Accounts of judicial decisions were recorded by hand and may be incomplete. Some reporters were deemed more reliable than others. Such is the situation with the Case of Jefferson Davis.

The version of the case reported in Federal Cases, published in 1894, includes an important sentence that does not appear in the 1869 version in American Law Review: "THE CHIEF JUSTICE instructed the reporter to record him as having been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States."[378]

Instead, Federal Cases relies on a report by Bradley T. Johnson, who published cases that Chief Justice Chase decided on the Circuit Court of Virginia. Johnson included that same pivotal statement. But it is not known when, if ever, Chase instructed Johnson to add that statement. We are somewhat skeptical that Chase made it, at least during or immediately after the trial. This statement was not made in open court. Indeed, the tense shifts from the present tense to past tense ("as having been").[379] And we have found no contemporaneous record of Chase's making this statement in other public sources. And there is some good reason to treat Johnson as less than a neutral observer. He had served as a general in the (purported) confederate army, plotted to kidnap Abraham Lincoln, and later became a defender of the "Lost Cause." Plus General Johnson represented Judge Sheffey in Griffin's Case. So just maybe the reporter had some connection to the self-execution issue which should be a cause for concern.

---

[378] Case of Jefferson Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 102 (C.C.D. Va. 1867–1871).

[379] Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. Federal Cases

Let's work backwards chronologically. In 1894, the West Publishing Company published the seventh volume of The Federal Cases Comprising Cases Argued and Determined in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States.[380] The Case of Jefferson Davis stretches from page 63 through page 102. The very first footnote on page 63 states, "Reported by Bradley T. Johnson, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 3 Am. Law. Rev. 368, contains only a partial report."[381] On page 102, the report notes that the court adjourned.[382] The final two paragraphs state:

> No further proceedings were had in the cause. The proclamation of general amnesty by the president of the United States at the end of December, 1868, effectually disposed of the criminal prosecution, and the certificate of disagreement rests among the records of the supreme court, undisturbed by a single motion for either a hearing or a dismissal. At a subsequent term of the circuit court, the indictments against Mr. Davis were, on motion of his counsel, dismissed.
>
> THE CHIEF JUSTICE instructed the reporter to record him as having been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States.[383]

If we simply stopped our analysis here, and took General Johnson's account at face value, then Baude and Paulsen would have some strong evidence that Chase viewed Section 3 as self-executing in the Davis case. But there is some reason to keep digging.

2. Reports of Cases Decided by Chief Justice Chase by Bradley T. Johnson

As the footnote observes, this report of the case came from a book published by Bradley T. Johnson in 1876, titled Reports of Cases

---

380 7 FEDERAL CASES. Supra note 366.

381 Case of Jefferson Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 63 (C.C.D. Va. 1867–1871).

382 Id. at 102.

383 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Decided by Chief Justice Chase in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Fourth Circuit.[384] The book has a subtitle, Revised and Corrected by the Chief Justice. The report of the Case of Jefferson Davis is the first case in the book. The report begins with a "Statement of the Case," and includes detailed accounts of the proceeding.[385] The report concludes on Page 124, including the two paragraphs noted above.[386]

The first paragraph above was necessarily written at some point after the case was transmitted to the Supreme Court, and after President Johnson issued an amnesty for Davis. We know this because that paragraph refers to President Johnson's amnesty.[387] The events described in that paragraph would necessarily have occurred after the case had already been certified to the Supreme Court, and President Johnson issued the amnesty. We do not know when, if at all, the Chief Justice instructed the reporter, Bradley T. Johnson, to record his view on the case. It did not happen in open court. There is no indication that Judge Underwood made a similar request. For all we know, it could have happened, if it happened at all, at any point between December 1868, when President Johnson issued his amnesty, and May 1873, when Chase died. Or Johnson could have added the statement on his own accord at some point after Chase's death, and before the book was published in 1876.

For some evidence in Bradley Johnson's favor, the preface of the book explains how Chase was involved in the editing process. Johnson relayed that he "proposed to the Chief Justice that, if agreeable to him, [Johnson] would undertake the work of collecting his Circuit Court decisions for publication."[388] Chase "assented to the suggestion with gratification, and subsequently furnished [Johnson] with copies of his decisions as fast as they were made on circuit."[389] During 1872–

---

384 BRADLEY T. JOHNSON, REPORTS OF CASES DECIDED BY CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT (Diossy & Co. 1876), https://perma.cc/UC4N-3FBC. The phrase "Fourth Circuit" in the title of the book did not refer to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit which came into existence many years later. Rather, at that time, the "Fourth Circuit" included certain States, such as Virginia. Each state had its own federal circuit court of appeals, and Chase presided over the individual circuit courts in those States.

385 Id. at 1.

386 Id. at 124.

387 Id. at 11.

388 Id. at iv.

389 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1873, Johnson submitted the manuscript to Chase "for revision, and he went over the whole of it with the reporter, making such corrections as he deemed necessary."[390] Johnson explained that the changes "were generally merely verbal, and in the main consisted of softening the language or expressions used in alluding to the war."[391] For example, Chase "struck out the words 'rebellion,' 'rebels,' 'insurrection,' and 'insurgents,' and substituted the words 'civil war,' 'belligerents,' &c., wherever the sense of the text would permit, and instructed me to do so wherever he had overlooked it."[392]

In April 1872, Chase wrote to his daughter, Janet Chase Hoyt, that he visited General Johnson. During that visit Chase "was aiding [Johnson's] revision of [Chase's] decisions."[393] Chase quipped, "I could and would have done more and enjoyed more, if I had been in better health, but I did very well for an invalid."[394] By Johnson's own admission, Chase instructed him to modify reported decisions several years after the fact, with an eye towards softening any negative language towards the former confederates. It is entirely possible that Chase asked Johnson to include the final paragraph at this point, nearly five years after the Davis case concluded. That very well could have been Chase's opinion five years later, but, again, we have found no contemporaneous public statement that described Chase's view in the Davis case.

Recently, Judge Richardson of the Fourth Circuit, in a concurring opinion, suggested that Chase in fact took a position on whether Section 3 was self-executing during the Davis trial—at least, this is how we read Richardson's "on the record" language. In any event, Judge Richardson, like many others, certainly ascribes the position to Chase. Judge Richardson wrote:

> While Andrew Johnson's pardon of Davis eventually mooted the case, Chief Justice Chase went on the record anyway. He agreed with the defendant's argument that § 3 was a punishment and that "it executes itself." In re Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 90 (C.C.D. Va. 1871). "THE CHIEF JUSTICE instructed the reporter to record him as having 392 Id. at iv–v.

---

390 Id.

391 Id.

393 Letter from Chase to Janet Chase Hoyt (Apr. 12, 1872) in 5 THE SALMON P. CHASE PAPERS, 1865–1873, 368 (John Niven, ed 1994), https://perma.cc/25TJ-5XWC.

394 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States." Id. at 102.[395]

We have discussed above the provenance of the Chief Justice's purported instructions to the reporter, which were added by Bradley T. Johnson. Judge Richardson's putting "it executes itself" in quotation marks is somewhat confusing. The quoted language is something Davis's attorney—Judge Robert Ould—stated, not Chase. Ould was a former judge advocate in the (purported) confederacy, so he was referred to as "Judge." Ould said, Section 3 "executes itself, acting proprio vigore. It needs no legislation on the part of congress to give it effect."[396] Chase never uttered the words "it executes itself" in the record. Indeed, Chase expressed no agreement or disagreement with Ould at that time. Indeed, Chase's only on-the-record comment immediately following Ould's statement concerned the timing of a recess. Contrary to Judge Richardson, we see no clear evidence that Chase, at any time during the Davis trial, took any position with regard to whether Section 3 is self-executing.

The American Law Review report of the case, published in 1869, soon after the Davis case, does not include the final paragraph about Chase's purported views. By contrast, Bradley's report, which was published nearly eight years later, which admittedly modified text without Chase's direct oversight, and which may have inured to the benefit of his clients, including former confederates, did include the final paragraph. Based on these facts alone, we would rely on the earlier report in American Law Review. But there is much, much more.

3. Who was Bradley T. Johnson?

Bradley T. Johnson was hardly a neutral reporter. A brief sketch of his history reveals why. According to one account, Johnson was "[t]he man who perhaps did the most to promote Maryland's involvement in the Confederate cause, despite the state remaining in the Union."[397] In 1861, after Maryland remained loyal to the Union, he

---

[395] Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F.4th 245, 278 n.16 (4th Cir. 2022) (Richardson, J., concurring) (citing In re Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 90 (C.C.D. Va. 1871)).

[396] 7 FEDERAL Cases, supra note 366, at 90.

[397] Bradley T. Johnson, AMERICAN BATTLEFIELD TRUST, https://www.battlefields.org/learn/biographies/bradley-t-johnson.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

organized a pro-southern militia.[398] Later his unit crossed the Potomac and was incorporated into General Stonewall Jackson's brigade.[399] He led his Marylanders into several prominent battles.[400] He would achieve the rank of brigadier general in the (purported) confederate army.[401] Apparently, in 1864, "Johnson conceived of a plan to kidnap Lincoln while he was at the Soldiers' Home near the outskirts of Washington, DC," but his plans were thwarted.[402] He commanded a (purported) confederate prison until 1865, when he surrendered to Union forces.[403]

After the war, in addition to reporting Chase's cases, Johnson became "increasingly involved with the Lost Cause."[404] Before the war, Johnson was elected as state's attorney for Frederick County, Maryland.[405] This position very well may have triggered his own disqualification under Section 3. Johnson was also indicted for treason against the United States in Maryland.[406] Circuit Justice Chase referred to him as a "'double traitor' to both Unionist Maryland and the country."[407] Albeit, in May 1866, President Johnson gave Bradley Johnson a "full pardon and amnesty for all offenses by him committed, arising from participation, direct or implied, in the said rebellion" on certain conditions.[408] Bradley Johnson would also have been covered by the 1872 and 1898 congressional pardons issued under the authority

---

398 Id.

399 Id.

400 Id.

401 Id.

402 Id.

403 Id.

404 Id. See also Laura Castro Lindarte, John Wilkes Booth's Abduction Plot Gone Wrong, BOUNDARY STONES (Mar. 2, 2018), https://boundarystones.weta.org/2018/03/02/john-wilkes-booths-abduction-plot-gone-wrong ("These were not the only plots to kidnap Lincoln. Two members of the Confederacy army also had plans to abduct the President. One was Joseph Walker Taylor, the nephew of former president Zachary Taylor. The other was Colonel Bradley T. Johnson. Neither was carried out and it is unknown whether [John Wilkes] Booth knew about them.").

405 A Guide to the Bradley T. Johnson Papers, U. OF VA. LIBR., https://perma.cc/P9GG-RWNB ("Johnson served as Maryland State's Attorney, Chairman of the Maryland State Democratic Committee, and delegate to both National Conventions of 1860.").

406 NICOLETTI, supra note 367, at 171.

407 NICOLETTI, supra note 367, at 171, 195.

408 Pardon of Bradley T. Johnson by President Andrew Johnson (May 11, 1866), https://perma.cc/CA5P-4768.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

of Section 3. After the Fourteenth Amendment came into effect, it was unclear if those who had already been pardoned by the President were subject to Section 3 disqualification.[409]

There's more. Johnson was Judge Sheffey's lawyer in Griffin's Case! Richmond was a small world. Only a few months after the Jefferson Davis trial concluded, General Johnson was Judge Sheffey's advocate in the District Court and in the Circuit Court.[410] And wouldn't you know it? Johnson reported Griffin's Case in his volume on Chase's decisions. It appears starting on page 364. Federal Cases once again relied on Johnson.[411]

It is not unreasonable to be skeptical of the final paragraph of General Johnson's report of the Case of Jefferson Davis. That passage attributed to Chase was added by a former confederate. That lawyer also argued in Griffin's Case that Section 3 should not disqualify Judge Sheffey. Indeed, the lengthy statement of the case that preceded the Davis report was written in a very pro-confederate fashion. A 1953 book observed, "[p]erhaps the able lawyer and distinguished Confederate soldier, Bradley T. Johnson, expressed the best contemporary Southern viewpoint on the question of treason as it touched the supporters of the Confederacy. He set forth his opinion in a long 'Statement of the Case' of Jefferson Davis in his Reports of Cases Decided by Chief Justice Chase, 1865-69, published in 1876."[412] In Johnson's view, "any attempt, therefore, to punish Jefferson Davis and other leaders of the Confederacy would be considered disgraceful to the American people."[413] Johnson, a defender of the so-called "lost 409 18 Op. Att'y Gen. 149 (1885) (explaining that Section 3-covered persons that had been pardoned by the President before the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment were not precluded by Section 3 from holding office under the United States).

---

410 Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 15 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) ("The state of Virginia appearing by the attorney-general, Mr. _____, Judge H. W. Sheffey, the judge of the circuit court for Rockbridge by Bradley T. Johnson, Esq., and the sheriff by James Neeson, Esq. they joined issue on this traverse.").

411 Id. at 7 n.1 ("Reported by Bradley T. Johnson, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U.S. Cts. 93, 3 Am. Law Rev. 784, and 8 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 358, contain only partial reports."). Volume VIII of the American Law Register of 1869 (not to be confused with the American Law Review of 1869) includes a version of the case starting at page 358, https://perma.cc/K9VS-896L, https://archive.org/details/americanlawregi05lawgoog.

412 JONATHAN TRUMAN DORRIS, PARDON AND AMNESTY UNDER LINCOLN AND JOHNSON 106 (1953), https://perma.cc/EC27-QQ5K.

413 Id. at 107.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

cause," even included an appendix with the (purported) constitution of the (purported) Confederate States of America![414] The inclusion of this document, after Chase had already died, appears to be a decision of Johnson alone.

We would be very skeptical to rely on the following statement, as reported by Bradley T. Johnson: "THE CHIEF JUSTICE instructed the reporter to record him as having been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States."[415] This statement was not made in open court. And we have found no contemporaneous record of Chase's making this statement in other public sources. Still, we cannot rule out the possibility that such sources may exist. Let's assume that Chase actually said it.

Can we reconcile Griffin's Case, which was litigated by Bradley Johnson, with the Case of Jefferson Davis, which was reported by Bradley Johnson? Yes, we can.

C. Reconciling Griffin's Case and the Case of Jefferson Davis

Going forward, we will assume that the statement appended at the end of Bradley Johnson's report in fact reflected the view of Salmon P. Chase during the Davis trial. That statement may seem to be in tension with Chase's view a few months in Griffin's Case. Recently, Professor Gerard Magliocca has argued that Chase's positions in these two cases were contradictory. According to Magliocca, Chase determined that Section 3 was self-executing in Case of Jefferson Davis, but was not self-executing in Griffin's Case. Magliocca wrote, "Chief Justice [Chase] offered no explanation, and my opinion is that this pair of results is simply illogical and cannot be explained by legal analysis."[416] Magliocca added, "These two different assessments about whether Section Three was self-executing in Virginia are almost impossible to reconcile . . . ."[417] Commentator Roger Parloff endorsed Magliocca's view.[418] Baude and Paulsen favorably quote a 2017 book 414 Johnson, supra note 384, at 557–78.

---

415 Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F.4th 245, 278 n.16 (4th Cir. 2022) (Richardson, J., concurring) (citing In re Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 102 (C.C.D. Va. 1871)).

416 Magliocca, supra note 228, at 105.

417 Id. at 100.

418 Parloff, supra note 176.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

suggesting that Chase had ulterior political motives in the Davis case.[419] Professor Mike Dorf wrote that "Chief Justice Chase cannot be trusted on this question."[420] Professor Mark Graber charged that "when self-execution served Chase's political goals, as in the treason trial of Jefferson Davis, Chase took the position that Section Three had immediate legal consequences even in the absence of implementing legislation."[421] Graber added that Chase was "not a reliable source for Republican thinking about Section Three."[422]

Judge Richardson of the Fourth Circuit likewise agreed with Magliocca. Richardson found that Griffin was "a reversal from [Chase's] opinion in Davis."[423] Richardson contended that both cases are "in question" due to their "contradictory holdings, just a few years apart."[424] (The cases were decided a few months apart.) Richardson wrote that these contradictory opinions "make it hard to trust Chase's interpretation."[425] Indeed, Judge Richardson even gave credence to the argument that Chase could have been "motivated by Confederate sympathies or some sort of prejudice, as he twisted § 3 one way to help arch-Confederate Jefferson Davis and then twisted it the other to ratify decisions by a former-Confederate judge."[426] Richardson rejected such insinuation as "probably not right," as Chase was a prominent abolitionist.[427] But Richardson settled on a "more likely . . . [that] Chase was against § 3 for pragmatic reasons."[428] Richardson remarked that "Chase had worked vigorously to keep § 3 out of the Fourteenth 419 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at n.152 ("Nicoletti suggests—and she is not making this up—that either Chase was gunning for the Democratic nomination for President, or that this was a bank shot to get southern whites to accept the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, by arranging for the Amendment to benefit them" (quoting CYNTHIA NICOLETTI, SECESSION ON TRIAL: THE TREASON PROSECUTION OF JEFFERSON DAVIS 293-300 (2017))).

---

420 Dorf, supra note 75.

421 Graber, supra note 118, at 11.

422 Graber, supra note 118, at 13

423 Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F.4th 245, 278 n.16 (4th Cir. 2022) (Richardson, J., concurring).

424 Id. (emphasis added).

425 Id.

426 Id.

427 Id. (citing Magliocca at 106) (noting that Chase was "was one of America's greatest antislavery lawyers, and his record refutes any inference of racial animus").

428 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Amendment, fearing that it 'was too harsh on former Confederate officials,' making reunification harder."[429]

Richardson concluded that regardless of "Chief Justice Chase's reasons," he would "not take either Davis or Griffin for much useful background" about Section 3.[430] And Richardson explained that Chase's discussion did not provide "much evidence of broader contemporary understanding" in light of Chase's "shifting legal conclusions, Chase's pragmatic political concerns, and the obvious conflict*s* [!] of interest."[431] (What these multiple "obvious conflicts" are, Judge Richardson did not say.) Richardson wrote that the Case of Jefferson Davis and Griffin's Case "are too confused and confusing to help much."[432]

Finally, Judge Richardson wrote that Chase's opinions while riding circuit were not "binding on" the Fourth Circuit.[433] We are uncertain about this last point. We do not know how the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit treats precedents from its predecessor courts, including the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia. Indeed, the Fourth Circuit favorably cited Griffin's case in a decision about five decades ago. The opinion in Cale v. City of Covington explained that "Chief Justice Chase sitting as a Circuit Justice . . . [in] Griffin's Case . . . held that the third section of the Fourteenth Amendment, concerning disqualifications to hold office, was not self-executing absent congressional action."[434] (We discussed Judge Widener's Fourth Circuit opinion in Cale above.) The Fourth Circuit, which is Judge Richardson's court, added, "[W]e believe that the Congress and Supreme Court of the time were in agreement that affirmative relief under the [Fourteenth] [A]mendment should come from Congress."[435] At a minimum, Cale would be circuit precedent for Judge Richardson to consider. In any event, there was no indication that Chase's decision was in any regard outside the mainstream of Fourth Circuit jurisprudence circa 1978.

---

[429] Id. (citing C. Ellen Connally, The Use of the Fourteenth Amendment by Salmon P. Chase in the Trial of Jefferson Davis, 42 AKRON L. REV. 1165, 1196 (2009)).

[430] Id.

[431] Id. (emphasis added).

[432] Cawthorn v. Amalfi, 35 F.4th 245, 278 n.16 (4th Cir. 2022) (Richardson, J., concurring).

[433] Id.

[434] Cale v. City of Covington, 586 F.2d 311, 316 (4th Cir. 1978).

[435] Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

These intellectual indictments from Maglioca, Parloff, Richardson, Baude, Paulsen, and others, directed against Chase's opinions are damning, but only if the defects the critics allege are real. We think the defect is in the purported errors. Rather, there is a far simpler way to reconcile Case of Jefferson Davis and Griffin's Case. In the former case, a criminal prosecution, the defendant could raise Section 3 as a defense in the absence of enforcement legislation. In the latter, Griffin was an applicant; he sought to use Section 3 as a sword, offensively as a cause of action seeking affirmative relief, but he could not do so without enforcement legislation.

Case of Jefferson Davis did not turn on whether Section 3 was self-executing as a sword, while Griffin's Case did. Chase acted consistently and in accordance with well-established principles of federal litigation. With regard to the Case of Jefferson Davis, any discussion of Section 3 as "self-executing" or "non-self-executing" is better reconceptualized as the application of judicial review, which has traditionally allowed constitutional rights to be asserted as defenses absent enforcement legislation.

In short, the two holdings can be distinguished through traditional legal analysis. We find this doctrinal rationale at least as plausible as allegations that Chase acted based on political, pragmatic, and even personal biases.[436] Rather, the Chief Justice of the United States faithfully decided the cases before him based on the particulars of those disputes. And both cases differed in substance and in their procedural postures.

To our knowledge, contemporary critics did not object to these rulings as contradictory. It is difficult to imagine any alleged inconsistency falling under the radar. Both opinions were announced at about the same time. Both opinions were announced by the same court and, subsequently, appeared in the same reporter. Both opinions were announced by the Chief Justice of the United States. Both opinions spoke to issues that were thought to be important by the public at the time they were issued (if not also for many years later). How is it that no one noticed the inconsistency until 2020—about 150 years after-the-fact? Such a no-one-noticed-until-me argument is conceivable, but such a position calls for some explanation. What is that explanation?

Professor Magliocca and Ron Fein referred to our position as a "clever . . . post hoc explanation" that was "never suggested by Chief [436] MICHAEL J. GERHARDT, THE LAW OF PRESIDENTIAL IMPEACHMENT 155 (2024) (Section 3 "hardly seems self-executing, because some determination must be made about insurrection or rebellion . . . .").

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Justice Chase himself."[437] We disagree. The fact that no one objected to Chase's opinion suggests no one, until 2020, thought there was an inconsistency. Magliocca and Fein are looking for a needle in a haystack, but they miss the forest and the trees. Magliocca and Fein added that our position "did not occur to any of the hundreds of ex-Confederates who petitioned Congress for amnesty before 1870 despite the lack of congressional enforcement legislation." Our position is that no one wanted a Sword of Damocles hanging over their head. Prior to Griffin's Case, and prior to any other court of record deciding this issue, it was unclear whether Section 3 was self-executing or not. Former confederates would have had good reason to petition for amnesty as soon as possible. And even after Griffin's Case was decided, the Sword of Damocles remained, as Congress could enact enforcement legislation—and indeed, enacted such legislation in 1870. Magliocca and Fein wrote further that "Nor can Chief Justice Chase's position in Griffin's Case be rescued by a post hoc distinction between federal and state offices, suggesting that even if state procedures suffice for state officials, federal procedures are still needed for federal officials (or office-seekers). Griffin's Case itself involved a state official, and nothing in its thin rationale would apply more to federal office than to state office." In Part II.B.5.g, we explained that state statutes incorporated by reference Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. States could have removed disqualified persons from state positions, pursuant to state law, without the need for federal enforcement legislation. Those who petitioned for federal amnesty before 1870 were nevertheless subject to disqualification from state positions pursuant to state legislation. In fact, even after federal amnesty, these people may have still been subject to disqualification from state positions pursuant to state legislation.

In Griffin's Case, Chase explained that his position was supported by "enlightened jurists."[438] Baude and Paulsen take

---

[437] RON FEIN & GERARD MAGLIOCCA, FREE SPEECH FOR PEOPLE ISSUE REPORT 2023-01, STATES CAN ENFORCE SECTION THREE OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT WITHOUT ANY NEW FEDERAL LEGISLATION 1 n.1, 11 n.9 (2023), https://freespeechforpeople.org/wp-content/uploads/2023/03/14.3-fsfp-magliocca-report-mar-2023.pdf.

[438] Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 26 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815) ("It is true that in the judgment of some enlightened jurists, [Section 3's] legal effect was to remit all other punishment. And such certainly was its practical effect, for it led to the general amnesty of December 25, of the same year, and to the order discontinuing all prosecutions for crime, and proceedings for confiscation originating in the Rebellion. But this very effect shows distinctly its punitive character.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

exception to Chase's characterization because they believe Chase was only referring to the views he had expressed in the Case of Jefferson Davis.[439] That is, Chase was the enlightened jurist. Their criticism misses the mark. First, there is nothing improper, at all, with a jurist referring back to his own writings. Today, Supreme Court Justices will often cite their prior opinions, concurrences, and dissents, even from cases they had adjudicated while serving on lower federal courts. Second, the phrase "enlightened jurists" seems to have been a reasonably common usage at the time.[440] And such usage continues to this day. Recently, a joint dissent by the United States Supreme Court praised "judges of wisdom."[441] Even if Chase was referring to himself, he may have used the phrase in a self-deprecating manner, and not to inflate his own regard. Third, unlike Baude and Paulsen, we are not at all sure that Chase, in Griffin's Case (1869), was referring to his own views, as he had apparently previously put forward in the Case of Jefferson Davis (1868). We write "apparently" because there is some good evidence that Chase did not make this statement on the record in the Case of Jefferson Davis (1868). Indeed, no account of that statement in the Case of Jefferson Davis would be made until the 1876 publication of General Johnson's book. Moreover, Chase referred to "enlightened jurists," plural.[442] Chase was but one jurist. It seems 439 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 44 ("Who were these 'enlightened jurists' who imagined such a thing? The answer is . . . Chase himself! He had asserted precisely this wacky construction of Section Three's effect on the criminal penalty for treason—and quietly suggested the argument to defense counsel—in the federal criminal treason prosecution of Jefferson Davis just two years earlier.").

---

440 See, e.g., Michoud v. Girod, 45 U.S. 503, 558–59 (1846) ("[I]n Louisiana, where the civil law exists in a modified form, and is still often the rule of decision by its enlightened jurists."); Parker v. Stiles, 18 F. Cas. 1163, 1172 (C.C.D. Ohio 1849) ("And it is now a principle, settled by the concurrent opinions of some of the most enlightened jurists of this country . . . ."); Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, 10 F. Cas. 754, 755 (C.C.E.D. Mich. 1874) (introducing a point with: "in the opinion of the most enlightened jurists"); Russel v. The Empire State, 21 F. Cas. 23, 25 (D. Mich. 1857) ("The most enlightened jurists of this country have refused to apply . . . . "); United States v. One Thousand Three Hundred & Sixty-Three Bags of Merch., 27 F. Cas. 340, 341 (D. Mass. 1863) ("These rules could not indeed bind his own judgment; but, having been practically adopted by enlightened jurists."); Latham v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 149, 154 (1864) ("Many more cases might be cited to show that the most eminent and enlightened jurists and the highest courts.").

441 Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Org., 142 S. Ct. 2228, 2350 (2022) (Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, JJ., dissenting) ("The Justices who wrote those words—O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter—they were judges of wisdom.").

442 Griffin's Case (In re Griffin), 11 F. Cas. 7, 26 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

unlikely that Chase was referring to a legal position that he, alone, had apparently made at the time (assuming he had made it all). Rather, Chase may have been alluding to the views of commentators on international law and treason.

Long before the American Civil War, jurists had written about punishing people for treason after a long conflict, civil war, or war of conquest, and whether such punishments were applicable. The substantive question here is not whether Chief Justice Chase, while on circuit, actively cited himself or any other source for his position as to the effect of Section 3 on treason cases. Rather, the question is whether Chase's views as to the effect of Section 3 comported with long-standing public international law norms governing the behavior of belligerents during and after a war.

For example, in response to disturbances along the United States-Upper Canada frontier during the Rebellions of 1837-1838 and the 1838 Patriot War, law officers of the crown furnished the (U.K.) Secretary of State for War with a legal opinion. The law officers wrote:

> Where an insurrection against a Government has become so formidable as to assume the aspect of an equally balanced civil war, the laws of war are to be observed between the Government and the insurgents; and [even] native-born subjects taken prisoners could not be tried [under the criminal law as] as traitors.[443]

---

[443] 2 INTERNATIONAL LAW OPINIONS: PEACE 146, 147–48 (Lord McNair ed., Cambridge Univ. Press 1956) (reproducing the August 21, 1838 opinion from crown law officers, and nowhere naming the short-lived Republic of Canada in their opinion) (emphasis added), http://tinyurl.com/5h58ktbj, reprinted in WILLIAM FORSYTH, CASES AND OPINIONS ON CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 199, 202 (London, Stevens & Haynes 1869); JOEL PARKER, THE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES 19 (Welch, Bigelow, and Co. 1862) ("[I]n proportion to the magnitude and gravity of the warfare [during an insurrection], it gradually loses, in the public mind, its distinctive character of an insurrection, being known as a civil war; and then it is hardly expedient to insist upon the enforcement of the extreme penalties of treason . . . ."); see also Calvin v. Smith (Calvin's Case, or Case of the Postnati), 77 Eng. Rep. 377, 384 (K.B. 1608) (Ellesmere LC, Coke CJ, and others) ("But if an alien enemy come to invade this realm, and be taken in war, he cannot be indicted of treason . . . and therefore he shall be put to death by martial law."); 1 WILLIAM HAWKINS, A TREATISE OF THE PLEAS OF THE CROWN 35 (1716) (explaining that when "aliens" invade the kingdom in a "hostile manner," they "cannot be punished as traitors, but shall be dealt with by martial law" under the laws of war); S.C. Biggs, Treason and the Trial of William Joyce, 7 U. TORONTO L.J. 162, 165 (1947) ("Since no duty of allegiance can arise in the absence of its counterpart protection, an enemy alien (whether civilian or soldier) cannot commit the crime of treason."); Jennifer Scott, Northern Ireland legacy bill approved by MPs - but legal fight could be

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The law officers cite no authorities, perhaps, because none were needed. This jurisprudence developed prior to the ratification of Section 3.

Like the law officers of the crown, Chase put forward no citations in support of the view that Section 3 precludes a federal treason prosecution. There might be some reasons for that. More than one U.S. Senator supported Chase's so-called "bonkers" view during debate on Section 3.[444] Chase, writing in 1869; was about 60 years old coming, SKY NEWS (Sept. 6, 2023, 15:32), https://news.sky.com/story/northern-ireland-legacy-bill-approved-by-mps-but-legal-fight-could-be-coming-12955977 (explaining that the bill, if enacted, "will stop new cases and inquests being opened into killings on both sides of the conflict"). By the time of the American Revolution, in the English-speaking world, the willingness of Parliamentarians and Royalists, during and after the English Civil Wars, and other seventeenth century court-affiliated and country-affiliated factions to try one another for treason or any other Civil War-related crime (other than for violations of the law of war) is remembered as a disgrace, and not as a confirmation of the rule of law. See generally CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2940 (1866) (Senator Hendricks opining on Section 3 and noting "This measure is in the spirit that pursued the supporters of Cromwell and the Parliament after the Restoration."); Barbara Donagan, Atrocity, War Crime, and Treason in the English Civil War, 99 AM. HIST. REV. 1137, 1139 (1994) ("In a civil war, laws of war came into conflict with laws of peace that punished taking arms against authority as treason. When fighting began in [the English Civil War in] 1642, the status of the conflict as war was not self-evident. The history of the English civil war is in part a history of why it was fought as a foreign war and of lapses from that mode."); id. at 1141 ("Despite difficulties, however, the principle had been made explicit: the laws of war rather than the laws of the civil state were applicable, and Englishmen confronted each other [not as prosecutor and traitor, but] as 'lawful enemies.'"); James R. Phifer, Law, Politics, and Violence: The Treason Trials Act of 1696, 12 ALBION: A QUARTERLY JOURNAL CONCERNED WITH BRITISH STUDIES 235, 238 (Autumn 1980) ("In the course of the century Royalist and Parliamentarian were in turn pulled down by charges of treason, and violence became an ordinary part of the political struggle."); id. at 243 ("Reflecting on the 1680s, spokesmen from the two parties urged those among their colleagues who still longed for a violent revenge to consider the virtues of moderation and to end the use of treason as a weapon.").

---

444 CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2899 (1866) (Senator Sherman noting that "after the attempted revolution in England in 1745, the English Government was considered extremely liberal when, two years after the Pretender had been overthrown by force of arms, all the pains and penalties imposed by Great Britain on his adherents were removed, except the power to hold office; and I believe all who took part in that rebellion were forever disfranchised from holding an office of honor, trust, or profit in the kingdom of Great Britain. It was considered extremely liberal that all the other penalties of treason were removed. . . . The effect of this section [three, then under debate] is simply to remove all the penalties that rest on these men for treason except the power to hold office . . . ."); id. at 2900 (Senator Doolittle stating that "nobody can doubt that. It is in the

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

and only a few years from death. He was on circuit—more than one hundred miles from the capitol and his home. He had no computer. He had no law clerk. For all we know, he had no good law library. He was on his own–in the former rebel capital. Just perhaps, under these conditions, one might say Chase's work-product was, at least, broadly consistent with professional standards of the day? Contra Baude and Paulsen, we think all things considered, as a matter of domestic law applicable in federal courts, Chase may have been wrong in the Case of Jefferson Davis with regard to whether a treason prosecution was precluded by Section 3. But right or wrong, Chase's position was not "bonkers."

Moreover, as a practical matter, Chase's analysis regarding treason would have limited effect. At the time, the statute of limitations for treason was three years.[445] The Civil War drew to a close, with the Battle of Palmito Ranch and the capture of Jefferson Davis, both in May 1865. By the time the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in July 1868, any new treason claims arising from the Civil War would have been time barred. And, with hindsight, we know that President Johnson's amnesty in December 1868 terminated all pending treason cases.[446]

Finally, does not normal humanity counsel that we cut Chase just a little slack? Do we really need to say that "Chief Justice Chase nature of a bill of pains and penalties, imposed by constitutional enactment it is true, but it is a punishment different from the punishment now prescribed by law. What is the effect of adopting it? What is the legal effect of adopting a new punishment for an offense which has already been committed? It repeals the old punishment, and that cannot be inflicted. If today the punishment for the crime of murder is death, and tomorrow you change your punishment to imprisonment for life, the old penalty is repealed; it cannot be inflicted upon a culprit who has been guilty previous to the passage of the law. Such has been decided by the courts many times to be the law; and if by a constitutional amendment you impose a new punishment upon a class of offenders who are guilty of crime already, you wipe out the old punishment as to them, not as to those who are not embraced within this.").

---

445 Act of Apr. 30, 1790, ch. IX § 32, 1 Stat. 112 (An Act for the Punishment of certain Crimes against the United States); see also WILLIAM WHITING, WAR POWERS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES: MILITARY ARRESTS, RECONSTRUCTION, AND MILITARY GOVERNMENT 130 (Leonard W. Levy ed., De Capo Press, 43d ed. 1972) (1871) (noting that by the Act of 1790, a defendant must be indicted within 3 years from commission of crime of treason where capital punishment is sought, and two years from commission where fine or forfeiture sought); id. at 130 (10th ed. 1864) (same).

446 See infra note ## (discussing federal treason prosecutions).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

was not shooting straight in his applications of Section Three."[447] As a general matter, we are doubtful courts and others would or should generally review a post-bellum case with such a jaundiced lens that questions the motivation of the authoring judge—at least we doubt that they should do this absent the clearest proofs of gross negligence or bad faith. The situation Chase faced had been and continued to evolve quickly. It was complex. And the legal and political stakes were high. Even if Davis's jury were selected from a venire of Virginia Unionists and men who sat the war out, without openly supporting the rebels, how could anyone have any confidence that it would convict? And there was also the possibility that former rebels or sympathetic family members of former rebels would be on the jury. Had Davis been convicted, it risked turning him into a martyr for the Lost Cause.[448] Had he been acquitted, he would have made rebellion the law of the land.[449] Even putting Davis before a jury risked giving him a national forum allowing him to refight the Civil War in a federal courtroom. All these possibilities posed dangers, and who could predict the consequences? Chase's vote worked a delay for Supreme Court review–was that really so wrong? And Supreme Court review would lead to national uniformity on this point of law, and it would have greater legitimacy with the wider public than a lower court decision by Underwood and Chase, acting separately or jointly.

IV. Section 3, Insurrection, Enemies, and Treason

The first three parts of this article explained why an applicant cannot wield Section 3 as a sword or cause of action seeking affirmative relief absent federal enforcement legislation. Part IV will address the offense element of Section 3, which imposes disqualification if a covered person "shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof." The offense

---

447 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 44.

448 Larson, supra note 199, at 123 ("The second problem was that if Davis was convicted, the [Andrew] Johnson administration would have to decide whether to pardon him or to execute him. Neither option was especially appealing. A pardon looked like irresolution in the face of clear treason, but an execution risked turning Davis into a Southern martyr, around which Confederate sympathizers could rally for generations.").

449 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

element has two prongs: (i) engaging in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and (ii) giving aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. These elements are textually distinct, and they reflect longstanding aspects of domestic and international law. One can only be an enemy during a war. But not all insurrections are war. One can engage in insurrection without aiding an enemy. One who engages in insurrection without aiding an enemy is an offender, a criminal, or a felon. But, absent a war, he is not an enemy. And one can aid an enemy without engaging in insurrection or rebellion. Yet, Baude and Paulsen conflate these two elements. They effectively rewrite the offense element such that a Section 3-covered person is one who shall have engaged in or have given aid or comfort to insurrection or rebellion or to the enemies of the United States. That is not what the text says. And that is not what long-standing principles of domestic and international law support.

Moreover, Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to wrongs and crimes that are inchoate or indirect. However, the "aid or comfort" prong does seem to extend beyond direct crimes and direct wrongdoing. It includes "aid[ing] and comfort[ing]" an enemy. This prong might very well extend to inchoate and indirect wrongs, akin to accessory liability. Here, Baude and Paulsen's atextual reading allows them to transform a direct substantive offense (i.e., engaging in insurrection) into an indirect or inchoate offense (i.e., aiding or comforting enemies). But the Framers of Section 3 did not make this choice. Nor does the "engage" prong extend to inaction—for example, failing to take action with regard to an insurrection or rebellion.

Worse still, Baude and Paulsen never actually define what an enemy is. Their conception of this term is limited to the Civil War. We acknowledge that many confederates would have both engaged in insurrection and given aid to an enemy. This dual liability was possible because the Civil War was an insurrection, and an undeclared, but de facto war. Baude and Paulsen make no effort to define "enemy" outside the context of the Civil War. They see no need to, because their atextual reading only requires giving aid and comfort to an insurrection. But a cursory study of how enemies are traditionally defined shows that the word "enemy" is not coextensive or overlapping with insurrection or rebellion. Baude and Paulsen rely on an atextual reading that conflates the two prongs. They have some duty to explain what exactly they think an "enemy" is. Instead of defining what is an enemy, Baude and Paulsen tell us that enemies and insurrectionists are the same or overlapping categories. But that conclusion is not supported, and it certainly is not a reading based on the plain text. Baude and Paulsen's rationale for grafting Section 3's "aid or comfort" language onto

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"rebellion and insurrection" does not succeed. Finally, Baude and Paulsen suggest that secession movements categorically amount to Section 3 insurrections. That is not accurate. Peaceful advocates for Puerto Rico's independence, for example, should have no fear of treason charges and no fear of Section 3 disqualification.

A. The two prongs of Section 3's offense element

Section 3 defines the conduct that may trigger disqualification. In our prior publications we did not offer an interpretation of Section 3's offense element.[450] Here we put forward a view as to how the offense element should be understood.

Section 3 imposes a disqualification if a covered person "shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof." (italics and underscores added). The text includes two prongs: (i) engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and (ii) given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. Under a plain reading of the text, these two acts are distinct. They are separated by a comma and the disjunctive or. A covered person can be disqualified for engaging in insurrection or rebellion, without ever having given aid or comfort to enemies. And a covered person can be disqualified for giving aid or comfort to enemies, without ever having engaged in insurrection or rebellion. This separation suggests that the meaning of "insurrection or rebellion" is distinct from the meaning of "enemies." Likewise, the meaning of "engaged" is distinct from the meaning of "given aid or comfort." Section 3 attaches to two different branches of conduct.

We do not think these basic textualist readings should be controversial. Yet, Baude and Paulsen conflate the two prongs of the offense element. In their view, a covered person may be disqualified if he gives aid or comfort to insurrection or rebellion. They state that Section 3 liability is premised on a person's having "engage[d] in or giv[en] aid and comfort to an insurrection."[451] They repeat this conflation throughout their Article.[452] Baude and Paulsen's reading

---

[450] Blackman & Tillman, supra note 10, at 3 ("This article does not focus on the offense element [2] and the amnesty element [4].").

[451] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 5.

[452] Id. at 57 (asking: "Likewise, what is the relationship between the disqualification for having given 'aid or comfort' to insurrectionists, rebels, or other enemies of the United States and the First Amendment?" (emphasis added)); see also id. at 74 ("Conduct participating in, advancing, supporting, or assisting either effectively rewrites Section 3 in this fashion: a Section 3-covered person is one who shall have engaged in or given aid or comfort to insurrection or rebellion or to the enemies of the United States. In other words, Baude and Paulsen take the position that the "aid or comfort" language, which applies to "enemies," also extends to "insurrection or rebellion" or, perhaps better, the "aid or comfort" language extends to those who commit "insurrection or rebellion." This category would include insurrectionists. As a result, a person who never gave aid and comfort to an enemy, and never engaged in insurrection or rebellion, could still be disqualified if he gave aid and comfort to an insurrection or rebellion. If Section 3's text means what Baude and Paulsen think it means, then it would have been very simple for its drafters to have written it the way Baude and Paulsen understand it. But they did not.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Indeed, there is some good reason to reject this reading. The Insurrection Act of 1862, which President Lincoln signed into law, made it a crime to "give[] aid or comfort" to "any rebellion or insurrection."[453] The modern version of that statute uses similar language.[454] The Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment could have used the Insurrection Act as a model. The Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment could have drafted the offense-element of Section 3 to cover giving aid or comfort to an insurrection or rebellion. But they did not. They drafted the provision to cover giving aid or comfort to an enemy.

Baude and Paulsen offer two primary lines of reasoning supporting their significant reconstruction of the text. First, they argue that "engage" is a "capacious" term, that is, one which incorporates secession or armed resistance to U.S. authority constituted 'engaging in' or giving 'aid or comfort to' the Union's enemies.")

---

[453] Act of July 17, 1862, ch. 195 § 2, 37 Stat. 590 ("That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid and comfort thereto, or shall engage in, or give and comfort, to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have; or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court.").

[454] 18 U.S.C. § 2383 ("Whoever incites, sets on foot, assists, or engages in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or gives aid or comfort thereto, shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both; and shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States."). We trace the history of this statute in Blackman & Tillman, supra note 7, at 200.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

inchoate and indirect wrongs and crimes.[455] Baude and Pauslen state that the meaning of "engage" extends to lesser wrongs or crimes involving "assistance, or encouragement . . . in the form of either words or deeds."[456] Likewise, Baude and Paulsen write that the "engage" prong in Section 3 "resembles" common law "accomplice liability," as well as "conspiracies, attempts, incitements, and advocacy."[457] If Baude and Paulsen are correct about this "resemblance," that too would be some reason to justify mapping "aid or comfort" back onto "rebellion or insurrection."

Second, Baude and Paulsen claim that just as "rebellion" and "insurrection" are largely synonymous or overlapping terms, "enemies" is a similar term or has largely overlapping scope.[458] For example, they write that "Given the history and context of Section Three 'enemies' seems to include the domestic rebels and insurrectionists just described earlier in the sentence."[459] Likewise, Baude and Paulsen contend that "giving 'aid or comfort' to enemies will be similar to the kind of conduct that counts as having 'engaged in' insurrection or rebellion."[460] If correct, this analogy would also be some reason to justify mapping "aid or comfort" back onto "rebellion or insurrection."

Both of Baude and Paulsen's arguments are problematic. We will address both arguments in turn. We will also explain why failing to take action to stop an insurrection does not amount to engaging in insurrection.

B. Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to wrongs and crimes that are inchoate or indirect

We think Baude and Paulsen's reading is difficult to justify as a purely textualist matter. The two prongs are distinct. But even more problematic, this atextualist reading radically expands the scope of 455 See, e.g., Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 63 (characterizing all the primary terms under discussion as "capacious").

---

456 Id. at 67.

457 Id. at 67 n.31, 53.

458 Id. at 68.

459 Id.

460 Id. at 67–68 (discussing "obvious overlap" among the primary terms under discussion, and stating that "Section Three is quite sweeping, using overlapping terms to cover several different characterizations of major collective resistance to the authority of government under the Constitution").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section 3's "insurrection and rebellion" prong to include wrongs and crimes that are inchoate or indirect. The text of Section 3's offense element resembles a traditional criminal offense. In general, insurrection and rebellion are thought of as traditional crimes, with traditional defenses, as defined by congressional statutes and pre-statutory common law principles. This crime is defined by the Insurrection Act of 1862, which remains largely unchanged to this day. Traditional crimes have elements, defenses, and customarily, one determines liability for a crime through the criminal process with all its constitutional protections, procedures, substantive and procedural.

In our view, "engag[ing]" in insurrection or rebellion might mean committing the actus reus of those crimes, and, perhaps, establishing liability through the criminal law. In other words, Section 3 imposes punishment or liability for actually committing insurrection or rebellion. The word "engaged" does not seem to include inchoate offenses, such as attempted insurrection or rebellion, conspiracy to commit insurrection or rebellion, or accessory liability (before- or after-the-fact) in relation to insurrection or rebellion. The "engage" prong addresses direct wrongs, not indirect or inchoate wrongs.

To draw a contrast, the Insurrection Act of 1862, discussed above, does prohibit inchoate crimes with regard to insurrection. The statute made it a crime to "incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection."[461] It was also a crime to "engage in, or give and comfort, to any such existing rebellion or insurrection." In the 1862 Act, the Framers of Section 3 had a ready model that would prohibit inchoate and indirect crimes based on insurrection. But they did not use words like "incite, set on foot, [or] assist" or "give and comfort" to insurrection. In the first prong, the Framers only used the verb "engage." The contrast between the Insurrection Act and the offense-element of Section is some evidence against Baude and Paulsen's analysis.

By contrast, in Section 3's offense-element, the "aid or comfort" prong does seem to extend beyond direct crimes. It includes "aid[ing] or comfort[ing]" the commissioning of a crime or wrong. This prong might very well extend to inchoate and indirect crimes, as well

---

[461] Act of July 17, 1862, ch. 195 § 2, 37 Stat. 590 ("That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid and comfort thereto, or shall engage in, or give and comfort, to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have; or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

as to accessory liability. This prong might even extend to non-criminal activity entirely, as long as that activity gave "aid or comfort" to "enemies." (We will address below who the "enemies" may be.)

Baude and Paulsen swept together the first and second prongs. Doing so forced inchoate and indirect crimes into the "engage" prong. This move allowed them to conclude that Section 3 included indirect participation with an insurrection. But we should hesitate before transforming a direct crime, like "engaging in insurrection" to an inchoate crime or to indirect participation in an insurrection. This caution is especially well-placed because the second prong reflects liability premised on well-understood inchoate and indirect activity—indeed, the Treason Clause defines, in part, the outer limits or scope of the offense of treason, by using "aid and comfort" and "enemies" language. This point was made recently by former Judge Michael McConnell, who is also Baude and Paulsen's constitutional law casebook co-author. McConnell stated, "Section 3 uses the verb 'engage in,' which connotes active involvement and not mere support or assistance."[462]

Further support for our reading can be found in the Second Confiscation Act of 1862.[463] Just as Baude and Paulsen discuss the Insurrection Act of 1862, Baude and Paulsen also spend several pages discussing the Confiscation Act of 1862.[464] The Second Confiscation Act provides:

> [I]f any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in, or give aid and comfort to, any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he

---

462 Eugene Volokh, Prof. Michael McConnell, Responding About the Fourteenth Amendment, "Insurrection," and Trump, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Aug. 12, 2023, 6:58 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/08/12/prof-michael-mcconnell-responding-about-the-fourteenth-amendment-insurrection-and-trump/.

463 Second Confiscation Act, ch. 195, 12 Stat. 589 (1862).

464 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 81–84.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> have; or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court.[465]

We think this statutory language undermines Baude and Paulsen's reasoning. If it were clear that "engage" was capacious and that it was understood to include "aid or comfort," then it was hardly necessary to include such both "engage"- and "aid and comfort"-language in the 1862 statute, and it was hardly necessary to include such language immediately alongside one another. Likewise, if "engage" included inchoate and indirect participation in insurrection and rebellion, then why does this provision separately list "incite, set on foot, [and] assist"? More importantly, Baude and Paulsen assert that this statute was one of several contemporaneous working models for drafting Section 3 in the Fourteenth Amendment. But the drafters of Section 3 substantially departed from the 1862 statutory model, and they used relatively textually limited and restricted language. We submit that a reasonable person circa 1866–1868, when the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed and ratified, would have understood the scope of Section 3's language to have been limited compared to this statute's broad language above.

Insurrection and rebellion are crimes. Everyone knew this in 1868, and everyone knows this today. Where a constitutional provision makes a crime a condition of disqualification, we think it quite reasonable to suggest that the insurrection or rebellion prong was understood as requiring a full criminal trial, prior to or part of any proposed Section 3 proceeding, where the "defendant" had a right to all the standard criminal law defenses and all the customary constitutional safeguards, protections, and procedures. The first prong was hard to establish, unless it was preceded by a criminal conviction establishing guilt.[466] We think it highly unlikely that the original public meaning of Section 3 permitted administrative officials—the [465] Second Confiscation Act, ch. 195, 12 Stat. 589 (1862) (emphases added).

---

[466] In Part I.B.3, we discussed the exclusion of Representative Victor Berger by the 66th House. At the time of exclusion, he had been convicted of violating the Espionage Act of 1917. However, in 1921, the Supreme Court overturned his conviction. Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22 (1921). Berger was later elected to, and seated in, the 68th, 69th, and 70th Congresses. To the extent that Berger's exclusion was premised on Section 3—and it is not clear that it was—this sequence of events would seem to indicate that congressional enforcement of Section 3, where not actually authorized by statute, at the very least, depends on a prior conviction secured in traditional federal criminal judicial proceedings, and that continued enforcement of Section 3 against a defendant is set aside where the conviction is overturned.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

predecessors of modern-day election boards—to make such determinations in civil proceedings.

By contrast, the "enemies" prong was not premised on an established crime. (For example, to establish treason, one must do more than give aid and comfort to enemies—one must also adhere to the enemies.) Who gave "aid or comfort" to the (purported) confederacy was no secret. Most of its supporters were not ashamed for having supported and having fought for the (purported) confederacy, and they did not deny or hide their participation. Reliable public records, including (purported) confederate records, recorded their deeds. Enforcing the "enemies" prong was relatively easy. A "defendant" had no entitlement to standard criminal law defenses and customary constitutional safeguards, protections, and procedures. It might all be determined administratively or via judicial notice in a civil proceeding (assuming notice and an opportunity to be heard before a neutral adjudicator). Therefore, it could be enforced outside the traditional confines of substantive and procedural criminal law.

We will turn to the enemies prong below. As a practical matter, it would be much simpler to establish Section 3 liability under the "gave aid or comfort to enemies" prong, than under the "engaged in insurrection" prong. But first, we consider a related question: does one engage in insurrection by failing to take steps to stop an insurrection?

C. Section 3's "engage" prong does not extend to inaction with regard to an insurrection

In our view, the "engage" prong is limited to direct substantive offenses, and it does not extend to wrongs or crimes that are inchoate or indirect. There is a corollary to this position: the "engage" prong does not extend to inaction with regard to an insurrection. The language of Section 3 uses active verbs. It speaks to having "engaged" in wrongdoing. In other words, failing to take actions to address an insurrection does not, by itself, amount to engaging in insurrection. As a general matter, failing to act does not support the imposition of liability. Contrary to the series finale of Seinfeld, generally, the American legal tradition does not support so-called Good Samaritan laws. However, liability may be imposed if a person has some positive duty of care.

Baude and Paulsen recognize this issue. They argue that the Take Care Clause of the Constitution imposes such a duty to stop an alleged insurrection. Specifically, they charge Trump with "deliberate inaction against the January 6 attack."[467] Baude and Paulsen write that Trump "took no action to urge" his supporters to leave the Capitol, "despite having a constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."[468] Baude and Paulsen's position amounts to an intuition: On January 6, 2021, a proper President would not have acted the way Trump acted, and from that they conjure a positive duty that he should have acted differently, and his having violated that newly-minted duty amounts to a Section 3 violation for which he should be disqualified.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

There are many problems with this intuition. For starters, Baude and Paulsen offer no accounting of what exact duty the Take Care Clause imposes. They point to no precedents where Section 3 and the Take Care Clause have been used in the manner they suggest. They point to no scholarship. They point to no debates—in Congress or in the state legislatures or among the public, suggesting that the text of Section 3 was or should have been understood in 1868 along the lines they suggest. Indeed, the phrase "Take Care" appears only once in the article. (Once again, Baude and Paulsen make a blanket statement about a complex provision of constitutional law, with no further development.[469]) This is a gap in their argument. Or perhaps they think that Section 3 actually modified the Take Care Clause, and imposed an affirmative duty on the President to stop an insurrection? Who knows? Without a theory of constitutional change and the scope of Section 3 retroactivity, just about anything might be possible under Section 3.[470] Perhaps, this issue will be developed in some future paper.

Even assuming their reading of the Take Care Clause has some support, Baude and Paulsen do not even begin to explain what other species of presidential inaction would run afoul of the Take Care Clause. Not everything is about Trump. There is a much more relevant historical inquiry: the inaction of President James Buchanan prior to Lincoln's inauguration very well may have triggered disqualification under Baude and Paulsen's theory. And Buchanan's inaction would have been on the minds of those who framed and ratified Section 3.

---

467 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 112.

468 Id. at 120.

469 Blackman has developed the relationship between the Take Care Clause and failure to faithfully execute the laws with regard to the enforcement of federal immigration law. See Josh Blackman, The Constitutionality of DAPA Part II: Faithfully Executing the Law, 19 TEX. REV. L. & POL. 215 (2015).

470 See supra subsection II(B)(5)(d) (discussing Baude and Paulsen's lack of a constitutional theory with regard to retroactivity).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

President Buchanan is usually rated the worst or among the very worst of our former presidents.[471] That view is not an entirely modern one. He was not well liked by a large segment of Unionist sentiment during the Civil War. What did President Buchanan do wrong? One thing: during secession, he did next to nothing. Buchanan was unwilling to use force—particularly the U.S. Army and U.S. Navy—to enforce federal law in States which had (purportedly) seceded; to protect loyal federal judges and other loyal federal officers in carrying out their lawful duties in States which had (purportedly) seceded; to protect federal enclaves and property in States which had (purportedly) seceded; and, to stop the formation of the (purported) confederate government in violation of United States law.

Would Baude and Paulsen argue that Buchanan "took no action to" stop an insurrection "despite having a constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed"? Did Buchanan violate his oath of office? Could Buchanan, during his term, have been impeached and disqualified for failing to take care that the laws were being faithfully executed? Could Buchanan have been impeached and disqualified after he left office for the same offenses?[472] Would Buchanan, a former Senator, have been disqualified when Section 3 was ratified? Any theory of Section 3 premised on inaction must at least address James Buchanan. Yet, Baude and Paulsen only mention Buchanan once in an unrelated context.

History suggests that the answers to these questions, and more, are no. There was no serious move to impeach him while he was president. And there was no serious move to impeach Buchanan after Lincoln succeeded to the presidency. (Albeit, one reason for the latter may have been because the issue of late impeachment always would complicate the legal analysis.) With the departure of all southern Democrats from the House and all southern Democrats from the Senate, Senator Andrew Johnson excepted, impeachment by the House should have been a snap, even if securing a Senate conviction would not have been entirely certain. One wonders: Why was Buchanan not impeached for failing to enforce the law, or for failing to defend the country, etc, etc?

We submit there is a reason: What might look like inaction from outside the White House could look like deliberation from within the [471] Hailey Philbin, The Unforgettably Forgettable President: A Look at Mr. Buchanan, NAT'L MUSEUM OF AM. HIST. (Mar. 4, 2019), https://americanhistory.si.edu/blog/buchanan.

---

[472] Baude and Paulsen both recently supported the position that late impeachment was constitutional. See supra note 194 (discussing late impeachment).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

White House, at each step of the process. Buchanan may have had hope that there would be a change of political opinion in the seceded states. (Alas, that hope was forlorn.) Buchanan may have feared that moves by the U.S. armed forces to compel compliance with federal law would be perceived as an invasion, and that would consequently push undecided border states towards secession. (With hindsight, we know this consequence happened under Lincoln.) Buchanan may have determined that a civil war would be costly in treasure and lives. (According to some modern estimates, the war resulted in over 600,000 Union dead and wounded, and in over 400,000 confederate dead and wounded.) Buchanan may have worried that a Union victory was not possible or, at least, was not assured. (Especially in the early days, victory for the Union was certainly not assured.) Buchanan may have determined that if disunion came, if it came amicably, then in the future, partial or total, reunification remained a real possibility. (Ex ante, this position would not have been unreasonable.)

We do not suggest that Buchanan was right and that Lincoln was wrong. But one reason Americans, today, think Lincoln was right is because by 1865, he and the armed might of the United States prevailed. But in 1861, after Fort Sumter—and especially prior to Gettysburg, and prior to Sherman's taking Atlanta, and prior to the election of 1864—it was hardly clear that the Union would prevail.

Buchanan's efforts, such as they were, were grounded in a moral vision and policy choice. It may be a policy choice that you disagree with. But that sort of choice is part of normal democratic politics—albeit, normal politics, including wartime politics, where the central issue on the table is the continued existence of the nation itself. That is what elections are meant to and must decide, because if it is not decided by elections, then it can only be resolved by accident and violence.[473] Buchanan's inaction violated no statute or any other positive law. Buchanan did not take a bribe or act for self-interested ends.[474] Here the President had lawful discretion if and when to use force. He acted in a disinterested manner (i.e., akin to complying with a fiduciary duty of loyalty); he was fully informed (i.e., akin to complying with a fiduciary duty of care). Buchanan did not go rebel, like Jefferson Davis. He did not give speeches in support of the confederacy, like Clement Vallandigham. Buchanan's actions were transparent—albeit, objectionable to many. A retrospective inquest on [473] See THE FEDERALIST NO. 1 (Alexander Hamilton).

---

[474] Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Defining a Theory of 'Bribery' for Impeachment, LAWFARE (Dec. 6, 2019, 12:43 PM), https://www.lawfaremedia.org/article/defining-theory-bribery-impeachment.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

a disputed policy matter cannot convert inactivity into a constitutional "high crime and misdemeanor" and cannot amount to "engaging in insurrection or rebellion."[475]

Indeed, all law enforcement officers face Buchanan's choice. In every law enforcement action, there is always a question of if, and when, and how much lawful force should be used, and how long (if at all) enforcement can and should be delayed, and once started, how long the enforcement policy should continue. Those questions are always a judgment call, where not guided by statute or other positive law or court orders. For these reasons, we have no history of impeaching officers based upon a retrospective investigation and trial which reaches a different conclusion than that which had been reached by the original officeholder as to what precisely was best policy ab initio.

One reason such trials and investigations are to be feared is that they will be conducted by subsequently elected officials seeking to vindicate different values and goals. Likewise, Section 3 has not been used in this manner: disqualifying office-holders based on a prior failure to act.

At least with regard to Trump, we feel a sense of déjà vu. The first Trump impeachment was premised on charges of "abuse of office." At the time, we warned about the fundamental danger of this charge.[476] It was a vague standard that converted normal democratic disagreement, where elected officials must make decisions in real-time based upon imperfect information, into investigations and trials, and then seeks to disqualify political opponents. We are seeing that effort again, but here, the controversy will not be limited to Congress. Rather, executive bodies and the courts have been and will be co-opted into the process.

---

475 See U.S. CONST. art. II, § 4 ("The President, Vice President, and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."); U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 3 ("No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office [that has] engaged in insurrection or rebellion . . . .").

476 Josh Blackman, Trump Acts Like a Politician. That's Not an Impeachable Offense, N.Y. TIMES (Jan. 23, 2020), https://www.nytimes.com/2020/01/23/opinion/trump-impeachment-defense.html [https://perma.cc/D5GG-RLA4].

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

D. Enemies are not coextensive with insurrectionists or rebels

Baude and Paulsen suggest that the word "enemies" is a similar term or has a largely overlapping scope to "insurrection or rebellion."[477] Therefore, they contend, a covered person may be disqualified under Section 3 by giving aid and comfort to an insurrection.[478] To their credit, Baude and Paulsen develop at some length the meaning of "rebellion" and "insurrection."[479] They illustrate the views of different authorities, and explain how the terms may be coextensive or overlapping. We do not contest that research here.[480] Yet, Baude and Paulsen have surprisingly little to say about how to identify "enemies." Instead, they wrote:

> Finally, aid or comfort to whom? "[T]he enemies thereof." We believe that "enemies" as employed in Section Three, embraces enemies both foreign and domestic. That now-familiar phrase ("enemies foreign and domestic") comes from the "Ironclad Oath," written into law in 1862, in the midst of the Civil War, and it seems clear from the political context of Section Three, enacted in the wake of a domestic civil war, that domestic enemies are enemies. It is almost unthinkable that Confederate rebels would not have been thought "enemies" in the sense employed by the text. Given the history and context of Section Three "enemies" seems to include the domestic rebels and insurrectionists just described earlier in the sentence.[481]

Here Baude and Paulsen state a conclusion: "enemies" would include Civil War rebels and insurrectionists, but they do not actually identify who (or what) is or is not an "enemy," in the abstract, apart from the Civil War. Their conclusion is likely correct in the context of the Civil War. Although we suggest they are correct, in regard to many potential Section 3-defendants from that era, it is not because "enemy" and "insurrectionist" are always co-extensive or overlapping categories.

---

477 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 68.

478 Id.

479 Id. at 64–69.

480 Id.

481 Id. at 68.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Rather, Section 3-covered persons from the Civil War era faced dual liability under each Section 3 prong in connection with the particular facts and circumstances of the Civil War: they both (i) engaged in insurrection and (ii) gave aid or comfort to enemies.

A key difficulty with Baude and Paulsen's position is that they do not offer any developed position as to what defines an enemy. (In much the same fashion, Baude and Paulsen insist the President is an "Officer of the United States" without ever identifying what an "Officer of the United States" is.)[482] Baude and Paulsen's failure to define the term "enemy," outside the context of Section 3-covered confederates, is an omission, and we think a substantial one. They insist that Section 3 is a clause for all seasons, and it is not limited to the Civil War.[483] But their analysis is so limited. This omission is even more significant because there is law and scholarship expounding on the meaning of enemy. And that jurisprudence predates the Civil War and was developed during the Civil War.

We make four points. First, we settle some terminology. An "enemy" is a nation that the United States is at war with. Enemies can only exist during a war. Not all insurrections or rebellions amount to war. Therefore, in the absence of a war, there can be no enemies. Likewise, treason can only be committed in relation to a war.

Second, these principles were reflected by the Union's prosecution of the Civil War in the courts and on the battlefield. Though the Civil War was not a declared war, it was still a de facto war. Most confederates who supported the (purported) de facto confederate government were insurrectionists and gave aid or comfort to an enemy. As a result, many Civil War-era Section 3-covered persons would have been subject to disqualification under both prongs of Section 3's offense element.

Third, this background demonstrates that the word "enemy" is not coextensive or overlapping with insurrection or rebellion. Baude and Paulsen's rationale for grafting Section 3's "aid or comfort" language onto "rebellion and insurrection" must fail.

Fourth, Baude and Paulsen's are laser-focused on the Civil War and January 6, but disregard other historical and political events. (In much the same fashion, they are laser-focused on whether the President is an "officer of the United States," but offer no attempt to define that term in the abstract.) Such myopia disregards a basic premise of self-governance: secession movements may be lawful, and not traitorous. Today, many Puerto Ricans seek independence from the United States,

---

[482] Id. at 104–11.

[483] Id. at 16.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

without fear of treason charges. A century ago, Filipinos likewise sought independence from the United States. Around the world, secession movements in the United Kingdom (i.e., Brexit), Scotland (i.e., from the United Kingdom), and other jurisdictions and would-be jurisdictions are supported by loyal citizens. This longstanding history further demonstrates why Baude and Paulsen misunderstand the relationship between secession and Section 3.

1. Defining the terminology: enemy, war, and treason

Here, we will define three primary terms and related topics. First, we define an "enemy." An "enemy" is an "enemy nation" and, sometimes, an "enemy national." Second, we demonstrate that enemies can only exist during a war. Third, we explain that treason can only be committed in relation to a war.

a. Who or what is an enemy?

An "enemy," on some occasions is used to refer to an "enemy nation." An enemy nation is a nation that your country is at war with. An enemy nation could be a nation de jure, as in an internationally recognized country, or a nation de facto, as in a nation lacking the indicia of international recognition. Whatever sort of nation it is–it is only an enemy if it is at war with your own.

In regard to individuals, who is an "enemy"? It is not the case that any crime, even a felony, makes one an "enemy" of the United States. Customarily, a person who commits a crime is termed a wrongdoer, offender, or, depending on the character of the crime, a felon. We submit an "enemy" is something substantially different.

The Constitution of 1788 includes the word "enemies" in the Treason Clause: "Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort."[484] "Enemy," as used in the Treason Clause was, and remains, a term from international law.[485] There are two senses

---

[484] U.S. CONST. art. III, § 3, cl. 1 (emphasis added).

[485] United States v. Greathouse, 26 F. Cas. 18, 22 (C.C.N.D. Calif. 1863) (No. 15,254) ("The term 'enemies' as used in the second clause [of the Treason Clause], according to its settled meaning, at the time the constitution was adopted, applies only to the subjects of a foreign power in a state of open hostility with us. It does not embrace rebels in insurrection against their own government. An enemy [national] is always the subject of a foreign power who owes no allegiance to our government or country. We may, therefore, omit all consideration of this second clause in the constitutional definition of treason.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

of the term enemies as applied to individuals. First, a national of an enemy nation is an enemy national. Second, a person living in territory controlled by an enemy nation is also sometimes characterized, considered, or treated as an enemy, even if his loyalties do not run to the de facto government.[486] We do not suggest that enemies as used in the Treason Clause in the Constitution of 1788 is coextensive with enemies as used in Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868). The former included enemy nations as well as enemy nationals, the latter only included enemy nations. We do not doubt that the so-called confederacy was an enemy nation for Section 3 purposes.

In the Prize Cases, the Supreme Court used "enemy" in both senses: an enemy is an enemy nation and also as an enemy national.[487] The Court construed as an enemy nation the (purported) confederacy, which was the de facto government in a de facto war with the United States. We carefully describe that (purported) government as "de facto." The (purported) confederate government controlled territory and asserted its independence. However, the United States did not recognize the (purported) Confederate States of America, and the United States sought to ensure that other nations did not do so either. The Court also construed as enemies the nationals of that enemy nation who were loyal to that (purported) government—that is, they gave "aid and comfort" to that nation. The Court also construed as enemies, for some purposes, those who were living in the territory that the enemy nation controlled.

Section 3 was drafted, passed by Congress, and ratified, several years after the Prize Cases was decided. Section 3 did not adopt both senses of "enemies."[488] Merely being a national living in an enemy nation, for example, would not trigger disqualification. We think residents of West Virginia (before it was organized as a loyal [486] See generally Ford v. Surget, 97 U.S. (7 Otto) 594, 604 (1878); see also Jennifer K. Elsea, CONG. RSCH. SERV., R42337, DETENTION OF U.S. PERSONS AS ENEMY BELLIGERENTS (2014); Larson, supra note 199, at 134 ("The Treason Clause carefully distinguishes between levying war and aiding enemies, because each defines a distinctive form of treason. The levying war provision looks inward, to internal rebellions. Persons who owe allegiance to the United States and rebel against it are not enemies, but traitors subject to prosecution for levying war. By contrast, the enemies provision looks outward; an enemy is always a foreign state, group, or person who owes no allegiance to the United States.").

---

[487] The Brig Amy Warwick (The Prize Cases), 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1863).

[488] 1 MATTHEW HALE, THE HISTORY OF PLEAS OF THE CROWN 159 (Sollom Emlyn ed., 1736) (affirming that only foreigners "come properly under the name of enemies").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

government) during the Civil War could fit this bill.[489] And what was true in West Virginia, was equally true for many parts of all or nearly all of the States under control of the (purported) confederacy. It was the case that some residents in States that (purportedly) seceded in fact remained loyal to the Union, and they did not grant aid and comfort to the (purported) confederate government. Rather, to trigger disqualification, it is necessary to give "aid or comfort" to enemies. Some affirmative act is required. Section 3 liability is only imposed for giving aid and comfort to enemies—no Section 3 liability is imposed for being an "enemy" or an "enemy" nation. This analysis establishes that, in Section 3, "enemies" refers exclusively to enemy nations, and not enemy nationals. Enemy nationals only face Section 3 liability if they give "aid or comfort" to an enemy. Professor Carlton Larson wrote "An enemy under the Treason Clause only exists if there is a declaration of war between the United States and a foreign nation, open hostilities between the United States and a foreign nation, or open hostilities between the United States and a foreign person or group."[490] He added, "Failure to understand this point contributes to the most significant misapprehensions of American treason law."[491] We suspect that Professor Larson is correct. But again, we do not suggest that enemies as used in the Treason Clause in the Constitution of 1788 is coextensive with enemies as used in Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868).

The Prizes Cases also provides some guidance on how to define the word enemy.[492] Justice Grier wrote for the Court, "But in defining the meaning of the term 'enemies' property,' we will be led into error if we refer to Fleta and Lord Coke for their definition of the word 'enemy.'"[493] Grier continued that "'enemies' property'" "is a technical phrase peculiar to prize courts, and depends upon principles of public policy, as distinguished from the common law."[494] Grier's language is opaque—to twenty-first century American lawyers, even to those immersed in English history and English common law. And, for reasons, we explain, perhaps, especially to them. But in 1863, it would have been otherwise. The background to understanding Grier was that

---

489 See Vasan Kesavan & Michael Stokes Paulsen, Is West Virginia Unconstitutional, 90 CAL. L. REV. 291 (2002).

490 Larson, supra note 199, at 135–36.

491 Id. at 135–36.

492 The Brig Amy Warwick (The Prize Cases), 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1863).

493 Id. at 674.

494 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

King James I, through his Attorneys-General for England and Wales, reviewed the Earl of Oxford's Case (1615).[495] In effect, the King was deciding which of two competing judgments, and, by implication, which of two competing legal systems, to uphold. The choice was between Coke's judgment, as Chief Justice of the King's Bench, or Lord Ellesmere's judgment, as Lord Chancellor. Coke was the expositor of the common law and the representative of the common law courts, and Ellesmere was the expositor of equitable principles and the Court of Chancery. The Earl of Oxford's Case established that, in the event of conflict between the two systems, equity prevails over the common law. Like Coke, Fleta or Fleta's treatise is another (much earlier) exposition of the common law of England. In rejecting Fleta and Coke, and the common law, Grier was, instead, looking to equity, natural law, and public international law as the proper sources to understand the Constitution's use of "enemies." As a matter of original public meaning, we suspect Grier was correct. To be sure, we do not know.

Baude and Paulsen cite Lord Coke in their discussion of what it means to give "aid or comfort" to "enemies."[496] In the Prize Cases, Justice Grier expressly disagrees with Coke's understanding.[497] Baude and Paulsen tell us that the Prize Cases were core to the intellectual background that informed Section 3.[498] The Prize Cases expressly reject using Coke as a source.[499] It seems inconsistent, then, for Baude and Paulsen to rely on Coke.

b. Enemies can only exist during an actual war, including de facto war, declared war or undeclared war

War—what is good for?[500] With regard to enemy status, absolutely everything. An enemy can only exist during a war. Thus, to

---

[495] The King's Order and Decree in Chancery (1616), 21 Eng. Rep. 61, Cary 115, affirming Earl of Oxford's Case, 21 Eng. Rep. 485 (Eng. Ct. Ch. 1615) (Ellesmere LC), http://www.commonlii.org/uk/cases/EngR/1615/2.pdf. As is well known, the King used "take care" language in his decree. See generally Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66; Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77. [SETH: I HAVE REJECTED YOUR PROPOSED CHANGE: leave in everything following "affirming".]

[496] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 71.

[497] The Brig Amy Warwick (The Prize Cases), 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635, 674 (1863).

[498] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 84.

[499] 67 U.S. at 674.

[500] EDWIN STARR, WAR, Genius, https://genius.com/Edwin-starr-war-lyrics (1970).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

define enemy, we must examine the term war. War might include a publicly declared war or an undeclared war. And just as not every crime is a felony, and not every felony is an insurrection or rebellion, not every insurrection or rebellion is a war. The sine qua non of liability based on enemy status was the existence of actual war. This principle was recognized in the seriatim opinions in Bas v. Tingy,[501] which "comes as close as the Supreme Court has ever come to providing a definition for the term 'war.'"[502]

The Prize Cases observed that neutrals "have a right to enter the ports of a friendly nation for the purposes of trade and commerce, but are bound to recognize the rights of a belligerent engaged in actual war, to use this mode of coercion, for the purpose of subduing the enemy."[503] Actual war was sufficient to establish enemy-based/war-based liability. That rule covered the Civil War, which was a de facto war among combatants that did not recognize one another. Such a war was sufficient to establish liability based on enemy status. In the Prize

---

[501] Bas v. Tingy, 4 U.S. 37, 39 (1800) (Moore, J.) ("But, if words are the representatives of ideas, let me ask, by what other word the idea of the relative situation of America and France could be communicated, than by that of hostility, or war? And how can the characters of the parties engaged in hostility or war, be otherwise described than by the denomination of enemies?"); id. at 41 (Washington, J.) ("In support of this position, it has been observed, that in no law prior to March 1799, is France styled our enemy, nor are we said to be at war. This is true; but neither of these things were necessary to be done: because as to France, she was sufficiently described by the title of the French republic; and as to America, the degree of hostility meant to be carried on, was sufficiently described without declaring war, or declaring that we were at war. Such a declaration by congress, might have constituted a perfect state of war, which was not intended by the government."); id. at 44 (Chase, J.) ("As there may be a public general war, and a public qualified war; so there may, upon correspondent principles, be a general enemy, and a partial enemy. The designation of 'enemy' extends to a case of perfect war; but as a general designation, it surely includes the less, as well as the greater, species of warfare. If congress had chosen to declare a general war, France would have been a general enemy; having chosen to wage a partial war, France was, at the time of the capture, only a partial enemy; but still she was an enemy."). See generally 1 MATTHEW HALE, THE HISTORY OF PLEAS OF THE CROWN 164 (Sollom Emlyn ed., 1736) ("[S]o that an enemy extends farther than a king or state in enmity, namely an alien coming into England in hostility," and further explaining that in order to establish adherence to an enemy there must be a war).

[502] See MICHAEL W. MCCONNELL, THE PRESIDENT WHO WOULD NOT BE KING: EXECUTIVE POWER UNDER THE CONSTITUTION 198 (2020).

[503] The Brig Amy Warwick (The Prize Cases), 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635, 665–66 (1863).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Cases, the Supreme Court treated the Civil War as a de facto war.[504] The Court made this finding, i.e., the existence of a state of war, in substantial part, based on the fact that the courts of the de jure government had been closed by the insurgents.[505]

Our position can be summarized in five points. First, Section 3-liability premised on the enemies prong is based on the existence of an enemy. Second, Section 3-liability can be premised on a war among combatants who recognize one another or combatants who do not recognize one another, but there must be some actual war. Third, Section 3-liability can be premised on a war that is a declared war or an undeclared war, but there must be some actual war. Fourth, Section 3-based liability, as the text states, does not extend to being an enemy; liability only extends to giving an enemy aid or comfort. Fifth, an "enemy" in everyday English usage could be used to refer to enemy nations or enemy nationals, but in Section 3 "enem[y]" only refers to an enemy nation and liability is premised on giving that wartime enemy nation aid or comfort. If our analysis is correct, then Baude and Paulsen have erred in mapping the second prong's "aid and comfort" language onto the first prong's "insurrection or rebellion" language. Why? Because liability under the second prong is premised on actual war, and liability under the first prong only requires an insurrection or rebellion, which do not require an actual war.

c. Treason can only be committed during an actual or de facto war

The Constitution defines treason in only two fashions—both of which require a state of war. First, as "consist[ing] . . . in levying War against" the United States.[506] And second, "in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort."[507] This second prong refers to enemy nations that the United States is at war with. If there is no war—whether actual or de facto—there are no "enemies." It is impossible to 504 Id. at 667 ("'A civil war,' says Vattel, 'breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge.").

---

505 Id. at 667, 670.

506 U.S. CONST. art. III, § 3, cl. 1.

507 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

commit treason absent a war.[508] This principle was followed in the wake of the American Revolution.[509]

However, not all support of enemy nations would constitute treason. The Treason Clause imposes a relatively exacting standard. Moreover, not all conduct that may disqualify a person under Section 3 would constitute treason. In some ways, Section 3 liability was substantially wider than what was permitted under the Treason Clause. Specifically, the "aid or comfort" prong of Section 3 was not coextensive with the outer bounds of the crime of treason as defined by the Treason Clause. We put forward three reasons in defense of this position.

First, Section 3 does not characterize the "aid or comfort" prong as treason. The subject of treason was on everyone's mind immediately before, during, and after the Civil War. Indeed, Jefferson Davis, the former president of the (purported) confederacy was indicted on charges of treason. The Civil War was considered a de facto undeclared war. There does not need to be a declared war to support a treason charge. However, the Framers of Section 3 did not use the word "treason." Why? We can surmise that the provision was not designed to disqualify people from Section 3-covered positions based on treason, which was a traditional criminal offense. For example, the "aid or comfort" prong referred to a lesser wrong.

---

[508] See also Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75, 126 (1807) (Marshall, C.J.) ("Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.' To constitute that specific crime for which the prisoners now before the court have been committed, war must be actually levied against the United States. However flagitious may be the crime of conspiring to subvert by force the government of our country, such conspiracy is not treason.") (emphasis added).

[509] See Respublica v. Chapman, 1 U.S. (1 Dall.) 53, 57 (Pa. 1781) ("Locke says, that when the Executive is totally dissolved, there can be no treason; for laws are a mere nullity; unless there is a power to execute them. But that is not the case at present . . . for before the meeting of Council in March, 1777, all its members were chosen, and the legislature was completely organized: so that there did antecedently exist a power competent to redress grievances, to afford protection, and, generally, to execute the laws; and allegiance being naturally due to such a power, we are of opinion, that from the moment it was created, the crime of High Treason might have been committed by any person, who was then a subject of the Commonwealth."); see also Josh Blackman, Essay, Original Citizenship, 159 U. PA. L. REV. PENNUMBRA 95, 113 (2010) ("A person deemed to be a subject of England could wage war against America, and could not be found guilty of treason, for his loyalty lay with the crown. In contrast, a disloyal citizen of the United States could be prosecuted for treason, for his loyalty was to the United States.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Second, the Treason Clause's second- or enemies-prong required that a defendant adher[ed] to their enemies and g[ave] their enemies "aid and comfort."[510] We suggest Treason requires both elements: "adhering to" was the criminal intent, and "aid and comfort" was the actus reus.[511] But Section 3 had no intent language. If a covered person gave "aid or comfort" to an enemy, but did not adhere to the enemies, he may be disqualified pursuant to Section 3, but would not be liable for treason. Thus, a Section 3 disqualification based on Section 3's second- or enemies-prong was not tantamount to establishing the elements of treason. In consequence, Section 3-liability did not carry the same moral opprobrium that attached to treason.

Finally, treason under the Constitution required proof that the defendant gave "aid and comfort." However, Section 3 only required "aid or comfort." The threshold for establishing treason is higher than the threshold or establishing disqualification under Section 3. Again, Section 3 liability under Section 3's second- or enemies-prong was not predicated on establishing treason or any other established crime. Because no known crime is associated with Section 3's second prong, and certainly not treason, a defendant did not enjoy an established right to all the standard criminal law defenses and all the customary constitutional safeguards, protections, and procedures–substantive and procedural connected to alleged violations of federal criminal law. By contrast, liability under the first prong was characterized as criminal wrongdoing: insurrection or rebellion. The federal criminal statute prohibiting insurrection was signed by President Lincoln before the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[512] (To date, as far as we know, no one involved in January 6 has been charged with violating this statute.[513])

The first prong relates to criminal liability and the second prong does not. For these two reasons, and others, Baude and Paulsen err by mapping the second prong's relatively expansive "aid or comfort" language back on to the first prong's relatively narrow "engage" language.

Baude and Paulsen also err in regard to treason. They assert that "In one of many strange asides, Chase noted the possibility that Section

---

510 See also Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1, 6 (1945) (Jackson, J.).

511 See also id.

512 The modern version of that statute appears at 18 U.S.C. § 2383. We discussed this statute in Blackman & Tillman, supra note 7, at 200.

513 Josh Blackman, What The Trump Indictment Left Out, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Aug. 1, 2023, 11:22 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/08/01/what-the-trump-indictment-left-out/.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Three had implicitly repealed the Treason Clause. . . ."[514] Chase was not referring to the Treason Clause of the Constitution. He was referring to the Treason Act, which President Lincoln signed into law in 1862. That was the statute that Jefferson Davis was indicted under. This conflation also mistakes how the Treason Clause operates. The Constitution's Treason Clause restricted how Congress may define treason, and it restricted what evidence and procedures would support such a charge. The Treason Clause was not self-executing. Only Congress could put it into effect, and the States had no coordinate power to define treason against the United States. If Chase had held that Section 3 superseded the Treason Clause, then that would have expanded congressional power to define treason. If anything, Chase was suggesting that Section 3 limited the scope of Congress's treason statute. We think this is yet another example of how Baude and Paulsen have misunderstood Chase and his thinking.

We also suggest that Baude and Paulsen's position may actually provide some support for Chase's conclusion regarding the treason statute. Jefferson Davis's lawyers argued that Section 3 displaced all federal criminal treason-related prosecutions in favor of disqualification as the exclusive punishment for those falling within Section 3's reach. If Baude and Paulsen are correct that Section 3 modified statutory law, such as federal habeas law,[515] why couldn't Section 3 also modify other statutory law, such as the treason statute? We do not endorse that argument. We merely point out Baude and Paulsen provide no fixed rule, or even any stopping point, explaining how to determine what prior law, including constitutional law and statutory law, was upset by Section 3. Once we start from the Baude-Paulsen presumption that Section 3 reached back, with the potential of upsetting all facets of federal law, even retroactively, Davis's and Chase's (purported) position in the Case of Jefferson Davis cannot be rejected out of hand.[516]

2. Section 3's two prongs mirror the Union's dual-track legal theory for prosecuting the Civil War

During and after the Civil War, the Union's law officers followed a dual-track legal theory to prosecute the war and to punish

---

[514] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 43.

[515] See supra section II(B)(4).

[516] See supra section II(B)(5).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Civil War era wrongdoing.[517] The first track permitted criminal prosecutions. Americans and foreigners who engaged in insurrection or rebellion (or worse) could be prosecuted as criminals. And Americans and, in certain circumstances, foreigners who adhered to the (purported) confederacy, and gave that enemy nation "aid and comfort," could be prosecuted for treason. (Again, Jefferson Davis was charged with treason.) Generally, former confederates who faced sanctions for insurrection could also be liable for treason.

Criminals and traitors were prosecuted through the criminal law in civilian courts. The government could charge those captured in the field, as well as those who were part of the planning stage. The government could also charge those who supported and maintained the (purported) confederacy's armies and militias in the field. An alleged criminal would have the benefit of traditional criminal law defenses: voluntariness, duress, incapacity, etc. However, very few captured rebels were tried in civilian courts.

The second track relied on military force. The Union fought the (purported) confederacy as an enemy nation. In doing so, the Union was not recognizing the (purported) confederacy under international law, much less recognizing the legitimacy of secession. Rather, the Union recognized the existence of a de facto war against a de facto government. This limited recognition of actual belligerency in the field permitted the Union to take actions in regard to persons and property that were not otherwise permitted in peacetime, but were permitted in war time as a matter of international law. And this authority was supplemented by the Lieber Code, which was the military law that governed the Union Army. This authority was also supplemented by constitutionally granted presidential war powers, and by acquiescence and affirmative actions by Congress generally. This authority was also supplemented by extant statutory authorities, such as e.g. the Militia Acts and Insurrection Acts, as amended. It was a messy legal theory in a messy war.

The Prize Cases (1863) and other Civil War era federal cases recognized these principles.

The Union's dual track theory of the Civil War expanded the lawful options available to the Union's military and civilian courts and administrators. First, the Union's law officers contended that captured rebels could be tried as criminals in civilian courts for federal statutory crimes. It was on this authority that Jefferson Davis was indicted following the Civil War. (As we discussed above, Chief Justice Chase

---

[517] See JAMES G. RANDALL, CONSTITUTIONAL PROBLEMS UNDER LINCOLN (rev. ed. 1964).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

presided over that trial in federal court.) Second, the Union's law officers contended that captured military rebels could be tried in military tribunals for war crimes. Captain Henry Wirz, for example, was tried before a United States Military Commission in Washington.[518] Wirz was convicted, and he was sentenced to death.[519] Third, the Union also contended that captured rebels could be detained, as prisoners of war under the law of land warfare–at least until hostilities concluded. For example, confederate prisoners of war were held by the Union at Camp Douglas in Illinois.[520] There was another possibility, at the margins of the law. In theory, civilians loyal to the (purported) confederacy might have been detained as enemy nationals. This status was provided in the Enemy Aliens Act of 1798, one of the several acts later known as the Alien and Sedition Acts enacted during the Adams Administration. But the Union did not follow this path.

Section 3's two disqualification prongs mirrored the Union's dual-track legal theories for prosecuting the war and for punishing Civil

---

[518] The Trial of Captain Henry Wirz, reprinted in 8 AMERICAN STATE TRIALS 657 (John D. Lawson ed., 1917), https://perma.cc/55BQ-AQDP.

[519] Myth: Henry Wirz was the Only Person Tried for War Crimes in the Civil War, NAT'L PARK SERV., https://www.nps.gov/ande/learn/historyculture/wirztribunal.htm (Apr. 14, 2015). Jefferson Davis was, perhaps, the most famous person indicted and tried for treason against the U.S. before a U.S. civilian court for Civil War activities. Davis was not alone. See, e.g., United States v. Greathouse, 26 F. Cas. 18 (C.C.N.D. Calif. 1863) (No. 15,254) (Field, Circuit Justice and Hoffman, District Judge) (convicted by jury, sentenced to imprisonment, and commuted by President Lincoln); United States v. Greiner, 26 F. Cas. 36 (E.D. Pa. 1861) (No. 15,262)(Cadwalader, District Judge and Grier, Circuit Justice) (discharged from custody based on a surety of $10,000 and recognizance to keep the peace and obey the laws). President Johnson's amnesty terminated the Case of Jefferson Davis. As far as we know, William Mumford was the only person tried, convicted, and executed for treason against the U.S. for Civil War activities—but Mumford was convicted by a wartime military tribunal, and not in a civilian court. The Union's lack of interest in treason prosecutions goes some way to explain why Chase may have believed that Section 3 superseded federal treason prosecutions. Chase was being practical; his rulings were in line with the loyal population's sentiment—or, so he may have believed.

[520] DENNIS KELLY, A HISTORY OF CAMP DOUGLAS, ILLINOIS UNION PRISON, 1861–1865, at 5. But cf. Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 554 (2004) (Scalia, J., dissenting) ("Where the Government accuses a citizen of waging war against it, our constitutional tradition has been to prosecute him in federal court for treason or some other crime. Where the exigencies of war prevent that, the Constitution's Suspension Clause, Art. I, § 9, cl. 2, allows Congress to relax the usual protections temporarily. Absent suspension, however, the Executive's assertion of military exigency has not been thought sufficient to permit detention without charge.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

War era wrongdoing. Section 3 could disqualify those who engaged in insurrection and rebellion, and those who gave aid or comfort to the enemy. There is no secret code here. Section 3 was expansive in that Section 3-covered persons could be disqualified from public positions in two ways: (i) under the first prong based on criminal law violations encumbered by traditional constitutional protections, or (ii) under the second prong's enemies-language. But the sine qua non of being an enemy or giving an enemy aid and comfort demands a war.

3. Baude and Paulsen err by mapping the "aid and comfort" prong onto the insurrection prong

An "enemy" can be an insurrectionist. And an insurrectionist can be an "enemy." We think many former confederates fit both descriptions during the Civil War. But in the abstract, the word "enemy" is not coextensive or overlapping with one who committed insurrection or rebellion. They are not coextensive terms, and they are not overlapping terms. A person can be guilty of the crimes of insurrection or rebellion absent a war, and a person can give aid or comfort to an enemy nation absent involvement in any insurrection or rebellion. Consider a hypothetical: a U.S. national aids a foreign nation in mounting a foreign invasion on the United States. That person could be liable for giving aid and comfort to enemies, but he would not be liable for engaging in insurrection or rebellion. But a person cannot give aid or comfort to an enemy nation absent a war. It is actual war that gives an enemy the character of being an enemy. And such a war includes declared and undeclared wars, among combatants who recognize one another and among combatants who do not.

Baude and Paulsen write: "As the Prize Cases teach, not every insurrection or rebellion ripens into a full-fledged war."[521] We agree. And this is another good reason not to rewrite the two prongs of Section 3: the first prong focuses on insurrection and rebellion, and the second focuses on enemies and war. Because not every insurrection is a war, one cannot map the second prong's "aid or comfort" language onto the first prong's "insurrection or rebellion" prong.

Judge McConnell likewise observed that the phrase "giving aid or comfort" is "reserved for giving aid and comfort to the 'enemies' of the United States, which has historically meant enemies in war."[522] We

---

[521] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 113.

[522] Eugene Volokh, Prof. Michael McConnell, Responding About the Fourteenth Amendment, "Insurrection," and Trump, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Aug. 12, 2023, 6:58 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/08/12/prof-michael-

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

agree. For these reasons, Baude and Paulsen's rationale for grafting Section 3's "aid or comfort" language onto "rebellion and insurrection" does not succeed.

4. Not all secessionists are insurrectionists or enemies

There is another reason to reject Baude and Paulsen's characterization of Section 3-based liability. They write that "Conduct participating in, advancing, supporting, or assisting either secession or armed resistance to U.S. authority constituted 'engaging in' or giving 'aid or comfort to' the Union's enemies."[523] We think this statement cannot be directed against all secession movements, and not even against all secession movements directed towards seceding from the United States.

Secession in 1861 was wrongful because it was unilateral in character, illegal in how it was carried out, and violent. It was not only violent. It was not only an insurrection and rebellion. It was a war–a civil war. But not all secessions take that character–not all are wrongful, unilateral, illegal, and amount to war-making.

Baude and Paulsen quote from Lincoln's March 4, 1861 inaugural address.[524] Lincoln stated: "It follows from these views that no State upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void, and that acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances."[525] Lincoln did not reject secession in all regards. Rather, he objected to the particulars of the secessions of the (purported) confederacy because of its unilateral, violent, and illegal character. Yet, Baude and Paulsen characterize secession per se as amounting to a Section 3 violation. That reading cannot be squared with Lincoln's own understanding of the Civil War.

Baude and Paulsen's broad understanding of Section 3 would brand members of many pacific and lawful secession movements as enemies, traitors, or worse. Let's start with Puerto Rico. Recently, Justice Sotomayor discussed at some length the independence mcconnell-responding-about-the-fourteenth-amendment-insurrection-and-trump/.

---

523 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 74 (emphasis added).

524 Id. at n.228 (citing 2 ABRAHAM LINCOLN, SPEECHES & WRITINGS, 1859–1865: SPEECHES, LETTERS, MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS, PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGES & PROCLAMATIONS 217–18).

525 Id. (emphasis added).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

movement in Puerto Rico, which was grounded in domestic law, international law, and popular sovereignty.[526] Justice Sotomayor did not offer even the slightest intimation that people who favored independence could be seen as "'engaging in' or giving 'aid or comfort to' the Union's enemies."[527] In 2022, the United States House of Representatives passed a bill that would allow Puerto Rico to hold a binding referendum on statehood or independence.[528] Were the representatives who supported that bill giving aid and comfort to the enemy? Of course not. Imagine if the governor of Puerto Rico had at some point taken a Section 3 oath, and then he openly supported and presided over a territorial secession convention for Puerto Rico. If that convention failed, and Puerto Rico became a state, would the governor be disqualified under Section 3 from serving in the United States Senate? Did he support an insurrection? Give aid or comfort to enemies? We think the answers to all of these questions must be emphatically no. (Hint: because there was no war in our hypothetical!)

Let's go further back in time. William Howard Taft was the Governor General of the Philippines, a United States territory, from 1901–1903.[529] Taft had previously served as a federal circuit court judge, and he had taken an oath to the Constitution. What if Taft, as Governor General of the Philippines, had voiced political support for political disunion? Imagine he simply entertained a meeting with members of the community who opposed the Philippine's continuing status in the United States, and as a territory within the United States. And imagine that meeting gave legitimacy to a nascent secession movement. Would Taft, in Baude and Paulsen's words, have "assisted" a "secession" to "U.S." authority, and thus given "aid and comfort" to 526 Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. for P.R. v. Aurelius Inv., LLC, 140 S. Ct. 1649, 1677 (2020) (Sotomayor, J., concurring) ("Thus, in the eyes of the international community looking in, as well as of the Federal Government looking out, Puerto Rico has long enjoyed autonomous reign over its internal affairs. Indeed, were the Federal Government's representations to the United Nations merely aspirational, the United States' compliance with its international legal obligations would be in substantial doubt.").

---

527 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 74.

528 Farnoush Amiri & Danica Coto, House approves referendum to 'decolonize' Puerto Rico, ASSOCIATED PRESS (Dec. 15, 2022, 2:30 PM), https://apnews.com/article/referendums-puerto-rico-b96884274da9c970e710b6d7d2f65a4d.

529 William Howard Taft, ENCYC. BRITTANICA (Sept. 11, 2023), https://www.britannica.com/biography/William-Howard-Taft.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the Union's enemies? Would Taft have been disqualified under Section 3? Again, we think the answer is emphatically no.[530]

Now, let's look overseas. Many secession movements were completely lawful and completely pacific. Would those who supported Brexit be deemed traitors? Only a very foolish person would suggest that Scots voting for or against independence from the United Kingdom were somehow anything but loyal and law-abiding. What about the breakup of Czechoslovakia?

Liability based on Section 3's second prong is limited to those who give "aid and comfort" to the enemies of the United States in relation to an actual war, and it does not extend to those engaging in normal democratic politics. Secession in 1861 was not normal democratic politics. But secession, in the abstract, can be, and it frequently is normal democratic politics. This point reflects a broader criticism of Baude and Paulsen's article. They approach Section 3 from two very important, but very narrow vantage points: the American Civil War and Washington, D.C. on January 6. They attempt to pigeonhole the language of Section 3 to fit neatly into those two events. But their theory only fits well into one. The language designed in consequence of the Civil War experience is not a tight fit for all subsequent events. The language that Section 3's second prong spoke to was in relation to wartime enemies. And there is nothing in Section 3 which suggests that all secession movements are created equal.

***

Does our analysis about the scope of Section 3's offense element prove that Baude and Paulsen are wrong? We think they are wrong. At the very least, we think they need to be more forthcoming and define the scope of Section 3's "enemies" language. We also think they need to define the scope of the Section 3's "office" and "officer" language–the issue to which we now turn.

---

[530] In reality, Taft "became the unofficial leader of a 'retentionist' movement to stop the US Democratic Party from making any firm promise of future independence for the islands, which he saw as a 'policy of scuttle.'" Adam D. Burns, Retentionist in Chief: William Howard Taft and the Question of Philippine Independence, 1912-1916, 61 PHIL. STUD.: HIST. & ETHNOGRAPHIC VIEWPOINTS 163, 163 (2013), https://www.jstor.org/stable/42634756 [https://perma.cc/RU4S-BH36]. But other Section 3-covered positions, including several members of Congress, favored independence for the Philippines.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

V. Is the President an "Officer of the United States" for purposes of Section 3?

So far, we have addressed two necessary conditions to finding that a person is disqualified under Section 3. First, is Section 3 self-executing, such that it can be enforced in the absence of any federal legislation? Second, can a Section 3 disqualification be triggered if a person gives aid and comfort to an insurrection? Contra Baude and Paulsen, for both of these questions, we do not think that all or even most of the originalist evidence points towards a yes answer. In Part V, we will address another threshold question: which types of positions are covered by Section 3? Section 3 applies to a person "who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any state legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state, to support the Constitution of the United States . . . ."

What is the meaning of the phrase "officer of the United States" in Section 3? Baude and Paulsen address this question from a singular focus: is the President (the position that Donald Trump held) an "officer of the United States." They offer no theory at all to determine which other positions fit within the scope of this language. Indeed, they raise the atextualist argument that the phrase "Officer of the United States" in Section 3 is indistinguishable from the phrase "Office . . . under the United States," which is also used in Section 3. If they were writing on a blank slate, perhaps this position would be understandable. But Tillman, and later Blackman, have been writing on this position for some time. Indeed, some seven years ago, Baude publicly praised Tillman's scholarship on the Constitution's "office"- "and "officer"-language.

In their article, Baude and Paulsen summarily dismiss our position. Baude and Paulsen contend that our textualist approach is "hidden-meaning[] hermeneutic[s]" that renders Section 3 "a 'secret code' loaded with hidden meanings discernible only by a select priesthood of illuminati."[531] Baude and Paulsen do not address the evidence we put forward, instead choosing to disparage our position in hyperbolic terms. We suppose we are in good company, as Baude and Paulsen use the same sort of charged language against us, as they used against Chief Justice Chase.

---

[531] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 104, 108.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

There is no secret code. Our 2021 article cites sources from the period roughly contemporaneous with ratification to support the position that the President is not an Officer of the United States. During an 1876 impeachment trial, a Senator said, "the President is not an officer of the United States."[532] An election law treatise from 1878 stated "[i]t is obvious that . . . the President is not regarded as 'an officer of, or under, the United States,' but as one branch of 'the Government.'"[533] This position has support in jurisprudence from Justice Story to Chief Justice Roberts.

Baude and Paulsen pay very little attention to the most obvious source of the meaning of the "office"-language in Section 3: the same and similar language in the Constitution of 1788. Section 3 resembles the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause, which uses the phrase "Officers . . . of the United States." The President does not take an Article VI Oath. Instead, he has always taken his own Article II oath. The conventional view is that the President is not an "Officer of the United States" for purposes of the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause. Baude and Paulsen also fail to address other provisions of the Constitution of 1788 that use the phrase "Officers of the United States": the Impeachment Clause, the Appointments Clause, and the Commissions Clause. The conventional view is that in each provision, the President is not included under the aegis of the term, "Officers of the United States."

Instead of parsing the Constitution of 1788, they focus on original intentions and consequentialism. These sorts of arguments do not pass originalist muster. All of the usual rejoinders to original intentions and consequentialism—which are well known to originalist debates—apply here with full force. More pressingly, Baude and Paulsen fail to account for our evidence concerning the original meaning of the phrase "Officers of the United States," and instead rely on scattered statements concerning other language, such as "Office . . . under the United States." Further, Baude and Paulsen fail to fully address the positions that were enumerated in Section 3, which suggests

---

[532] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD CONTAINING THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE SITTING FOR THE TRIAL OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP, LATE SECRETARY OF WAR, ON THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT EXHIBITED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES 145 (Washington, Government Printing Office 1876) (reproducing May 27, 1876 statement of Newton Booth, Senator from California)

[533] DAVID A. MCKNIGHT, THE ELECTORAL SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES: A CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL EXPOSITION OF ITS FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES IN THE CONSTITUTION, AND OF THE ACTS AND PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS ENFORCING IT 346 (Philadelphia, J.B. Lippincott & Co. 1878) (emphasis added)

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

that the Framers did not purport to include all positions in all regards. Section 3 was not all-encompassing. It did not cover the "waterfront."[534]

At bottom, Baude and Paulsen simply look away from contrary evidence. On this issue, it is simply not the case that "essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in [their] direction."[535] Indeed, much of the evidence points in our direction. And if the presidency is not an "Officer of the United States," then the full sweep and force of Section 3 cannot touch Trump.

A. There is no "secret code"

Baude and Paulsen dismiss our textualist approach as "hidden-meaning hermeneutics."[536] Baude and Paulsen reject our reading of Section 3, which apparently renders the provision "a 'secret code' loaded with hidden meanings discernible only by a select priesthood of illuminati."[537] They claim our support was written in "disappearing ink."[538]

Our reading is not "secret" at all, and our evidence is written in plain black-and-white text. Our 2021 article cites several sources from the period roughly contemporaneous with ratification to support the position that the President is not an Officer of the United States.[539] For example, we wrote:

> In 1876, the House of Representatives impeached Secretary of War William Belknap. During the trial, Senator Newton Booth from California observed, "the President is not an officer of the United States."[540] Instead, Booth stated, the President is "part of the Government."[541] Two years later, David McKnight 534 See Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 105 (opining that Section 3 "was designed to be reasonably comprehensive, covering the waterfront").

---

535 Id. at 103.

536 Id. at 108.

537 Id. at 104.

538 Id. at 109 n.393.

539 Blackman & Tillman, supra note 10, at 30.

540; BELKNAP, supra note 518 at 145. see also id. at 130 (reproducing May 25, 1876 statement of George Sewell Boutwell, Senator from Massachusetts, who stated: "[F]or according to the Constitution, as well as upon the judgment of eminent commentators, the President and Vice-President are not civil officers.").

541 Id. at 145.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> wrote an influential treatise on the American electoral system. He reached a similar conclusion. McKnight wrote that "[i]t is obvious that . . . the President is not regarded as 'an officer of, or under, the United States,' but as one branch of 'the Government.'"[542]

Maybe Booth and McKnight were right, or maybe they were wrong. No doubt, there are other competing authorities. The important point is that Booth and McKnight were not writing in "disappearing ink." They were not Illuminati priests. Booth was speaking on the Senate floor, and McKnight's writing appeared in a well-regarded treatise which continues to be cited nearly 150 years later. Both were speaking and writing to the American public. Nothing here is in any way secret or hidden or confined to a select priestly interpretive caste. Indeed, McKnight thought his position was "obvious." And Baude has studied and written about the Belknap impeachment trial, in which Senator Booth testified.[543] These sources were not hidden. Moreover, this position has been adopted by leading jurists who were not divining prophecies from entrails with a haruspex.[544] They were reading the same text we all are reading.

---

[542] MCKNIGHT, supra note 519 (emphasis added); see also Blackman & Tillman, supra note 10, at 30.

[543] Will Baude, Does the Chief Justice Preside over an Ex-President's Impeachment Trial?, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Jan. 15, 2021, 7:24 AM), https://reason.com/volokh/2021/01/15/does-the-chief-justice-preside-over-an-ex-presidents-impeachment-trial/.

[544] Former-Attorney General Mukasey wrote that the President is not an "Officer of the United States" for purposes of Section 3. Michael Mukasey, Opinion, Was Trump 'an Officer of the United States'?, WALL ST. J., (Sept. 7, 2023, 12:59 PM), https://wsj.com/articles/was-trump-an-officer-of-the-united-states-constitution-14th-amendment-50b7d26 ("The use of the term 'officer of the United States' in other constitutional provisions shows that it refers only to appointed officials, not to elected ones."); Steven Calabresi, Opinion, President Trump Can Not Be Disqualified, WALL ST. J. (Sept. 12, 2023, 4:30 PM), https://wsj.com/articles/trump-can-not-be-disqualified-14th-amendment-calabresi-16657a1b ("Former U.S. Attorney General Michael Mukasey's op-ed 'Was Trump "an Officer of the United States"?' (Sept. 8) has caused me to change my mind about an argument that I have had with Prof. Seth Barrett Tillman for 25 years. Mr. Mukasey is right: Looked at in the context of the Disqualification Clause of the 14th Amendment, the president is neither an 'officer of the United States,' nor, obviously, a 'member of Congress.' That must be why the Constitution prescribes a separate oath for the president."); Steven Calabresi, Donald Trump Should be on the Ballot and Should Lose, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY, https://reason.com/volokh/2023/09/16/steve-calabresi-donald-trump-should-be-on-the-ballot-and-should-lose/ (Sept. 16, 2023, 2:08 AM) ("I have now changed my mind and have concluded that since Trump was

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

We acknowledge that not everyone agrees with our position today,[545] and in the past. Still, we conclude that the interpretive issue here is a common one—it is the sort of question on which dispassionate, reasonable minds can disagree after having reviewed competing streams of authority, argument, and evidence. In addition to Booth and McKnight, our 2021 publication on Section 3 also discussed other contemporaneous authorities, as well as related antebellum and modern authorities. These authorities include Justice Joseph Story's celebrated Commentaries on the Constitution, and modern Supreme Court decisions, including one from Chief Justice Roberts, that support our position as to the scope of the Constitution's "Officer[] of the United States"-language. Far from a "secret code" or "hidden-meaning hermeneutics," our view was and remains well-known.

Baude and Paulsen do not acknowledge, consider, and balance these contrary authorities in any systematic fashion against their own preferred positions. Moreover, Baude and Paulsen pay very little attention to the most obvious source of the meaning of the "office"-language in Section 3: the same and similar language in the Constitution of 1788.

---

not 'an officer of the United States' on January 6, 2021, the Insurrection Clause does not apply to Trump. I am also much more doubtful than I was a week ago of the correctness of the University of Pennsylvania Law Review law review article by William Baude and Michael Paulsen, The Sweep and Force of Section Three, which argues that former President Trump is disqualified from running again for President. A draft law review article taking issue with Baude and Paulsen, co-written by Josh Blackman and Seth Barrett Tilman, entitled Sweeping and Forcing the President into Section 3: A Response to William Baude and Michael Stokes Paulsen makes a good case . . . that the Baude/Paulsen reading of Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is wrong. I think Josh Blackman and Seth Tillman are more likely right than not."); Adam Liptak, An About-Face on Whether the 14th Amendment Bars Trump From Office, N.Y. TIMES (Sept. 18, 2023, 5:02 AM), https://perma.cc/4ZNG-QKYM ("Professor Calabresi wrote that his thinking had been influenced by a new article posted on Tuesday by two other professors, Josh Blackman of South Texas College of Law Houston and Seth Barrett Tillman of Maynooth University in Ireland, who have long pressed arguments that some provisions of the Constitution do not cover the president.").

[545] Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Professor Akhil Amar, On His Podcast, Responds to Attorney General Mukasey and the Tillman-Blackman Position, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Sept. 14, 2023, 1:08 AM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/09/14/professor-akhil-amar-on-his-podcast-responds-to-attorney-general-mukasey-and-the-tillman-blackman-position/ (noting that Professor Amar called the Tillman–Blackman position "genuinely stupid," "embarrassing," "daft," "wrong," "silly," and more). It could be worse: Professor Amar refrained from calling our position "appalling" or "bonkers."

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

B. What about the Constitution of 1788?

Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment was not written on a blank slate. Compare the Oath of Affirmation Clause in Article VI with Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Oath or Affirmation Clause (1788)	Section 3 (1868)
"The [1] Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the [2] several State Legislatures, and [3] all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States [4] and of the several states, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution"	"No person . . . who having previously taken an oath, as a [1] member of Congress, or as [3] an officer of the United States, or as a [2] member of any state legislature, or as an [4] executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States. . . ."

Both provisions reference, in some fashion, the same four categories of office holders who swore an oath to support the Constitution: [1] Senators and Representatives, [2] members of the state legislatures, [3] executive and judicial officers of the United States, and [4] executive and judicial officers of the states.

We do note one subtle distinction between Article VI and Section 3. Article VI refers to "Senators and Representatives;" by contrast, Section 3 refers to "members of Congress." We are not surprised by this different choice of language. We are not surprised that Article VI made use of "Senators and Representatives"-language and that Section 3, by contrast, made use of "member of Congress"-language. In 1787–1788, when the Constitution was drafted, proposed, and ratified there were no members of Congress (under the Constitution of 1788). Article VI acted prospectively on these positions which were not yet filled by election—so the language of membership would have been less than exact. By contrast, Section 3 acted on extant institutions (e.g., Congress) with extant members. That may be why both Article VI and Section 3 referred to members of the state legislatures: a set of institutions and officials that were already in existence when the original Constitution and Section 3 went into effect. If we are correct, it illustrates that constitutional draftspersons, in 1787–1788 and 1866–1868, closely adhered to parliamentary drafting conventions.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

If these drafting conventions now appear to some like a secret code, it is: [i] because legislative drafting is no longer considered a central skill within the legal profession and among legal academics (who may never take a course in it, much less teach it), and [ii] more importantly, because of the decline of any continuity in Anglo-American (oral) parliamentary culture and the concomitant decline of the mimetic transfer of legal knowledge in favour of a judiciary-centred legal culture giving voice to separation of powers norms.[546]

Which position(s) is/are not mentioned in Article VI and in Section 3? Among others, the President. Perhaps there is a reason for both provisions' failing to expressly incorporate any reference to the President? We do not know whether Baude and/or Paulsen would suggest that the President is covered by the phrase "Officer[] of the United States" in the Article VI Oath of Affirmation Clause. No President has ever taken an Article VI oath, as defined by statute. Rather, presidents have always relied on their Article II oath. President Washington took his Article II oath before the first statutory oath was enacted.[547] Indeed, that bill could not have even become law until it was presented to President Washington.[548] These textual arguments, buttressed by an uninterrupted historical practice since President Washington, would seem to indicate that the President is not fairly encompassed by Article VI's "Officers of the United States"-language.

There may be yet another reason to conclude that the President is not fairly encompassed by Article VI's "Officers of the United States"-language. The presidential oath in Article II provides that the President "will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States." Article VI uses different language: a covered position "shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation,

---

[546] See also THOMAS JEFFERSON, A MANUAL OF PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE FOR THE USE OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES § 1 (Washington, D.C., Samuel Harrison Smith 1801) (starting his manual with: "Mr. Onslow, the ablest of the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say . . . ." (emphasis added)); cf. Haym Soloveitchik, Rupture and Reconstruction, 28 TRADITION 64 (1994) ("One learns best by being shown, that is to say, mimetically. When conduct is learned from texts, conflicting views about its performance proliferate, and the simplest gesture becomes acutely complicated."), https://traditiononline.org/rupture-and-reconstruction/. [seth: leave the subtitle out!]

[547] Seth Barrett Tillman & Josh Blackman, Offices and Officers of the Constitution, Part III: The Appointments, Impeachment, Commissions, and Oath or Affirmation Clauses, 62 S. TEX. L. REV. 349, 424–28 (2023) (discussing the oaths for President Washington, Vice President Adams, and the First Congress).

[548] An Act to regulate the Time and Manner of Administering certain Oaths, ch. 1, § 1, 1 Stat. 23, 23 (1789).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

to support this Constitution." Indeed, Section 3 uses very similar language: "to support the Constitution of the United States."[549] President Trump's attorneys contended that this different language provides further support for the position that the President's oath would not be covered by the oath provisions of Article VI and Section 3.[550]

And there is some good evidence to conclude that in the 1860s, the public would have recognized the similarities between the officer-language in the Oath or Affirmation Clause and the officer-language in Section 3. In 1867, Attorney General Stanbery wrote an opinion opining on the officer-language used in the not-then-yet ratified language of Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. With regard to state officers, Stanbery observed that the "same term of descriptions" was used in the first oaths statute, enacted in 1789, as was used in Section 3. Attorney General Stanbery was not an Illuminati priest. It is reasonable to conclude that the public would have likewise seen the similarities between the phrase "Officers of the United States" in the Oath or Affirmation Clause, and the phrase "Officer of the United States" in Section 3.

How would the public in 1868 have understood this language? Would they parse it in light of today's (that is, 1868's) meanings or by incorporating by reference—that is, transplanting the meanings from 1788 as a result of copying the 1788 language? We do not say this question has an obvious answer. Rather, we say it does not have an obvious one. If so, ambiguity leans against extending disqualifications. In examining the effect of this ambiguous language, then-Attorney General Stanbery wrote: "Those who are expressly brought within its operation cannot be saved from its operation. Where, from the generality of terms of description, or for any other reason, a reasonable doubt arises, that doubt is to be resolved against the operation of the

---

549 On the meaning of "this Constitution," see Cass R. Sunstein, This, 46 HARV. J. LAW & PUB. POL'Y 395 (2023). =

550 Respondent Donald J. Trump's Motion to Dismiss at 17, Anderson v. Griswold, No. 2023CV32577, 2023 WL 6446965 (Colo. Dist. Ct., Denver Cnty. Sept. 29, 2023) ("On one hand, the Constitution requires members of Congress and those appointed to offices under the United States to take an oath to' "support' the Constitution. On the other hand, the Constitution requires the President to take an oath to 'preserve, protect and defend' the Constitution. This difference is significant for two reasons. First, it shows that the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment did not understand or intend the President to be an Officer of the United States, because his oath does not require "support" of the Constitution. Second, taking an oath to support the Constitution further limits the class the people to whom Section Three applies, and President Trump (who never took such an oath) is not one of those people.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

law . . . ."[551] Here, we think Stanbery articulated the premises of the Democracy Canon.[552]

Furthermore, Stanbery was not a lone voice: early[553] and later commentators[554] on Section 3 indicated that the list of triggering positions, notwithstanding its "officer of the United States"-language, was coextensive with those who took the Article VI oath. Again, those commentators provide some good reason to exclude from the force of Section a president who to date had only taken the Article II oath.

Professor Mark Graber wrote that "No member of the Congress that drafted the Fourteenth Amendment distinguished between the presidential oath mandated by Article II and the oath of office for other federal and state officers mandated by Article VI." Again, Graber seems to disregard any evidence from outside the Thirty-Ninth Congress, including George Washington Paschal's 1868 treatise.[555] However, the evidence Graber cites does not support his categorical claim. For example, Graber stated, "Senator Garrett Davis of Kentucky saw no legal difference between the constitutional requirement that "all

---

[551] The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 141, 160 (1867).

[552] See generally Richard L. Hasen, The Democracy Canon, 62 STAN. L. REV. 69 (2009).

[553] See PASCHAL, supra note 255, at xxxviii (opining that the Article VI oath and Section 3 apply to "precisely the same class of officers"); id. at 250 n.242 (Section 3 is "based upon the higher obligation to obey th[e] [Article VI] oath"); id. at 494 (noting that the "persons included in this [Section 3] disability are the same who had taken an official oath under clause 3 of Article VI").

[554] See, e.g., GARRETT EPPS: READING THE U.S. CONSTITUTION 177–78 (2013) ("And political power, beyond the mere act of voting, would be withheld from that group of people who had sworn an individual oath before secession to support the Constitution and had then violated that oath by joining the Confederacy. There were three classes of such people: (1) former members of the United States Congress; (2) appointed federal officials and US military officers (both were 'officer[s] of the United States'); and (3) state officials, whether judges, legislators, or executive officials, who had taken the oath prescribed for all state officials in Article VI, Section Two, to regard the Constitution as 'the supreme law of the land.' If anyone meeting this description had joined the Confederate cause by 'engag[ing] in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or giv[ing] aid or comfort to the enemies thereof,' he was barred from certain political offices. These forbidden offices are, in order, (1) member of Congress; (2) presidential elector; (3) officer of the United States, meaning an appointed official either in the military or in the civil government; and (4) state officer of any kind." (emphasis added)); Christopher R. Green, Our Bipartisan Due Process Clause, 26 GEO. MASON L. REV. 1202 (2019) (noting that "section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is limited to those rebels who broke Article VI oaths" (emphasis added)).

[555] See PASCHAL, supra note 255 (citing Paschal).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

officers, both Federal and State, should take an oath to support" the Constitution and the constitutional requirement that the president 'take an oath, to the best of his ability to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution.'"[556] Davis was not comparing the oaths taken by the President and other positions. He was merely listing different provisions of the Constitution, including the President's obligation to take an oath, the President's duty to take care that the laws are faithfully executed, and Congress's power to raise armies. Graber cited Senator James Doolittle of Wisconsin, who "declared that Congress need not pass laws requiring presidents to swear to support the Constitution because that 'oath is specified in the constitution.'"[557] Here, Doolittle was discussing whether Congress can create a different oath for the Vice President.[558] (The issue of the proper oath for the Vice President created some confusion for John Adams and the First Congress.[559])

Graber quoted Senator John Henderson of Missouri as stating that Section Three "strikes at those who have heretofore held high office position."[560] From this snippet, Graber observed that "Republicans when describing Section Three often stated that the persons subject to disqualification were those who held offices, which included past and [current] presidents of the United States."[561] This statement suggests that Henderson thought the language used in Section 3 was sweeping. But Henderson actually made the exact opposite point. In the very next sentence, Henderson stated, "When the section is closely scrutinized, it will be seen that comparatively few men will fall subject to the exclusion." Critically, Henderson explained that Section 3 "does not, as sometimes supposed, reach all who may have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States." He observed, "I have but little idea what number of persons will be reached as former members of Congress. The number cannot be very great." Nothing about Henderson's statement suggests that he thought that presidents would be covered by the oath language. To the contrary, he [556] Graber, supra note 118 at 18 (citing CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., App.234 (1866).

---

[557] Graber, supra note 118 at 18 (citing CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2915 (1866).

[558] CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2915 (1866).

[559] Tillman & Blackman, supra note 533, at 424–28 (discussing the oaths for President Washington, Vice President Adams, and the First Congress).

[560] Graber, supra note 118 at 19 (citing CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 3035–36 (1866)).

[561] Graber, supra note 118 at 19.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

read that language narrowly. Graber's snippet does not provide a full context of this colloquy.

Although we do not know, we can suppose that Baude and Paulsen embrace the conventional view: the President is not an "Officer[] of the United States" as used in Article VI and the other provisions of the Constitution of 1788. Given all that, Baude and Paulsen might consider acknowledging and dealing with the textualist difficulty for their position: Given that the President is not covered by the phrase "Officer[] of the United States" in the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause, what about Baude and Paulsen's position offers sufficient clarity for their reading of Section 3—that is, that the President is an "Officer[] of the United States" as that phrase is used in Section 3?

Baude and Paulsen also fail to address three other relevant provisions in the Constitution of 1788 that use the phrase "Officers of the United States."

- The Impeachment Clause: "The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."[562]
- The Appointments Clause: The President "shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States . . . ."[563]
- The Commissions Clause: The President "shall Commission all the Officers of the United States."[564]

First, presidents fall under the scope of the Impeachment Clause precisely because there is express language in the clause providing for presidential impeachments; the Impeachment Clause does not rely on general "office"- or "officer"-language to make presidents impeachable. We think this is the common convention with regard to drafting constitutional provisions. When a proscription is meant to control elected positions, those positions are expressly named, as opposed to relying on general "office"- and "officer"-language.

---

[562] U.S. CONST. art. II, § 4.

[563] U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

[564] U.S. CONST. art. II, § 3.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Congress does not hide the Commander in Chief in mouseholes or even foxholes. For example, in 1969, future-Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, then an Executive Branch attorney, addressed this sort of clear-statement principle. Statutes that refer to "officers of the United States," he wrote, generally "are construed not to include the President unless there is a specific indication that Congress intended to cover the Chief Executive."[565] Five years later, future-Justice Antonin Scalia, then also an Executive Branch attorney, reached a similar conclusion with regard to the Constitution's "office"-language.[566] These Executive Branch precedents would counsel against deeming the President an "officer of the United States."

Second, as to the Appointments Clause, which uses "Officers of the United States"-language, Presidents do not appoint themselves or their successors. The Supreme Court hears a never-ending stream of cases that ask if a particular position is a principal or inferior officer of the United States—even though the Appointments Clause does not even distinguish between those two types of positions.[567] Where has the Court ever suggested that the President falls in the ambit of the Appointments Clause's "Officers of the United States"-language?

To the contrary, the Court has asserted just the opposite. In Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, Chief Justice Roberts observed that "[t]he people do not vote for the [565] Memorandum from William H. Rehnquist to Egil Krogh Re: Closing of Government Offices in Memory of Former President Eisenhower (Apr. 1, 1969), https://perma.cc/P229-BAKL.

---

[566] Memorandum from Antonin Scalia to Kenneth A. Lazarus, Re: Applicability of 3 C.F.R. Part 100 to the President and Vice President (Dec. 19, 1974), https://perma.cc/GQA4-PJNN.

[567] See Tillman & Blackman, supra note 547, at 392 ("The Constitution does not expressly say that 'principal officers . . . must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.' Indeed, the text of the Appointments Clause does not distinguish between principal and inferior officers, generally. The Appointments Clause does refer to 'inferior Officers,' which are 'Officers of the United States' but, the phrase 'principal Officer' does not appear in the Appointments Clause. The phrase 'principal Officer' appears in the Opinion Clause—Article II, Section 2, Clause 1."). And the text of the Constitution says nothing at all about what duties can and cannot be assigned to those positions. See Seth Barrett Tillman & Josh Blackman, Is Robert Mueller an 'Officer of the United States' or an 'Employee of the United States'?, LAWFARE (July 23, 2018, 2:50 PM), https://www.lawfareblog.com/robert-mueller-officer-united-states-or-employee-united-states [https://perma.cc/XK32-Q3JW] (concluding that under current precedent, Special Counsel Mueller was not an "Officer[] of the United States," but a mere "employee of the United States").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

'Officers of the United States.'"[568] Rather, the Appointments Clause requires appointment of these individuals. Chief Justice Roberts reaffirmed this position in Seila Law LLC v. CFPB.[569] He wrote, "Article II distinguishes between two kinds of officers—principal officers (who must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate) and inferior officers (whose appointment Congress may vest in the President, courts, or heads of Departments)."[570] Both categories of positions are appointed.

And, finally, the Commissions Clause, refers to "all the Officers of the United States." Presidents do not commission themselves, their vice presidents, their successor presidents, or successor vice presidents.[571] Yet the clause uses the word "all" before "Officers of the United States."[572]

In all, there is a rich history illustrating that when the Constitution of 1788's text uses "Officers of the United States"-

---

568 Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Acct. Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 497–98 (2010) (citation omitted) (first quoting U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2, and then citing THE FEDERALIST NO. 72 (Alexander Hamilton)); see United States v. Mouat, 124 U.S. 303, 307 (1888) ("Unless a person in the service of the government, therefore, holds his place by virtue of an appointment by the president, or of one of the courts of justice or heads of departments authorized by law to make such an appointment, he is not, strictly speaking, an officer of the United States.").

569 140 S. Ct. 2183, 2199 n.3 (2020).

570 Id.

571 See Tillman & Blackman, supra note 547, at 412–19 (discussing practice under the Commissions Clause).

572 Professor Ilya Somin argued that the President does in fact commission himself by taking the oath of office. Ilya Somin, Why President Trump Is an "Officer" Who Can be Disqualified from Holding Public Office Under Section 3 of the 14th Amendment [Updated], REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Sept. 16, 2023, 5:47 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2023/09/16/why-president-trump-is-an-officer-who-can-be-disqualified-from-holding-public-office-under-section-3-of-the-14th-amendment/ ("My answer is that the President does indeed 'commission' himself. He does so by taking the oath of office required by the Constitution. Without that, he cannot take office, just like lower-level officers cannot do so without a commission issued by the president. The forms are different. But the substance is similar."). Somin did not cite any historical evidence that the presidential oath has ever been thought to be some sort of self-commission. We are not aware that any such evidence exists. To the contrary, long-standing congressional practice established that the Commissions Clause "does not mean that [the President] is to commission Members of Congress . . . and he does not commission himself, nor does he commission the Vice-President[.]" See 1 HINDS, supra note 164, at 547; see also Case of Brigham H. Roberts, of Utah, H.R. REP. No. 56-85, at 36 (1900). See Tillman & Blackman, Part III, supra note 533 at 416-18 (discussing how the President does not commission himself).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

language, that phrase does not reach the presidency. (In the third installment of our ten-part series, we explain at some length why the President is not considered a "Officer[] of the United States" in these three provisions, as well as the Oath or Affirmation Clause.[573])

We are not sure if Baude and Paulsen would argue that the President is covered by the "Officers of the United States"-language in any of these constitutional provisions from the 1788 Constitution. Perhaps, they (too) are "non-committal"? It is possible that they agree with us on this limited issue. If so, why might they agree?

We do not suggest that these authorities—from the text of the Constitution of 1788, Chief Justice Roberts, Justice Story, Senator Booth, and David McKnight—prove that we are undoubtedly correct as to the meaning of Section 3's "Officer of the United States"-language, and that Baude and Paulsen are unequivocally wrong. But we do think, at the very least, that the authorities, evidence, and arguments we have marshaled are probative of the interpretive issue at hand and deserving of a response consistent with prevailing academic norms. So why all the talk about "secret codes," "hidden-meaning hermeneutics," "disappearing ink," and "illuminati priests." Why all the hyperbole?

These textual arguments lead to what we think is a point of agreement with at least one of the two authors. Footnote 393 of Baude and Paulsen's article points out that in 2016, Baude "complimented Tillman's prior scholarship" in Jotwell regarding the office- and officer-language in the Constitution of 1788.[574] In 2016, Baude wrote, Tillman's "position has [not] been conclusively proven. But at this point, I think he has singlehandedly shifted the burden of proof."[575] Thus, it may be that the core of our current disagreement is whether the 1788 meaning drifted on the road to 1868. To establish such drift, Baude and Paulsen would need substantial evidence that the phrase "Officers of the United States" included the elected President. The 573 See Tillman & Blackman, supra note 547.

---

574 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 109 n.393.

575 William Baude, Constitutional Officers: A Very Close Reading, JOTWELL (July 28, 2016), https://conlaw.jotwell.com/constitutional-officers-a-very-close-reading/. It may be that Professor Baude's 2023 co-authored article illustrates that he has changed his mind, in whole or in part, from the views he put forward in Jotwell in 2016. That is something he is perfectly entitled to do, and in no way should anything we write be understood as a criticism directed against him for any apparent or real inconsistency. People are entitled to change their minds. It is a good thing to reopen old questions, and courageous to do especially when one knows that criticism (as we put forward here) will follow. We only ask, if he has changed his mind, what are the reasons, including new evidence and new arguments, that account for this new position?

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

originalist evidence must be substantial because the effect of Section 3 is to disqualify a candidate and to limit the ability of voters to elect the candidate of their choice. We do have statements that the phrase "Officers of the United States" excluded the President—see Booth, McKnight, and others discussed above. We wait for concrete evidence that the President was considered an "Officer of the United States," as that phrase was used in Section 3.

We do acknowledge, and have long acknowledged, the possibility that meaning may have drifted from 1788 to 1868 with regard to another phrase within Section 3.

C. Potential linguistic drift for "Office . . . under the United States"

In our view, the phrase "Office . . . under the United States" as used in the Constitution of 1788 did not refer to elected positions like the President. We have made efforts to establish this position in the fourth installment of our ten-part series, and will not rehash those arguments here in detail.[576] In short, our position is that "Officers of the United States" encompasses appointees in the judicial and executive branches of the federal government, and "Office . . . under the United States" includes all "Officers of the United States" and also those holding appointed positions in the national legislature. Indeed, seven years ago, Baude suggested that our position had some merit.[577]

Still, we are not so certain the meaning of "Office . . . under the United States" remained constant over the decades. In our 2021 article, we wrote:

> But we have been very careful to avoid resolving the scope of the phrase "office . . . under the United States" in the disqualification element [of Section 3]. Suffice to say, in light of the possibility of linguistic drift from 1788 till 1868, we think this issue is contestable.[578]

We presented what we thought was a reasonable position: the evidence put forward to date does not support linguistic drift with regard to the [578] Blackman & Tillman, supra note 10, at 53–54.

---

[576] See generally Tillman & Blackman, Offices and Officers of the Constitution, Part IV: The "Office . . . under the United States" Drafting Convention, 62 S. TEX. L. REV. 455 (2023).

[577] See Baude, supra note 575.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

phrase "Officers of the United States," but linguistic drift with regard to "Office . . . under the United States" was less clear.

Baude and Paulsen appear baffled by what they see as a bifurcated position. They wrote we "equivocate" and we are "non-committal." In our view, we were being careful. There is no logic or scholarly tradition in requiring every academic paper to address every issue; rather, a good paper should add something new to the body of scholarship. We would prefer to add to the body of scholarship and be correct, rather than overreach and be wrong.

For example, we think the Appointments Clause ought to be read to define the phrase "Officers of the United States." And there are Supreme Court cases adjudicating Appointments Clause challenges that discuss the clause's "Officers of the United States"-language. Again, in Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, Chief Justice Roberts observed that "[t]he people do not vote for the 'Officers of the United States.'"[579]

In contrast to the Constitution's Appointments Clause which defines the phrase "Officers of the United States," there is no similar provision within the Constitution defining the scope of the phrase "Office . . . under the United States." The Foreign Emoluments Clause, for example, which uses "Office . . . under the United States"-language, does not expressly indicate which positions are covered. In other words, because of the absence of any constitutional provision defining "Office . . . under the United States," it would have been more likely for the meaning of that phrase to have drifted from its 1788 moorings than for the meaning of "Officer[] of the United States" to have drifted. The latter phrase's meaning was less likely to have drifted precisely because its meaning was hardwired or fixed by the Constitution's text, i.e., the Appointments Clause.

Finally, even if there was the possibility of linguistic drift with regard to the phrase "Office . . . under the United States," there is some evidence from the Thirty-Ninth Congress that the disqualification element of Section 3 was not designed to reach the presidency. Professor Lash carefully traced the drafting history of Section 3. He pointed out that an early version of Section 3 by Representative Samuel McKee of Kentucky provided that certain rebels would not be "qualified" and would not "hold the office of President or vice president of the United States." However, the version of Section 3, as ratified, "omits the express prohibition on qualifying for office, the [579] 561 U.S. 477, 497–98 (2010) (citing U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2, cl. 2; THE FEDERALIST NO. 72 (Alexander Hamilton)).

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

express ban on holding the office of President."[580] Rather, Section 3 "protects the Presidency by ensuring only loyal electors can vote for the President of the United States." Lash concluded that "the publication of prior drafts in this case may well have led the public to understand the final draft of Section Three as not including the office of President of the United States."

Ultimately, even if there was linguistic drift with regard to the phrase "Office . . . under the United States," the decision to list some elected positions in Section 3, but not others, gave rise to the reasonable inference that the President was not covered by this language.

D. What is Baude and Paulsen's theory?

Baude and Paulsen have not put forward a fully fleshed out theory about what Section 3's "office"- and "officer"-language means. Rather, their focus is on the one position which is on everyone's mind today–the Presidency. The risk of taking that route, with its singular focus on the now, is that it might very well lead to distorting their understanding of Section 3's original public meaning. In Morrison v. Olson, Justice Scalia's dissent warned about similar risks when a single-minded independent counsel proceeds on an Inspector Javert-like hunt of a single target. We think the same risk applies to legal scholarship. One way of minimizing this risk is to develop broad, generally applicable theories, at a reasonably high level of abstraction, that extend beyond any present controversy. We have spent the better part of the past decade on that enterprise.[581]

But Baude and Paulsen never actually define what positions Section 3's "office"- and "office"-language include. They do suggest that the preposition "of" is linked with "officer" and the preposition "under" is linked to "office."[582] It is true that the Framers of the

---

[580] Lash, supra note 340 at 23.

[581] See generally Tillman & Blackman, supra note 576; Tillman & Blackman, supra note 547; Seth Barrett Tillman & Josh Blackman, Offices and Officers of the Constitution, Part II: The Four Approaches, 61 S. TEX. L. REV. 321 (2021); Seth Barrett Tillman & Josh Blackman, Offices and Officers of the Constitution, Part I: An Introduction, 61 S. TEX. L. REV. 309 (2021). The remaining 6 parts are scheduled to appear over the course of 2023 through 2025.

[582] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 108 ("The minor textual difference between the triggering clause ('officer of') and the positions-disqualified clause ('office under')—a choice between prepositions—appears to be of no significant substantive consequence in Section Three, much as other minor textual variations in or among constitutional provisions often do not support differences in

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Constitution carefully used language, always referring to an "officer of" and "office under," but never an "officer under" or an "office of."[583] We have argued that this consistency supports our position that different "office"- and "officer"-language have different meanings.[584] Baude and Paulsen draw the opposite inference: that carefully-used, different language, was in fact used to convey the same meaning. The inference they draw seems less than well supported. Without a grounded theory, Baude and Paulsen cannot explain why the Framers of Section 3 carefully distinguished between an "officer of" and an "office under." Why did not Section 3's drafters simply use either: (i) officers of the United States and offices of the United States; or, (2) officers under the United States and offices under the United States. Why try to confuse one-and-all by using "of" and "under" if the same meaning was intended? Baude and Paulsen also made no effort to reconcile the two clauses of Section 3, which list positions, with the language of the Constitution of 1788.

Without any textualist support, Baude and Paulsen revert to sense and sensibilities. They state, "Far more sensible and meaning."). Here, Baude and Paulsen echo an argument made by Akhil Reed Amar and Vikram David Amar concerning the Succession Clause. See Akhil Reed Amar & Vikram David Amar, Is the Presidential Succession Law Constitutional?, 48 STAN. L. REV. 113, 114 (1995) (noting that "[a]s a textual matter," these varied references to "Officers of the United States" and "Office[s] . . . under the United States" "seemingly describe[] the same stations."). We have addressed the problems with the Amar's atextualist position at some length. Tillman & Blackman, Part II, supra note 581, at 357–68. Like Baude and Paulsen, the Amars put forward no principled account supporting their view that the Constitution's disparate "office"- and "officer"-language all mean the same thing.

---

583 See Tillman & Blackman, supra note 547, at 360 (observing consistent usage of "office"- and "officer"-language in the Constitution of 1788).

584 Tillman & Blackman, supra note 576, at 484 ("And there was coordination. The framers of the Articles of Confederation and of the Constitution used the phrase 'Office . . . under the United States' without any apparent material inconsistency or variation between the two documents. Indeed, absent this drafting convention, it is nearly impossible to explain the Constitution's 'office'- and 'officer'-language."); see also Asher Steinberg, The Textual Argument That the President Does Not Hold an "Office Under the United States", NARROWEST GROUNDS BLOG (Sept. 21, 2017), https://narrowestgrounds.blogspot.com/2017/09/the-textual-argument-that-president.html [https://perma.cc/MS3J-6MKL] ("This settled British legal and linguistic tradition of understanding office under the Crown to exclude elected office explains how the framers and ratifiers could have coordinated around the otherwise cryptic and novel phrase, 'office under the United States.' Indeed, something like a practice of this kind is almost necessary to explain how such coordination was possible.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

straightforward to conclude, we think, that the officeholder holding the office of President is an officer 'of' the United States who holds office under the authority of the United States."[585] That move is unexplained. Why reference "office under the authority of the United States" at all? That phrase does not appear in Section 3. The only constitutional provision to use that phrase, i.e., "office under the authority of the United States" is the Sinecure Clause.[586] The Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment would have been aware of the Sinecure Clause, which directly limited the ability of members of Congress to accept presidential appointments. Again, Baude and Paulsen fail to assess the baseline language used in the Constitution of 1788.

It is difficult to figure out how Baude and Paulsen decide which positions to include in the aegis of "Officers of the United States," other than to reject a distinction between "Officers of the United States" and "Office . . . under the United States." Rather, they focus on one, and only one elected position: the President. And they are certain that the President is covered by that language. Their intellectual position is not well supported merely by uttering the intuition that it is "sensible and straightforward." No intellectual position is well supported merely by making such an announcement. And that principle is just as true for the most mundane questions of constitutional law as it is for the most important questions, whatever they may be.

E. Original meaning and intentions

Our scholarship attempts to illustrate the original public meaning with regard to the Constitution's "Officers of the United States"-language. We focus, in large part, on the meaning of that term in the Constitution of 1788, and we attempt to show there is no substantial evidence of linguistic drift. Baude and Paulsen, in their efforts to determine the original public meaning of Section 3, do not acknowledge, consider, and balance these contrary authorities in any systematic fashion against their own preferred positions and evidence. Rather, they focus on many instances of original intentions and expectations. We are not alone in making this observation. Professor Eric Segall, a prominent critic of originalism, wrote "throughout the

---

585 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 108.

586 U.S. CONST. art. I, § 6, cl. 2 ("No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time."). We discuss the meaning of the "office"-language in the Sinecure Clause in Part II of our ten-part series.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

126 pages, the authors use original intent repeatedly."[587] Baude and Paulsen parse statements from members of the Reconstruction Era Congress about the phrase "Office under the United States" to determine the meaning of the phrase "Officers of the United States." Of course, this argument based on original intentions and expectations only works (if at all) if the two phrases have the same meaning, and that atextualist position itself also requires substantial evidence.

To determine the meaning of Section 3, Professor Mark Graber focused exclusively on original intentions and expectations. His work relied almost exclusively on congressional debates over the Fourteenth Amendment from the Thirty-Ninth Congress. (As best as we can tell, he cites zero records from the ratification debates in the States.) Graber wrote, "[t]he records of the Thirty-Ninth Congress provide no evidence that any Representative or Senator was self-consciously aware that the language of Section Three contained a specialized 'legal term of art' or thought the drafters of any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment had an obligation to be clear when making colloquial usage of words that were sometimes used as a legal term of art."[588] He added that Blackman and Tillman, and other commentators, do not "point[] to any statement made during the process of framing and ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment or, for that matter, any statement made during the 1860s that supports their position on the office of the presidency."[589] He repeats the point: "Nevertheless, no commentator who claims that the president is not an 'officer of the United States' points to any statement made during the process of framing and ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment or, for that matter, any statement made during the 1860s that supports their position on the office of the presidency."[590]

We submit that Graber's analysis gets things backwards. His view attempts to impose a new disqualification on a presidential candidate. He bears the burden to show that the phrase "Officer of the United States," as that term was used in Section 3, includes the presidency. It is not our burden to prove the negative: that the phrase "Officer of the United States," as that term is used in Section 3, does not include the presidency. Moreover, determining the meaning of the text cannot be restricted to the scattered debates in the Thirty-Ninth Congress between 1866 and 1868. Graber's gerrymandering of the relevant period to the [587] Eric Segall, Of Insurrections, Presidents, and the Utter Failure of Constitutional Law to Address the Real Issues, DORF ON LAW (Aug. 14, 2023), https://www.dorfonlaw.org/2023/08/of-insurrections-presidents-and-utter.html.

---

[588] Graber, supra note 118 at 21.

[589] Graber, supra note 118 at 20.

[590] Graber, supra note 118 at 20.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1860s excludes evidence that we put forward by Booth and McKnight from the 1870s.

Section 3 used language similar to the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause. And those who ratified the Fourteenth Amendment would have likely understood that the President is not covered by the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause. But there is evidence from the 1860s. In 1868, George Washington Paschal wrote that Section 3 is "based upon the higher obligation to obey th[e] [Article VI] oath."[591] In a later edition of his book from 1876, Paschal opined that the Article VI oath and Section 3 apply to "precisely the same class of officers." Paschal was not speaking in a secret code. Graber never even mentions the Constitution of 1788, as if constitutional meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment can be determined solely based on colloquies held in the confines of the Capitol building. Graber's evidence provides some support for his position, but it is not the only evidence. He ignores contrary evidence, and thus, is in no position to balance conflicting views.

One of the more relevant pieces of historical evidence that Baude and Paulsen put forward to support this atextualist position actually rebuffs the "secret code" argument. In 1866, a five-member select committee of the House of Representatives prepared a report.[592] The proceedings stretch more than 300 pages. What was it about? In April 1865, Roscoe Conkling of New York was selected as a judge advocate—a special prosecutor—to investigate misconduct in the military.[593] For his services, Conkling was paid $3,000.[594] During this period, Conkling became a member-elect of the House.

The primary issue before the Conkling Committee was whether Conkling violated various statutes that prohibit those holding certain government positions from also holding other positions or receiving outside compensation.[595] One of the statutes provided, "no person hereafter who holds or shall hold, any office under the Government of the United States, whose salary or annual compensation shall amount to a sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office."[596]

---

591 See supra note 553 and accompanying text (discussing Paschal).

592 See H.R. Rep. No. 39-93 (1836) (hereinafter Conkling Report). The Conkling Report begins at page 566 of this PDF: https://perma.cc/P5TP-GH85.

593 Id. at 10.

594 Id.

595 Id. at 12–13.

596 Id. at 10 (emphasis added). On page 21, this statute is referred to as the Act of August 31st, 1852, but on page 17 it is referred to as the Act of July 21st, 1852.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

As a threshold matter, the committee found that Conkling, as a member-elect, did not hold an "'office' in such sense as to bring him within the prohibition of the act of 1852."[597] That finding, standing alone, could have fully determined the matter before the Committee.

Nevertheless, the Committee then proceeded to consider the issue further. The Committee quoted eight provisions of the Constitution of 1788 that use different office- and officer-language.[598] None of these provisions use the precise phrase used in the statute: "office under the government of the United States." The closest language in the Constitution of 1788 is the Necessary and Proper Clause, which refers to any officer of the government of the United States.[599] We have previously written that "officers of the government of the United States," as that term is used in the Necessary and Proper Clause, would include the elected President.[600] Professor Graber located several instances in which "members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress spoke of all elected members of the national government as 'officers of the government.'"[601] But that phrase is different from "Officers of the United States."

In our prior scholarship, we have not had occasion to opine on the phrase "office under the government of the United States." Again, this phrase does not appear in the Constitution of 1788 or in the Fourteenth Amendment. We will discuss below how this language is used in the Ironclad Oath statute of 1862. Based on our reading of that statute, this language includes all appointed federal positions and all elected federal positions in the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Branches. This language would include the President and members of Congress. That said, having examined eight constitutional provisions, the Committee did not reach any determinative conclusion. Rather, the

---

The Supreme Court used the former citation in 1884, and placed the citation at 10 Stat. 100. See United States v. Brindle, 110 U.S. 688 (1884), https://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/ampage?collId=llsl&fileName=010/llsl010.db&recNum=121.

597 Conkling Report, supra note 592, at 17.

598 Id. at 19.

599 U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8 ("To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.").

600 Tillman & Blackman, Part II, supra note 581 at 408-416 (discussing the phrase "Officers of the Government of the United States" in the Necessary and Proper Clause).

601 Graber, supra, supra note 118 at 18.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Committee concluded that this issue, the scope of the Constitution's "office"- and "officer"-language, did not need to be reached.[602]

The Committee still felt compelled to interpret language in an 1852 statute by referring to language in the Constitution of 1788, including the Impeachment Clause. (Baude and Paulsen rely on the Committee report, but do not bring forward the Committee's discussion of the Constitution of 1788.) As an example, the Committee invoked the 1797-1799 house impeachment and senate trial of Senator William Blount.[603] And those proceedings were centered around debates on the Constitution's Impeachment Clause and other provisions using "office"- and "officer"-language.

The conventional view of the Blount case is that it determined that members of Congress are not "Officers of the United States," and thus, they are not subject to impeachment. However, the members of the Conkling Committee seem to cast some doubt on that conventional view. The Committee was "wholly unable to come to the conclusion that the members of the national Congress are not, in the enlarged and general sense of the Constitution, officers of their government."[604] In other words, the Committee suggested that members of Congress are "Officers of the United States," and can be impeached. Here, the Committee rejected the standard understanding of what the Blount case determined. We do not know if Baude and Paulsen agree with the Committee, and, perhaps, reject the conventional view of the Blount case. If Baude and Paulsen disagree with the Committee's apparent rejection of Blount, then they may be skeptical about some of the Committee's other conclusions.

For example, the Committee favorably quotes from Alexander J. Dallas, a lawyer for Blount. The Committee wrote, quoting Dallas, "But a little consideration of this matter will show that 'officers of' and 'officers under' the United States are (as said by Mr. Dallas in this Blount case, p. 277) 'indiscriminately used in the Constitution.'"[605]

---

602 Conkling Report, supra note 592, at 22 ("In the opinion of the committee, the determination of this point is not necessary to the right determination of all that is before the committee, and this is not, perhaps, a proper case in which to make a precedent upon so vital a constitutional question.").

603 Impeachment Trial of Senator William Blount, 1799, UNITED STATES SENATE, https://www.senate.gov/about/powers-procedures/impeachment/impeachment-blount.htm.

604 Conkling Report, supra note 592, at 21–22 (emphasis added).

605 Id. at 20; CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 3939 (1866), https://memory.loc.gov/cgi-bin/ampage?collId=llcg&fileName=074/llcg074.db&recNum=100.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

That statement provides some evidence for Baude and Paulsen's position. Indeed, that position was made by Dallas six decades before the Fourteenth Amendment was drafted. And this debate on the scope of the Constitution's "office"-language predates not just the Fourteenth Amendment, but goes back to 1788-89.

Yet, Dallas's view was not the only view expressed during the Blount proceedings. The views of the parties and attorneys at the Blount proceedings were not monolithic. The Committee did not quote from Blount's other attorney, Jared Ingersoll.[606] Ingersoll contended that the phrase "Officers of the United States" was different from the phrase "Office . . . under the United States."[607] He explained, "[t]he expression [in the Appointments Clause] is not, that the President shall appoint all officers holding under the United States, but all officers of the United States." Ingersoll did not view "Officers of the United States" and "Office under the United States" as synonymous. We discussed Ingersoll's views in the third installment of our ten-part series.[608]

We do not provide Ingersoll's quote to show that he was correct or incorrect. Rather, since 1788, debates have ensued about the meaning of the Constitution's "office"- and "officer"-language. Baude and Paulsen wrote, "If a secret code was really at work, it was an extraordinarily well-kept secret." But there was no secret. There is no secret code. Ingersoll, Dallas, and Conkling were not Illuminati priests. And the five members of the House committee, which Baude and Paulsen rely on, were not the Oracles at Delphi. The view advanced by Dallas was just one view. The Committee relied on Dallas's view. But the Committee gave no explanation why Dallas's view should be preferred over all the other views that were expressed at the Blount proceeding.

There is also a problem with the manner that Baude and Paulsen presented this material. In Footnote 399, Baude and Paulsen quote from a post Professor Mark Graber wrote on Lawfare.[609] Baude and Paulsen state:

---

606 Jared Ingersoll, PENN LIBRS., https://archives.upenn.edu/exhibits/penn-people/biography/jared-ingersoll/.

607 5 ANNALS OF CONG. 2289 (1798), http://bit.ly/3sw38KR.

608 Tillman & Blackman, supra note 547, at 405–08.

609 Mark A. Graber, Disqualification From Office: Donald Trump v. the 39th Congress, LAWFARE (Feb. 22, 2023, 4:40 PM), https://www.lawfaremedia.org/article/disqualification-office-donald-trump-v-39th-congress ("A unanimous House select committee report issued barely a month after Congress sent the 14th Amendment to the states concluded that "a

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> Professor [Mark] Graber notes further that a "unanimous House select committee report issued barely a month after Congress sent the 14th Amendment to the states concluded that 'a little consideration of this matter will show that 'officers of' and 'officers under' the United States are 'indiscriminately used in the Constitution.'''[610]

Here is the original text, as it appears in the Congressional Globe:

> "But a little consideration of this matter will show that 'officers of' and 'officers under' the United States are (as said by Mr. Dallas in this Blount case, p. 277) 'indiscriminately used in the Constitution.'"[611]

Baude and Paulsen accurately quoted Graber. But Graber omitted the parenthetical: "(as said by Mr. Dallas in this Blount case, p. 277)." The customary use of ellipses would have been appropriate here.[612] As a result of Graber's omission, Graber's readers were not informed that the Committee was quoting from the Blount case's hearings transcript, and that the Committee was not interpreting the meaning of the 1852 statute based on its plain text. Rather, the Committee was interpreting the 1852 statute with reference to debates from 1797–1798 on the Constitution of 1788. Likewise, this information has not been readily conveyed to Baude and Paulsen's readers.

The Committee's 1866 report relied on Dallas—just one view from the Blount hearing. But they put forward no reason why that view was more reliable than any other view put forward in the 1790s. No little consideration of this matter will show that 'officers of' and 'officers under' the United States are 'indiscriminately used in the Constitution.'").

---

610 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 110 n.399.

611 CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 3939 (1866) (emphasis added).

612 Graber offered this explanation for his failure to use ellipses: "My blog post intentionally omitted '(as said by Mr. Dallas in this Blount case, p. 277)' which I interpreted as a footnote in the original House Report being reproduced in a Congressional Globe that did not include footnotes (I was also madly cutting to stay within word limits). Blackman and Tillman correctly point out that some members of Congress in 1797 disagreed with Dallas when Dallas claimed that no difference exists between 'officers of' and 'officers under'; So what." Mark Graber, Section Three "Of" and "Under" Nonsense: The Sequel, BALKANIZATION (Sept. 13, 2023), https://balkin.blogspot.com/2023/09/section-three-of-and-under-nonsense.html

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

matter how hard Baude and Paulsen try to stay in the 1860s, they cannot escape the gravitational force of the Constitution of 1788.[613]

***

We recognize that we do not have a clear statement during the debates over Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment that the President is not an "Officer[] of the United States." Nor have Baude and Paulsen (or any others) yet put forward any clear statements from the debates that the President is an "Officer[] of the United States" for purposes of Section 3. In fact, many (but not all) such sources, especially those which merely express conclusions or expectations, and do so without explanation or reasons, are not particularly probative as a matter of original public meaning. We say this even if such sources support our or Baude and Paulsen's position in regard to how Section 3 uses "Officers of the United States." For this reason and because of the paucity of contemporaneous commentary, today's commentators, including ourselves, have turned to other sources beyond the debates on the Fourteenth Amendment to determine the meaning of Section 3's "Officer of the United States"-language. We think the search for that meaning starts with the Constitution of 1788, discussed above. Below, we also look to the 1862 Ironclad Oath statute to illustrate our views, and we do so because Baude and Paulsen have argued that this act forms a part of the background that informed how Section 3 was understood.

F. Original meaning and consequentialism

Beyond intentions, the locus of Baude and Paulsen's argument focuses on consequentialism. They ridicule "the seeming absurdity of the prospect of exclusion of the offices of President and Vice President from triggering the disqualification fashioned by the Radical Reconstruction Congress that drafted the Fourteenth Amendment."[614] Their view, as we understand it, is that Blackman and Tillman's position has to be wrong because it would lead to what Baude and Paulsen view as bad outcomes. We disagree with their methodological choice. Original meaning cannot be supplanted by consequentialism. But let's take their approach on its own terms. Could the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment possibly have excluded a person who took one, and only one oath as President (or Vice President), from the scope of Section 3? It is undisputed that no such living person existed in 1868.

---

613 See generally Randy E. Barnett, The Gravitational Force of Originalism, 82 FORDHAM L. REV. 411 (2013).

614 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 111.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And from 1789 through 2016, all of the presidents and vice presidents had previously taken a Section 3-related constitutional oath in some other government position—state or federal, civilian or military.

The Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment were not omniscient. Could they have failed to anticipate that a businessman would ascend to the presidency without having held any prior office tied to any Article VI oath? Yes, of course, they could have. It is equally possible that they failed in this manner because their legal focus was on the nexus of historical events that gave rise to and shaped secession, the Civil War, and Reconstruction.[615] If Section 3's Framers failed to imagine such an outcome, and, if, as a result, they chose language that failed to account for a possibility that they had not experienced or considered, then we should not be surprised and we cannot play let's pretend—we have no warrant to alter the meaning of the words which they have actually chosen.

Finally, Baude and Paulsen seem to assume that the "office"-language in Section 3 should "sweep" as broadly as possible, to include the widest range of positions. But the text of Section 3, as a whole, suggests otherwise. Consider the positions listed in the first two clauses:

> 1. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State . . .
> 2. who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States . . . .

The second clause does not expressly list several categories of positions: e.g., presidential electors, appointed officers of state legislatures, members of state constitutional conventions, and state militia officers. The first clause does not expressly list several categories of positions: e.g., members of the state legislatures, and members of state constitutional conventions. Neither list expressly mentions the President and Vice President. More fundamentally, the 615 See id. at 3 (Section 3 "was designed to address a particular historical situation and acute problem arising in the aftermath of the Civil War"); id. at 8 ("Section Three plainly was designed for a specific historical situation—the circum-stances of Reconstruction following the end of the Civil War.").

---

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

two lists are different, and they are different in ways that Baude and Paulsen make no effort to account for. If the goal was to cover the "waterfront," as Baude and Paulsen suggest, then Section 3's Framers could have used the same basic language in both lists. The Framers left out some important positions. The "office"- and "officer"-language within both clauses in Section 3 was not all-encompassing. We will address some of those omissions here.

1. Presidential electors

Presidential electors are listed in the first clause.[616] A person disqualified by Section 3 cannot serve as a presidential elector. One could reasonably infer that because electors are expressly listed in the first clause, they are not covered by the language "any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State."[617] Were they covered by this language, there likely would not have been a need to list them separately. However, presidential electors are not expressly listed in the second clause.[618] If presidential electors were not covered by the second clause, a person who took an oath as a presidential elector before the Civil War, and then engaged in insurrection, could still hold a position otherwise prescribed by Section 3.

Presidential electors pose a significant problem for Baude and Paulsen's theory. Baude and Paulsen suggest that electors circa 1868

---

616 U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 3 ("No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State . . ." (emphasis added)).

617 In our view, electors hold "public Trust[s] under the United States." Tillman & Blackman, Part II, supra note 581, at 340 ("These individuals are appointed by the states to elect the President. Unlike irregular and transitional positions, the centrally important role played by Presidential Electors remains very relevant today."). The precise status of presidential electors was at issue in Chiafalo v. Washington, 140 S. Ct. 2316 (2020). See Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, What are Presidential Electors?, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (May 21, 2020, 5:17 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2020/05/21/what-are-presidential-electors/. However, the Court did not resolve this issue. See Chiafalo v. Washington, 140 S. Ct. 2316 (2020); see also Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Chiafalo v. Washington Did Not Resolve The Precise Status of Electors, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (July 6, 2020, 5:17 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2020/07/06/chiafalo-v-washington-did-not-resolve-the-precise-status-of-electors/ ("The Court studiously avoided this unresolved question. There is not a word about how to characterize electors.").

618 U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 3 ("who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States . . . .").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

did not take oaths to the Constitution, so listing them in the second clause would not have triggered any Section 3 disqualification.[619] Baude and Paulsen put forward no reason to believe that the rationale which they suggest is what motivated the disparate language between the first and second clauses. They simply advance an assumption.

More importantly, this assumption is not supported. Baude and Paulsen do not explain why they believe the majority practice of States in the Union, circa 1868, was that electors were not required to take an oath to support the Constitution. Baude and Paulsen's theory as to why presidential electors are excluded from the list of triggering positions, but included in the list of positions a Section 3-covered person is disqualified from holding, only makes sense if they can point to some meaningful research as to what electors actually did on or about December 7, 1864–the last meeting of presidential electors prior to Congress's agreeing to the text of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866. Yet, they offer no empirical support for this assumption.

Our research suggests there may be some contrary authority.[620] And, in modern times, States impose an oath requirement on its presidential electors. Maryland and Colorado, for example, require electors to take an oath "support the Constitution of the United States."[621] just as required by Section 3.

Baude and Paulsen write that presidential electors were not "required" by Article VI to take an oath to support the Constitution.[622]

---

619 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 105 ("In addition, the disqualified-from list includes, notably, presidential electors, who are not listed in the Constitution as persons required to swear an oath to the Constitution.").

620 See Electoral College, ALBANY J., Dec. 7, 1864, at 1 (explaining that when the electors met "the usual oath office was administered"); New York Electoral College, N.Y. DAILY TRIBUNE, Dec. 7, 1864, at 4 (noting that the Secretary of State "called the College to order, and administered the Constitutional oath to each member").

621 See MD. CODE ANN., ELECTION LAW, § 8-505 (citing Article I, § 9 of the Maryland Const of 1867), https://casetext.com/statute/code-of-maryland/article-election-law/title-8-elections/subtitle-5-presidential-elections/section-8-505-presidential-electors-meeting/1; Colorado Secretary of State Election Rules, 8 CCR 1505-1 (2021), https://www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/rule_making/CurrentRules/8CCR1505-1/Rule24.pdf. We must admit: to determine the common practice of electors circa 1864–1868—to take an oath to uphold the U.S. Constitution or not to do so—would be an intense research project. And given that Baude and Paulsen are the proponents of a novel position leading to a limit on democratic participation, the burden of persuasion lies with them.

622 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 105 ("In addition, the disqualified-from list includes, notably, presidential electors, who are not listed in the Constitution as persons required to swear an oath to the Constitution." (emphasis added)).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But this response is not relevant. Section 3 is practical. Section 3's list of positions that trigger liability extends to those who held a listed position and had "taken an oath . . . to support the Constitution" in connection with that position--whether or not that oath was required by Article VI. Presidential electors may have taken such an oath under the aegis of state election law or the common practice among electors since 1789 (or since their state's admission to the Union), or even as a result of a mistake of law. In any of these situations, or others, the text of Section 3 would control, and not a theoretical position in regard to the scope of Article VI's oath requirement. Indeed, Baude and Paulsen repeatedly make the point that there is no mistake of law defense in regard to Section 3 liability.[623] If the principle Baude and Paulsen have announced is correct, that is, there is no mistake of law defense under Section 3, then that principle would apply, as Baude and Paulsen suggest, to the substantive conduct prongs (e.g., engaging in insurrection), and it would equally apply to Section 3's predicate conduct (i.e., holding a triggering office and taking an oath to support the Constitution).

We must admit that determining the common practice of electors circa 1864-1868–to take an oath to uphold the U.S. Constitution or not to do so–would be an intense research project. And given that Baude and Paulsen are the proponents of a novel position leading to a limit on democratic participation, the burden of persuasion lies with them. It would be a substantial undertaking to determine what was the common practice at the time Congress passed and the States ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. But without this research, Baude and Paulsen merely assume that the common practice aligns with their position, and then proffer that assumption to account for the different language used in Section 3's list of positions which trigger disqualification and Section 3's list of positions from which a disqualified person is excluded from holding. But their assumption is just that: an assumption absent support.

Taking the position that electors are not required to take an Article VI oath would require Baude and Paulsen to argue that presidential electors are not "officers of the United States" or "officers . . . of the several states" for purposes of the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause, at least for purposes of the Constitution of 1788. See Baude, supra note 575 ("Next time you confront a separation of powers problem or read through parts of the Constitution, keep Professor Tillman's chart in hand. Suddenly, it will be hard to assume that the Constitution's textual variations are meaningless. Indeed, Professor Tillman's theory makes sense of patterns that most of us never saw. It brings order out of chaos.").

623 See, e.g., Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 65 ("Mistake of law is no defense to a coup d'etat.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

***

If electors regularly took an oath to support the Constitution, then Baude and Paulsen's theory explaining the textual choices in Section 3 falls to the ground. The two different lists of positions in the first and second clauses of Section 3 pose a challenge to Baude and Paulsen's position. This different language between the two lists suggests that as far-reaching Section 3 was, it was not meant to be all-encompassing. Not all positions were swept in. Our job as interpreters is to determine what the language effectively encompassed.

There's more, much more.

2. Members of state legislatures

Baude and Paulsen write that Section 3's overall project of office-listing, in both clauses, "was designed to be reasonably comprehensive, covering the waterfront: both taking care not to accidentally leave out anything considered important—including everybody who was constitutionally required to have sworn an oath—and adding positions where appropriate, as with adding the category of electors to the list of positions from which a covered person is disqualified."[624] But the text suggests that the Framers did not cover the waterfront.

Members of state legislatures are enumerated in the second clause, but not in the first. Still, Baude and Paulsen reason that insurrectionists would be disqualified by Section 3 from serving in the state legislatures. Baude and Paulsen write that "[t]hough somewhat more awkward, we think an elected office in a state legislature also qualifies as a 'civil' office within the language and design of Section Three, reading the word 'office' in this context in an ordinary, non-technical sense."[625] Awkward or not, the failure to enumerate membership in the state legislatures in the first clause was significant. Former insurrectionists were not expressly or clearly disqualified from serving in state legislatures. We think Baude and Paulsen's "somewhat . . . awkward" hedge is something of an understatement. Since the congressional proceeding involving the impeachment and trial of Senator Blount, 1797–1799, the prevailing view has been that the Constitution's "Office"-language does not reach legislators—state or federal. (Professors Akhil and Vikram Amar have been the leading modern proponents of this view.) Is it Baude and Paulsen's view that the drafters of Section 3 were ignorant of this traditional understanding 624 Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 105 (emphases added).

---

625 Id. at 106.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

of the scope of "office"-language as used in the Constitution? On the other hand, if they were aware of this traditional understanding, why would they risk departing from it? Why not just include "members of the state legislatures" among the proscribed positions in the first clause as opposed to risk lumping such positions within the provision's general "any office . . . under the United States"-language?

Given that the draftspersons of Section 3 expressly included Senators and Representatives in the first and second clause, why did they not also include analogous language for state legislators in the list of positions in the first clause? After all, they could have done so just by relying on Article VI-like language. Why rely on generalized "office"-language if one seeks to disqualify a Section 3-covered person from being members of the state legislators? To put it another way, with a focus on contemporaneous history, it was the state legislatures of the (purported) confederate states that caused secession, raised armies to fight the Civil War, and funded those armies. The state legislatures authorized the secession conventions. If Section 3's drafters intended to encompass state legislators among the positions within the first list, one would think such language would have enjoyed pride of place and listed in the most direct and explicit terms. The fact is that the drafters of Section 3 did not take this path. On that basis, might not one fairly conclude that Section 3's drafters did not intend any broad sweep among all federal and state positions (where holders had taken a prior Article VI oath)? Indeed, membership in the state legislature was in every sense of the word an "important" position. So, one might fairly conclude that Section 3's drafters did not intend any broad sweep even among "important" federal and state positions (where holders had taken an Article VI oath)?

Indeed, this particular risk—involving membership in state legislatures—would have been far more apparent in 1868 than a hypothetical in which an insurrectionist former president (not otherwise subject to disqualification) ran for re-election. But the Framers, at a minimum, left the issue of state legislators not as clear as Baude and Paulsen would have us believe. And this omission was both significant, in that it involved an important position, and, in that it was noticed by commentators. A decade after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, John Randolph Tucker, a congressman from Virginia, stated that "[I]t is clear that a member of a State Legislature is not a civil or military officer under any State, any more than a member of Congress is a civil or military officer under the United States . . . ."[626] Baude and Paulsen cite Tucker as counter-authority. But they offer no explanation why he was wrong.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Framers of Section 3 stopped far short of covering the "waterfront." The list of Section 3 positions a disqualified person is disqualified from holding (i.e., the first clause) does not expressly include membership in the state legislature. But the list of positions leading to disqualification (i.e., the second clause) does include membership in a state legislature. To be sure, the second list only reaches members of a state legislature, it does not reach appointed officers of the state legislative houses: e.g., the secretaries of the state legislative upper houses, the clerks of the state legislative lower houses, the sergeants-at-arms, the doorkeepers, the parliamentarians, etc. And we are not the first to notice this omission. Attorney General Stanbery observed, "The terms of exclusion are not the members and officers of a State legislature, but simply the members of a State legislature." All these appointed positions are excluded from the operation of Section 3—there is no way to shoehorn these positions into the list of Section 3-triggering positions leading to disqualification.

3. Members of state conventions

What about analogues to state legislative houses? Here we include state conventions to amend state constitutions (akin to state conventions to secede from the Union—something which the drafters were likely to have given some thought to), state conventions to ratify proposed federal constitutional amendments meeting under the aegis of Article V, as well as state delegates to an Article V national convention. Attorney General Stanbery observed, "those who have been members of conventions framing or amending the constitution of a State, prior to the rebellion, are not subject to disqualification." Again, there is no way to shoehorn these positions into the list of positions leading to disqualification, and these positions, likewise, are not in any obvious way covered by the first clause listing the positions that a Section 3-covered person is excluded from.

Baude and Paulsen provide no clarity or guidance as to how (if at all) Section 3 covers these positions. That's not surprising: the Second Confiscation Act expressly distinguished state legislative membership from membership in a state convention.[627] Or, perhaps, [626] John Randolph Tucker, General Amnesty, 126 N. AM. R. 53, 55 (1868), https://www.jstor.org/stable/i25110155.

---

[627] Second Confiscation Act, ch. 195, § 5, 12 Stat. 589, 590 (1862) (authorizing the seizure of property of "any person acting as governor of a state, member of a

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Baude and Paulsen think these positions were less than "important"? If Section 3 did not apply to state conventions, which were the immediate cause of secession, then Section 3 simply does not cover the waterfront of positions that everyone had firmly in mind in 1868. The 1860s—just prior to the Civil War, during the war, and during Reconstruction—was awash with state conventions, including special conventions to decide on seceding from the Union and those charged with adopting Reconstruction-era constitutions. Can Baude and Paulsen really suggest that such positions were less than "important"? We wonder.

4. State militia officers

But there is still more. Earlier, we referenced an opinion by Attorney General Stanbery. (Baude and Paulsen have also cited this opinion with regard to the opinion's Ex Post Facto Clause analysis.) Stanbery wrote that state militia officers are not encompassed within the list of Section 3-triggering positions (i.e., the second clause). In fact, Stanbery wrote: "I begin then with the inquiry whether officers of the militia of a State are embraced within [the second clause], and I have no doubt that they are not."[628] Stanbery also excluded municipal officers and those holding a mere employment as coming within the purview of the list of Section 3-triggering positions.[629] We do not suggest that Stanbery was the first and last word on the meaning of the text of Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. What we do suggest is that the scope of Section 3's "Office"-language is hardly obvious.

***

We do not identify these specific gaps (and we could have identified others) between the first and second clauses as some sort of gotcha argument. Rather, we merely show that the "office"- and "officer"-language within both clauses in Section 3 was not all-encompassing. The Framers did not subject all federal and state positions to Section 3. They left out some positions, and some of those positions were important. Thus, contra Baude and Paulsen (and others), there is no strong presumption that the presidency was shoehorned into Section 3's general "officer of the United States"-language.

---

convention or legislature, or judge of any court of any of the so-called confederate states of America." (emphasis added)).

628 The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 141, 151 (1867).

629 Id. at 152–57.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

G. Baude and Paulsen's Reliance on the 1862 Ironclad Oath Statute Undermines Their Position

In 1862, Congress enacted the Ironclad Oath statute.[630] This statute required certain officeholders to swear an oath. Committing perjury in taking the oath falsely was a crime, and upon conviction, the person would be disqualified from holding certain positions in the future. The statute has two relevant parts. The first part lists those who had to take the new statutory oath: "hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States."[631] These individuals "shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation."[632] The second part of the statute lists the positions that a convicted person may be disqualified from holding: "And any person who shall falsely take the said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and on conviction, in addition to the penalties now prescribed for that offence, shall be deprived of his office and rendered incapable forever after of holding any office or place under the United States."[633]

We make three primary observations based on the plain text. First, the "office"-language in the first part is different from the "office"-language in the second part. The former refers to "any office of honor or profit under the government of the United States." The latter refers to "any office or place under the United States." The fact that the same statute uses different "office"-language strongly suggests that that the language refers to different positions. In much the same way, Section 3 refers to different categories of offices: "Officers of the United States" and "Offices . . . under the United States." (The Ironclad Oath does not make use of any "Officers of the United States"-language.) The use of different lists with different language suggests different meanings. Where the same meaning is intended, one chooses the same phrase, and if a different meaning is intended, one varies the language. That's what a good draftsperson would do, and that's how 631 Act to Prescribe an Oath of Office, ch. 128, 12 Stat. 502 (1862).

---

630 Act to Prescribe an Oath of Office, ch. 128, 12 Stat. 502 (1862); see also CONG. GLOBE, 38th Cong., Spec. Sess. 1551 (1863) (the Senate debate regarding the "Ironclad Test Oath" passed on July 2, 1862).

632 Id.

633 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

one normally interprets a legal document. What the public saw in 1862 was two different phrases. Therefore, the public likely understood each phrase as meaning something different. We believe the presumptive view, which should not be set aside absent concrete evidence, is that the two phrases are not coextensive.

We make a second observation based on the plain text of the Ironclad Oath statute. The President is expressly excluded from the scope of the term "office of honor or profit under the government of the United States."[634] The fact that the Framers expressly excluded the President from this category suggests that the President would otherwise hold an "office of honor or profit under the government of the United States." Why was the presidency excluded from the list of positions that had to take the oath? Perhaps he was excluded for policy reasons. It may have been considered inappropriate to require the President to take the Ironclad Oath. If, e.g., Lincoln was re-elected, would he have been required to take the oath? What about Lincoln's successors? There is another possibility. As we discussed above, the President has always taken a separate Article II oath, rather than an Article VI oath. Congress may have understood the Article II oath as exclusive, and that the Article VI Oath or Affirmation Clause reached all the most significant appointed and elected officials, except the President. Under this Article-II-is-exclusive view, the President, alone among federal officials, could not be compelled to take a statutory oath. Either way, the text of the provision shows an active choice by the draftspersons. Where the statute's draftspersons intended to exclude the President, they were in command of language to do just that. So two reasons for excluding the President are possible. But under either rationale, the phrase "office of honor or profit under the government of the United States" was viewed differently than the other phrase used later in the statute. This latter phrase omits "the government": "any office or place under the United States."

We make another observation. The President is not expressly excluded from the scope of the term "any office or place under the United States."[635] This textual decision can be understood in three fashions. First, perhaps the President was not thought to hold an "office or place under the United States," so there would be no reason to exclude him from that category. This reading would be consistent with how we understand the phrase "office . . . under the United States" in the Constitution of 1788. Second, perhaps the meaning of the phrase "office . . . under the United States" in the statute was unclear. If so,

---

634 Id.

635 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

that counsels against using this statute as a model to understand Section 3, and it tells us that similar language in Section 3 was unclear. But we think a lack of clarity would have been extremely problematic in the context of disqualification. A statute should clearly spell out which positions are covered. Third, perhaps the President was thought to hold an "office or place under the United States," and the Framers intended that a person convicted of violating the Ironclad Oath statute would be disqualified from holding the presidency. This alternate reading is not inconsistent with our position. Again, we acknowledge the possibility that there was linguistic drift with regard to the phrase "office . . . under the United States" between 1788 and the 1860s. But for good reason, this statute does not provide evidence of linguistic drift.

The dominant view at the time of the framing, and today, is that Congress cannot enact statutory qualifications for elected federal positions. Federalist No. 60 provides some substantial originalist support for this position. Hamilton wrote, "The qualifications of the persons who may choose or be chosen [for Congress], as has been remarked upon other occasions, are defined and fixed in the Constitution, and are unalterable by the [national] legislature."[636] And the Supreme Court reaffirmed this historical analysis in Powell v. McCormack[637] and U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton.[638] Powell adopted Hamilton's position from Federalist No. 60: Congress cannot add qualifications to elected federal positions such as Representative and Senator, and by implication, to the presidency. U.S. Term Limits examined whether the States, as opposed to Congress, have the power to add to the Constitution's qualifications for elected federal positions. The Thornton Court explained that "the debates at the state conventions . . . 'also demonstrate the framers' understanding that the qualifications for members of Congress had been fixed in the Constitution.'"[639] We do not think this position is controversial;[640] indeed, Senator Trumbull announced this very principle during debate on Section 3.[641] For all

---

636 THE FEDERALIST NO. 60 (Alexander Hamilton).

637 395 U.S. 486, 539–40 (1969).

638 514 U.S. 779, 792 (1995).

639 Id. (quoting Powell, 395 U.S. at 541).

640 See Tillman & Blackman, supra note 576, at 520–24 (contending that statute enacted by First Congress should not be construed to add qualifications to federal elected officials).

641 CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2901 (1866) (Senator Trumbull stating that "[s]o far as the members of this body and of the other House are concerned, the Constitution of the United States has provided the qualifications for a Senator and for a Representative, and it has been held more than once that it is

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

these reasons, in this statute, the phrase "Office . . . under the United States" should not be read to include the elected presidency.

The Ironclad Oath statute creates some difficulties for Baude and Paulsen. They contend that the phrase "Office . . . under the United States," which is used in Section 3, obviously includes elected positions like the presidency. And they also rely on the Ironclad Oath, which is best read to suggest that the presidency is not an "Office . . . under the United States." If Baude and Paulsen are correct, and the framers of the Ironclad Oath intended to reach the president, then Congress enacted an unconstitutional statute.

The better explanation is that the statute can easily be read as constitutional. And no dexterous saving construction is needed. The phrase "Office . . . under the United States" should be read, as in the Constitution of 1788, to exclude the elected president. Does this argument counsel that "Office . . . under the United States," here and in Section 3, does not extend to the elected officials, including the President. We say yes. Our view explains why there was no textual exclusion for the presidency and other elected officials in the second list: because the second list's "office under the United States"-language was not understood as reaching the presidency and other elected officials. We think there are two conceivable interpretations of the phrase "Office . . . under the United States" in the statute. First, if that "office"-language reaches the presidency, then the statute is unconstitutional. Second, if that language does not reach the president, then the statute is constitutional. Which construction should we and the courts adopt? We should favor the construction that maintains the statute's constitutionality. And this language is not just in the Ironclad Oath. Those who violate the Second Confiscation Act are similarly disqualified from holding "any office under the United States."[642]

If in 1862 "office under the United States"-language did not reach the presidency, and if this statute was a model for Section 3, as Baude and Paulsen argue, then that is a substantial reason to conclude that Section 3's "office under the United States" language did not reach the presidency. Textualism and original public meaning and methods trump conclusory analysis and original expectations.

Finally, we acknowledge the limits of our argument. We would be remiss if we left the reader with the impression that every pre-1868 statute in Statutes at Large supports our position. In the nearly 80 years incompetent to add to those qualifications by law."), <http://14th-amendment.com/Historical_Documents/Congressional_Globe/14th_15th_Amendments/Congressional_Debates_of_the_14th_Amendment.pdf>.

---

642 Second Confiscation Act, ch. 195, § 3, 12 Stat. 589, 590 (1862),

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

between 1789 and 1868, there were countless federal statutes using "office"- and "officer"-language. We don't doubt that somewhere, at sometime, there might exist one or more statutes supporting Baude and Paulsen's views. Then again, a more recent statute, which generated some discussion regarding candidates for the 2016 and 2024 presidential elections, provides some support for our position.[643] Our point is that two of the statutes Baude and Paulsen do cite, both of which were enacted in 1862—the Ironclad Oath Statute and the Second Confiscation Act[644]—do not support their atextual position. In fact, the language in both statutes cuts against their position.

Baude and Paulsen wrote: "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . .

---

[643] In 2016, Tillman argued that then-candidate Hillary Clinton could not be disqualified from the presidency for violating 18 U.S.C. § 2071(b). That statute, which prohibits destruction of certain government records, disqualifies a convicted person from "holding any office under the United States." See Seth Barrett Tillman, Who Can Be President of the United States?: Candidate Hillary Clinton and the Problem of Statutory Qualifications, 5 BRIT. J. AM. LEGAL STUD. 95 (2016). Former-Attorney General Michael Mukasey, who had previously contended that Clinton could be disqualified, was persuaded by Tillman. He wrote "on reflection, … Professor Tillman's [analysis] is spot on, and mine was mistaken . . . ." See Eugene Volokh & Seth Barrett Tillman, No, Hillary Clinton wouldn't be legally ineligible for the Presidency even if she had violated government records laws, WASH. POST: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Aug. 26, 2015, 12:54 PM), https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/volokh-conspiracy/wp/2015/08/26/no-hillary-clinton-wouldnt-be-legally-ineligible-for-the-presidency-even-if-she-had-violated-government-records-laws/; see also Charlie Savage, If Trump broke a law on the removal of official records, would he be barred from future office?, N.Y. TIMES (Aug. 8, 2022, 10:18 PM), https://www.nytimes.com/2022/08/09/us/politics/trump-fbi-investigation.html ("But in considering that situation, several legal scholars — including Seth B. Tillman of Maynooth University in Ireland and Eugene Volokh of the University of California, Los Angeles — noted that the Constitution sets eligibility criteria for who can be president, and argued that Supreme Court rulings suggest Congress cannot alter them."). More recently, former-Attorney General Mukasey wrote that the President is not an "Officer of the United States" for purposes of Section 3. Michael Mukasey, Was Trump 'an Officer of the United States'?, WALL ST. J. (Sept. 7, 2023, 12:59 PM), https://wsj.com/articles/was-trump-an-officer-of-the-united-states-constitution-14th-amendment-50b7d26. As the world turns, in 2022, the search warrant for former-President Donald Trump's home at Mar-A-Lago invoked Section 2071. See Josh Blackman, No, 18 U.S.C. § 2071 Cannot Disqualify Trump from the Presidency, REASON: VOLOKH CONSPIRACY (Aug. 8, 2022, 11:25 PM), https://reason.com/volokh/2022/08/08/no-18-u-s-c-%C2%A7-2071-cannot-disqualify-trump-from-the-presidency/. Ultimately, Trump was not indicted with violating this statute.

[644] See supra subpart IV(B).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

points in the same direction . . . ."[645] Again, that's hyperbole. Our point is more limited, Section 3 is difficult to interpret, there is evidence pointing in different directions. If Section 3 is ambiguous, such ambiguities furnish no good ground to exclude a candidate from the ballot or denying a voter his preferred choice.

H. Parting thoughts on the phrase "Officer of the United States" in Section 3

To this day, it remains quite common for legal documents to distinguish appointed officers from elected, apex officials when discussing constitutions, as well as in many other contexts. For example, in the corporate law setting, insurance against suits alleging a violation of fiduciary duties is most commonly called: "directors and officers insurance" or "directors and officers liability insurance." Identifying such insurance as "directors and other officers insurance" or as "directors and other officers liability insurance" is virtually unheard of.[646]

Many parliamentary draftsmen and learned scholars wrote that way in 1788 and in 1868. That linguistic convention still survives to this day. Recently, two learned scholars wrote:

> These actors [enforcing Section 3] might include (for example): state election officials; other state executive or administrative officials; state legislatures and governors; the two houses of Congress; the President and subordinate executive branch officers; state and federal judges deciding cases where such legal rules apply; even electors for the offices of president and vice president.[647]

The scholars, of course, are Baude and Paulsen. We flagged this passage earlier in subsection I(B)(3). When Baude and Paulsen wrote

---

[645] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 103.

[646] Google returns over 600,000 results for "directors and officers insurance" and "directors and officers liability insurance." By contrast, Google returns under 10 results for "directors and other officers insurance" and "directors and other officers liability insurance." Directors are elected apex officials; officers are appointed by and work for directors. It is no surprise that corporate law and constitutional law share this linguistic tradition—both areas of law have a common genealogical heritage.

[647] Baude & Paulsen, supra note 1, at 23.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

the passage above, they did not notice they implicitly followed this linguistic convention: there was no reason to list "governors" if they were dead sure that such positions were already incorporated in "other state executive or administrative officials." That's a tell.

Likewise, when Baude and Paulsen list the President, they list that position expressly and contrast it with "subordinate executive branch officers." Why use that language? You will not find "subordinate executive branch officers" in the Constitution or in any of the statutes they suggest were models for Section 3. Indeed, under the Supreme Court's precedents, Article II distinguishes between principal officers of the United States and inferior officers of the United States—all of whom are subordinate to the President. Yet no one would describe the President as a principal officer. The President is distinguished from officers of the United States.

To communicate with the reader, Baude and Paulsen depart from the language of Article VI and Section 3. When they want you to know the presidency is included, they list his position expressly. When Section 3 does not expressly use such language, they want you to believe that general "office"- and "officer"-language achieves the same effect. They know how to write and communicate clearly and proceed to do so. Yet, Baude and Paulsen want you to believe that the Framers of the Constitution of 1788 and Section 3 lacked such basic communication skills.

In both cases, involving governors and the President, Baude and Paulsen did not hide the apex official in a mousehole. They listed the apex official separately, because they knew readers would not naturally include it in the more general phrase, "state executive or administrative officials" or in other phrases using general "office"- and "officer"-language. Or maybe they listed the apex official separately because they were not sure, and they wanted to eliminate any doubts.

If Baude and Paulsen are not entirely sure about whether a Governor is a "state executive," then they should exhibit caution when concluding whether the President is an "Officer of the United States." Why? Because, as Attorney General Stanbery explained circa 1868, efforts to restrict the scope of democratic participation by positive law require us to be sure, and if in doubt, we give the benefit of that doubt to letting the candidate participate and letting the voter vote for the candidate of his choice.[648] The Democracy Canon demands no less.[649]

---

[648] The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 141, 160 (1867).

[649] See generally Richard L. Hasen, The Democracy Canon, 62 STAN. L. REV. 69 (2009).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Some scholars have argued that our reading of "officers of the United States" is absurd.[650] In Reading Law, Justices Scalia and Garner describe the absurdity doctrine as a contextual canon: "A provision may be either disregarded or judicially corrected as an error (when the correction is textually simple) if failing to do so would result in a disposition that no reasonable person could approve."[651] Prominent textualists have argued that courts should be very hesitant before invoking the absurdity doctrine.[652] Scalia and Garner recognized that "error-correction for absurdity can be a slippery slope," which "can lead to judicial revision of public and private texts to make them (in the judges' view) more reasonable."[653] We think this concern is especially apt with regard to Section 3. At bottom, a broader reading of "Officer of the United States" reduces the universe of candidates who can hold office. Applying the absurdity doctrine in this fashion is necessarily anti-democratic. And from a textualist perspective, it is not enough to argue that some people—including law professors—think there is an absurdity. Rather, Scalia and Garner tell us, "[t]he absurdity must consist of a disposition that no reasonable person could intend."[654] Something that "may seem odd . . . is not absurd."[655] Or, as Justice Story put it:

> "[I]f, in any case, the plain meaning of a provision, not contradicted by any other provision of the same instrument, is to be disregarded, because we believe the framers of that instrument could not intend what they say,

---

650 Somin, supra note 572 (using the word "absurd" five times in the span of five paragraphs).

651 ANTONIN SCALIA & BRYAN A. GARNER, READING LAW: THE INTERPRETATION OF LEGAL TEXTS 189 (2012).

652 Scalia & Garner, supra note __ at 189 John F. Manning, The Absurdity Doctrine, 116 HARV. L. REV. 2387, 2476–79 (2003) (noting the Supreme Court's ill-founded use of the absurdity doctrine in the Holy Trinity case (1892) and correctly suggesting that modern textualists use a reasonable-user-of-language approach to assess whether a statute produces absurd results)). See also Amy Coney Barrett, Substantive Canons and Faithful Agency, 90 B.U. L. REV. 109, 168 (2010) ("Making exceptions either to achieve greater equity or avoid absurdity offends the rule of law norm because '[o]nce the court provisionally identifies a statute's (otherwise clear) meaning, the absurdity doctrine invites the court to make adjustments based on social values whose content and method of derivation are both unspecified ex ante.'" (quoting id.)).

653 SCALIA & GARNER, supra note 651, at 189.

654 Id. at 189.

655 Id.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> it must be one, where the absurdity and injustice of applying the provision to the case would be so monstrous, that all mankind would, without hesitation, unite in rejecting the application."[656]

We don't doubt that some people, including law professors, view Trump's re-election as something so "monstrous, that all mankind would, without hesitation, unite in rejecting the application." We think tens of millions of voters would disagree. But in any event, that is not the relevant inquiry for textualism. Rather, the question is whether a reasonable person could conclude that the President is not an "Officer of the United States" for purposes of Section 3. Part V of this article may not fully persuade you that the President is not an "Officer of the United States." But our textual and historical arguments clear the "reasonable person" threshold.

Moreover, Scalia and Garner explain, the absurdity "doctrine does not include substantive errors arising from a drafter's failure to appreciate the effect of certain provisions." As we noted above, the "Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment were not omniscient" and may not have "anticipate[d] that a businessman would ascend to the presidency without having held any prior office tied to any Article VI oath."[657] Finally, even if you still are not certain, the Democracy Canon, as articulated by Attorney General Stanbery, should prevail over a nebulous application of the Absurdity Canon: we should give the benefit of doubt to letting the candidate participate and letting the voter vote for the candidate of his choice.

***

In writing this analysis of the phrase "officers of the United States," we find ourselves disagreeing with two scholars we know and admire. It is conceivable that they are correct, and we, wrong. It is also conceivable that we are right, and they, wrong. It is also possible that we are both wrong. That said: we cannot both be correct. The Constitution and Section 3 must have meant something in 1788 and 1868, or, at the very least, one discovered or constructed meaning is better.

---

656 1 JOSEPH STORY, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES § 427, at 303 (1st ed. 1833). For those keeping score at home, Justice Story's Commentaries supports our textualist position. See supra Tillman & Blackman, Part III, supra note 533 at 399 (noting that Story's Commentaries on the Constitution contends that the President is not an "Officer of the United States").

657 Supra subpart V(F).

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Early in their paper, Baude and Paulsen made use of a reasonably well-known quotation, absent a citation, and absent quotation marks. Here, we return the favor with a lesser-known quotation, with attribution.

> [T]he Court's sole function is to interpret a constitutional description of power or restraint upon power and say whether a given measure falls on one side of a line consequently drawn or on the other, and that it has nothing whatever to do with the merits or demerits of the measure.
>
> Such a function has led us all[,] I think[,] to believe that close adherence to legal reasoning is the only way to maintain the confidence of all parties in federal conflicts. It may be that the Court is thought to be excessively legalistic. I should be sorry to think that it is anything else. There is no other safe guide to judicial decisions in great conflicts than a strict and complete legalism.[658]

Is our reading of the Constitution's "office"- and "officer"-language "excessively legalistic"? We plead guilty.

***

Our position is that the phrase "Officers of the United States," as used in the Constitution of 1788, does not refer to elected positions. Baude and Paulsen have put forward little substantial evidence that the meaning changed by 1868, and that the specific phrase in Section 3 includes the elected president. If we are right that the President is not a Section 3 "Officer of the United States," then the courts and Congress will, or at least, should be spared the need to decide if President Trump engaged in insurrection or rebellion for Section 3 purposes.

---

[658] Swearing In of Sir Owen Dixon as Chief Justice (Apr. 12, 1952), in (1952) 85 C.L.R. xi, xiii-xiv.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Conclusion

We conclude this article where we began: establishing the original public meaning of Section 3 is difficult. Is it true that "essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ."? No.

First, the question of whether Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing cannot be resolved by pointing to Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment or to other provisions of the Constitution. The caselaw in those areas does not support any presumption that constitutional provisions are self-executing. Trump has not been disqualified pursuant to any federal enforcement legislation.

Second, in Griffin's Case, Chief Justice Chase wrote that Section 3 could only be implemented through federal enforcement legislation. This decision, handed down within a year of the Fourteenth Amendment's ratification, was, and remains, reasonably probative evidence with regard to whether Section 3 is self-executing. Indeed, this decision was repeatedly cited for much of the past 150 years, and it only became subject to criticism in 2020 or so. Furthermore, the Case of Jefferson Davis can be reconciled with Griffin's Case. If Chase was correct, then States cannot unilaterally remove Trump from the ballot.

Third, a Section 3 disqualification is triggered by a covered person who (i) engages in insurrection or rebellion against the United States or who (ii) gives aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. A state cannot allege that Trump gave aid and comfort to enemies, since there was no actual war. And, contra Baude and Paulsen, no one can be disqualified for giving aid or comfort to an insurrection because Section 3 lists no such offense. Disqualification can only result from the direct substantive offense: engaging in insurrection. And failing to stop an insurrection is not the same as actually engaging in insurrection. As far as we know, as of today, neither Trump, nor anyone else, has been charged with any offense concerning insurrection in regard to January 6. If Trump did not actually engage in insurrection, then States cannot unilaterally remove Trump from the ballot under the authority of Section 3.

Fourth, we have put forward substantial evidence that the President is not an "officer of the United States" for purposes of Section 3. Numerous sources that we cited discussed this issue; no one spoke in a "secret code," as Baude and Paulsen charge. If we are correct, Trump is not subject to Section 3 at all. If we are right, then States cannot unilaterally remove Trump from the ballot under the authority of Section 3. Moreover, if we are correct, then there is no need to decide whether Section 3 is self-executing, or whether Trump's conduct amounted to engaging in insurrection or rebellion.[659]

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

What about Baude and Paulsen's article? The theoretical defects and other errors are not insubstantial and span multiple independent issues. We see no sound basis for their Article's startling conclusion: "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ." Indeed, we cannot remember having seen such a conclusion in any academic publication before–at least, none comes readily to mind. We cannot remember having seen an academic article repeatedly making hyperbolic claims–at least, none comes readily to mind. Baude and Paulsen's article tells only one side of a complex story, and it does not fully respond to (and sometimes fails to see) contrary evidence. Their article is now a draft posted on the Social Science Research Network. We suggest that scholars, litigants, elections administrators, and judges allow their article to percolate in the literature before placing too great a reliance on its novel claims.

Still, however Baude and Paulsen's article should evolve, we worry about the impact it has already had. We think the effect of their article is to take the focus off voters and traditional election law administrators and to transfer, in substantial part, the responsibility for Section 3 enforcement to a whole host of high level government officials, including elected officials, who have no clear duties related to traditional election law proceedings. We don't say that their article articulates precisely that result, but we think it will be and, perhaps, already has been understood that way.

Inevitably, this issue will be thrust into the courts, and in the end, quite possibly the Supreme Court. We recently observed that "[a] Supreme Court ruling on [Trump and Section 3] could make Bush v.

---

[659] Blackman & Tillman, supra note 10, at 54 ("In 2020, the U.S. Supreme Court was able to avoid resolving any of the major election disputes. But 2024 may be different. A Supreme Court ruling on this issue could make Bush v. Gore seem mild by comparison. There are many prudential reasons for the Court to avoid deciding whether Trump engaged in insurrection, or whether Trump can be—or perhaps was already—disqualified. The Court should stay out of that MAGA thicket. A narrow finding that the President is not an "officer of the United States" ends the case. That opinion would be entirely consistent with Supreme Court authority from Mouat to Free Enterprise Fund. It would track the text of Section 3. It would be consistent with the Constitution of 1788. And, most importantly, it allows the people to elect the next President, and not the courts, much less partisan election boards.").

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Gore seem mild by comparison."[660] But instead of potentially disqualifying thousands of ballots in South Florida, the Court would potentially disqualify a candidate who may receive tens of millions of votes across the country in 2024. Perhaps that step could be justified if "essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction . . . ." But it doesn't.

Postscript

In some regards, our article, and Baude and Paulsen's articles, are like two ships passing in the night, that are headed towards the same port.[661] We are both updating and revising our articles on separate publication schedules, all in anticipation of fast-moving litigation that could culminate in review by the United States Supreme Court or a joint session of Congress or both. It would be impossible, and indeed undesirable, were we to respond to each other at every iteration, with substantial revisions. Rather, we include this Postscript section to highlight several substantial changes that Baude and Paulsen have made after our initial draft was shared on September 11, 2023. We do not suggest that every, or even any, change they made was in response to our draft.

- Our first draft focused, at some length, on a claim Baude and Paulsen made towards the end of their article: "In the end, essentially all the evidence concerning the original textual meaning of Section Three . . . points in the same direction." Baude and Paulsen revised this claim: "In the end, the sum total of evidence concerning the original textual meaning . . . points in a consistent direction." We leave it to the reader to contemplate if there is much difference between "essentially all" and "sum total," and between "same direction" and "consistent direction." It seems to us that, at the margin, their claim was softened, at least a bit. And if they softened their claim, they do not explain in what regard their prior claim was imprecise, and they do not explain what new evidence or arguments persuaded them to make this change.
- Our first draft criticized Baude and Paulsen for suggesting that engaging in any secession movements would necessarily amount to conduct that violates Section 3. Peaceful secession movements,

---

660 Id.

661 See supra note 2.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

we contended, would not trigger disqualification under Section 3. Baude and Paulsen made several changes throughout their most recent draft to stress that only "unilateral secession" would trigger disqualification under Section 3. They write "As a clarification: we use the term 'secession' here and throughout this article to refer to unilateral secession without the consent of the federal government, as in the Civil War, and do not discuss ways the federal government might lawfully consent to the independence of a state or territory." We agree that their revised position is improved over their original language. Perhaps, we can also convince them that it is perfectly appropriate for scholars to reserve judgment on difficult issues, at the risk of others' characterizing their limited positions as being "non-committal"?

- Our first draft concluded that Baude and Paulsen were wrong to suggest that "enemies" could exist in the absence of a war. Now, Baude and Paulsen at least acknowledge this point. They write: "we cannot rule out another narrower possibility, that 'enemies' is limited to those with whom the US are effectively at war, and thus excludes insurrections and rebellions that do not rise to the level of a civil war. This would create a more complicated two-track system where Section Three covers all insurrections and rebellions, as well as 'aid or comfort' to a more limited set of insurrections and rebellions. While it strikes us as less likely, we cannot definitively rule it out." This "narrower" position is supported by substantial evidence. And that substantial evidence still undermines Baude and Paulsen's attempts to conflate Section 3's two conduct prongs: "engage in insurrection" and giving "aid or comfort to enemies."
- Our first draft faulted Baude and Paulsen for not explaining how Section 3 may affect the Speech or Debate Clause. Now, Baude and Paulsen suggest that "each house's powers of exclusion and expulsion are necessarily the sole mechanism for enforcing Section Three." This position comes with no ready explanation—it is merely announced. If, as they have repeatedly argued, Section 3 can retroactively modify, amend, or supersede all prior constitutional text, including everything from the Ex Post Facto Clause to the First Amendment, why could not Section 3 also modify Congress's pre-existing sole powers over elections, returns, and qualifications of its members? Why couldn't the federal judiciary, charged with enforcing Section 3—according to Baude and Paulsen—disqualify a sitting member of Congress? Indeed, if, as Baude and Paulsen have argued, Section 3 powers are shared with the

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

States, then state courts and state administrative bodies might equally disqualify a member-elect from being seated in Congress.

- Our first draft faulted Baude and Paulsen for taking internally inconsistent positions. For example, they wrote "it is not at all clear that [Section 3] inflicts punishment," and also wrote that Section 3 is an "offense, conviction, and punishment all rolled into one." The former statement remains, but they've tweaked the "rolled into one" line. The article now states that Section 3 "enacts its standard and imposes its consequences all at once." A "consequence" seems to be a synonym for "punishment." The tension remains.
- Baude and Paulsen stated that Alexander Stephens, who had previously served as a member of Congress before the Civil War began, violated his oath of office. In our view, oaths of office last as long as the holder (lawfully) remains in his position. When Stephens joined the (purported) confederacy, he was no longer subject to this oath of office as a member of Congress. Baude and Paulsen made a very subtle change to acknowledge this point. In their initial draft, they wrote that "These men," which referenced Stephens, "had notoriously violated previously sworn oaths to support the U.S. Constitution." Their article now drops "These men," and referred more generally to "The former Confederates." We take it that Baude and Paulsen have shifted from their original position, and that they recognize that the issue is not so clear, or perhaps, they now agree with our understanding of the standard view of the temporal scope of oaths: i.e., it is not possible for a person to violate an oath of office he took, after he no longer holds that office.

As best as we can tell, these were the only revisions that addressed points raised in our first draft. Our other criticisms have not yet been addressed. Baude and Paulsen still insist that giving aid and comfort to an insurrection or insurrectionists could trigger disqualification under Section 3. They continue to characterize Chief Justice Chase's opinion in Griffin's Case as "appalling." They do not address Cale v. Covington, a Fourth Circuit decision from 1978, which read Griffin's Case as holding "that the third section of the Fourteenth Amendment, concerning disqualifications to hold office, was not self-executing absent congressional action." Cale stands for the proposition that one cannot get affirmative relief under the Fourteenth Amendment absent a federal enforcement statute, which would seem to ban any relief under

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section 3 unless Congress enacts such an enforcement statute. Maybe Cale is "bonkers" too. There is still no effort to define what an "Officer of the United States"—other than to affirm that whatever is included, that category must include the presidency. (Their discussion of our textualist position was virtually unchanged.) And all too much of their language was and remains hyperbole.

Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=4599500

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/30/2023 6:07:39 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
CC: Zack Goldberg [zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org]

Subject: Check-in
Location: Microsoft Teams Meeting

Start: 10/30/2023 7:00:00 PM
End: 10/30/2023 7:30:00 PM
Show Time As: Tentative

Recurrence: (none)

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Microsoft Teams meeting

Join on your computer, mobile app or room device
Click here to join the meeting

Meeting ID: Security MCL 15.243(1)(u)
Passcode:
Download Teams | Join on the web

Or call in (audio only)
Security MCL 15.243(1)(u) United States, New York City
Phone Conference ID: Security MCL 15.243(1)(u)
Find a local number | Reset PIN

Learn More | Meeting options

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/30/2023 2:14:34 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: States United 14.3 tracker
Attachments: 14A Litigation tracker (Oct. 26).docx

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Heather:

Please find attached the updated 14.3 Litigation Tracker with updates highlighted.

Some things of note:

Colorado:

- In Anderson v. Griswold:
- The court denied Trump's remaining motions to dismiss (based on the Colorado ballot statutes and 14.3) and the Colorado Republican party's motion to dismiss. With respect to Trump's Motion to Dismiss based on 14.3, the court rejected Trump's argument that the claims are nonjusticiable political questions and found that states can apply 14.3 to state statutes without federal enforcement legislation. The court noted that the questions of whether 14.3 applies to a president and whether Trump engaged in insurrection will be considered at the hearing.
- The court denied Trump's motion to realign Secretary Griswold as a Petitioner: "The Court holds while Secretary Griswold might have her own personal views of Intervenor Trump, in the context of this litigation she is not antagonistic such that realignment is appropriate."
- The parties have been briefing several evidentiary issues.
- Trump filed a Petition for Relief to the Colorado Supreme Court under a Colorado statute that gives the Colorado Supreme Court original jurisdiction over certain matters. Trump argues the trial court was wrong to deny his motions to dismiss.
- The court will start its five-day hearing next Monday, October 30 at 8am MT. The hearing should be available via livestream here: https://judicial.webex.com/meet/d02-dnvr-courtroom209.

Michigan

- In Davis v. Benson and La Brant v. Benson:
- The court issued an order denying Trump's motion to intervene without prejudice based on the insufficiency of the intervention filings. The court granted the motion for Trump to file an Amicus Curiae pleading and noted it would allow Trump to present oral argument in this capacity. The court held in abeyance Trump's motion for summary disposition.

Minnesota

- In Growe v. Simon:
- The Court ordered supplemental briefings to address a 2012 case filed under Minnesota law to remove Barack Obama from the ballot based on citizenship (Oines v. Ritchie). The case was dismissed by the Minnesota Supreme Court in an unpublished order based on laches and the court's determination that Congress decides challenges to the qualifications of presidential candidates pursuant to 3 USC § 15.
- Oral Argument will be held next Thursday, November 2 at 10am CT. The OA should be available via livestream here: https://www.mncourts.gov/supremecourt.aspx.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Zack Goldberg [zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/30/2023 7:05:21 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
CC: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Subject: CO Hearing Link

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

https://live.coloradojudicial.gov/?streamId=35b1db1b-2ccc-47e8-9f59-33cd656391f9

The stream is available at "Denver Courtroom 209" on the right side of the screen.

Zack Goldberg (he/him) | Counsel
States United Democracy Center
917.656.6234 | @statesunited
zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/1/2023 6:10:36 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: Re: 10/25 CO court order

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

One thing to note is that the CO judge's decision on the political question doctrine was tentative. See page 18:

The Court, having considered the above, declines to dismiss this case under the political question doctrine. A controversy involves a political question when, as is argued here, there is "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department." Baker, 369 U.S. at 217. As the foregoing demonstrates, there is no textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department. The text is simply silent as to the specific issue, and arguments by inference, implication, or convention fail to demonstrate the kind of strong "textually demonstrable commitment" necessary for the Court to find the matter nonjusticiable. See, e.g., U.S. CONST. art. I, § 5, cl. 1 ("Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own Members"); Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 548 (1969) (Art. I, § 5, cl. 1 is a "textually demonstrable commitment" to Congress to judge only the qualifications expressly set forth in art. I, § 2, cl. 2, and nothing more).

The Court will, however, revisit this ruling when it makes a final ruling following the hearing set to begin October 30, 2023 to the extent that there is any evidence or argument at trial that provides the Court with additional guidance on whether the issue of presidential eligibility has been delegated to the United States Congress.

From: Meingast, Heather (AG) <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Date: Wednesday, November 1, 2023 at 2:04 PM
To: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Subject: RE: 10/25 CO court order

From: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Sent: Wednesday, November 1, 2023 1:54 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Subject: 10/25 CO court order

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

This order from Colorado addresses political question, self-execution, and some other issues.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/20/2023 1:00:00 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: 14.3 update
Attachments: 14A Litigation tracker (Oct. 19) [91].docx

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Heather,

Please find attached the 14.3 Litigation Tracker for this week with updates highlighted.

Some things of note:

Colorado:

- In Anderson v. Griswold:
- The court denied Trump's Anti-SLAPP Motion to Dismiss.
- Secretary Griswold notified the court that her office received candidacy materials for Trump but would hold the application as pending while awaiting direction from the court.
- Trump filed a Motion to Realign Secretary Griswold as a Petitioner, citing her intent to hold Trump's candidacy application, comments she has made publicly about Trump, and the statement in her 9/29 Omnibus Response that "the Secretary believes that Mr. Trump incited the insurrection."

Michigan

- In Davis v. Benson and La Brant v. Benson:
- Secretary Benson filed a brief answering questions posed by the court. Secretary Benson argued that the Secretary has no affirmative legal duty or authority to decide whether the Fourteenth Amendment renders Trump eligible to be placed on the ballot prior to a court's review of the issue. Secretary Benson took no position as to the constitutional questions raised by 14.3 but laid out arguments raised on both sides.
- Trump filed motions to intervene and motions for summary disposition.
- A hearing is tentatively scheduled for November 6.

Minnesota

- In Growe v. Simon:
- The court denied the 2024 Trump Campaign's motion to intervene for procedural reasons. The court invited the Trump Campaign to file an amicus brief, which it did.
- Secretary Simon filed his brief arguing that Petitioners have standing and that the case is ripe. In the alternative (if the case is not ripe), Secretary Simon argues that the case is functionally justiciable and should be decided immediately.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/20/2023 7:51:30 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: Brater testimony
Attachments: 6_VI_Eastman0630_Grimmer_Brater.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Hi Heather,

Mike asked me to send you the transcript of Jonathan Brater's testimony in the Eastman trial.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/20/2023 7:51:30 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: Brater testimony
Attachments: 6_VI_Eastman0630_Grimmer_Brater.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Hi Heather,

Mike asked me to send you the transcript of Jonathan Brater's testimony in the Eastman trial.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

STATE BAR COURT

OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

HEARING DEPARTMENT - LOS ANGELES

In the Matter of:	Case No. SBC-23-O-30029-YDR
JOHN CHARLES EASTMAN, ESQ.,
Respondent.	VOLUME VI

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS
BEFORE THE HONORABLE YVETTE D. ROLAND
FRIDAY, JUNE 30, 2023
845 SOUTH FIGUEROA STREET
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA 90017

APPEARANCES:

For the State Bar:
DUNCAN C. CARLING, ESQ.
SAMUEL J. BECKERMAN, ESQ.
The State Bar of California
180 Howard Street
San Francisco, California
94105

CHRISTINA E. WANG, ESQ.
The State Bar of California
845 South Figueroa Street
Los Angeles, California 90017

Audio Reporter: E. Alvarez

Proceedings recorded by digital recording; transcript produced by:

Briggs Reporting Company, Inc.
9711 Cactus Street
Suite B
Lakeside, California 92040
(310) 410-4151

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

APPEARANCES: (cont'd.)

For the Respondent:

RANDALL A. MILLER, ESQ.
ZACHARY MAYER, ESQ.
Miller Law Associates
411 South Hewitt Street
Los Angeles, California 90013
(213) 493-6401

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I N D E X

WITNESSES	DIRECT	CROSS	REDIRECT	RECROSS
Justin Grimmer (recalled)	VI- 16	VI- 72	VI-122	--
Jonathan Brater	VI-138	VI-190	VI-217	--

EXHIBITS		IDENTIFIED	RECEIVED
State Bar's
99	Video of Sterling press conference	(prev.)	VI-134
112	Michigan audit report for 2020 general election	VI-153	VI-158
113	Michigan Bureau of Elections performance audit	VI-158	VI-162
169	Affidavit submitted by Brater in Dominion v. Fox matter	VI-162	VI-179
305	New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Judicial Department, decision re: Giuliani, pp. 21-23 only	(prev.)	VI-130
Respondent's
1036	Document	VI- 41	--
1043	Document entitled "2020 Presidential Election: Startling Vote Spikes"	VI-207	--

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

EXHIBITS (cont'd.)		IDENTIFIED	RECEIVED
Respondent's
1044	Document entitled "Edison Time Series Distribution Analysis in the 2020 Presidential Election"	VI-207	--
1046	Document entitled "2020 Presidential Election Contrast Analysis"	VI-209	--

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE CLERK: Please come to order. The State Bar Court is now in session, the Honorable Yvette Roland presiding.

We're on the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Good morning, everyone. We're on the record in the continued hearing of John Charles Eastman, in Case Number 23-O-30029.

Counsel, please make your appearance.

MR. CARLING: Duncan Carling for the State Bar. Good morning.

THE COURT: Good morning, Mr. Carling.

MS. WANG: Good morning. Christina Wang for the State Bar.

THE COURT: Good morning, Ms. Wang.

MR. BECKERMAN: Good morning. Samuel Beckerman for the State Bar.

THE COURT: Good morning, Mr. Beckerman.

MR. MILLER: Good morning, your Honor. Randy Miller for Respondent John Eastman.

THE COURT: Good morning, Mr. Miller.

MR. EASTMAN: Good morning, your Honor. John Eastman, Respondent.

THE COURT: Good morning, Doctor Eastman.

MR. MAYER: Zach Mayer for Respondent. Good morning, your Honor.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Good morning, Mr. Mayer.

Okay. I am hearing some feedback. Is that --

THE CLERK: (Indiscernible.)

THE COURT: Mr. Carling, I understand that this morning you're going to continue with the direct examination of Doctor Grimmer?

MR. CARLING: That's correct.

THE COURT: And then, after that, Mr. Miller will have an opportunity to cross-examine Doctor Grimmer. And then, this afternoon, you plan to begin with the testimony of Jonathan Brater?

MR. CARLING: Correct.

THE COURT: And (indiscernible) hearing. (Indiscernible) testimony yesterday, Mr. Miller. You have asserted a number of objections with regard to that testimony. (Indiscernible) objections along the lines that the testimony of Doctor Grimmer (indiscernible) opinions which did not get offered at his deposition.

MR. MILLER: I think that captures it, your Honor, yes.

THE COURT: Specifically which opinions are you referring to? Because I had an opportunity to review the transcript, and I certainly (indiscernible) a number of things (indiscernible) he testified about yesterday.

MR. MILLER: Yes. I remember the questions and the testimony yesterday, and where I had made the objections. The essence of the subject matter was about efforts that Doctor Grimmer took to respond to specific pieces of evidence, some of it from Doctor Eastman's answer to the NDC, commenting and critiquing each of those. So that was one area that was not offered, despite opportunity, in Doctor Grimmer's deposition transcript. I think that's a good starting point.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: So, just to be clear, you're objecting to Doctor Grimmer's expert opinions offered regarding representations made by Doctor Eastman in his response to the notice of disciplinary charges?

MR. MILLER: In a broad sense, yes, that's correct. So the undertaking by Doctor Grimmer, the Court understands, was in part to look at the answer of Doctor Eastman to the NDC. He was questioned about the work that he did in the deposition. He was ask several times whether he has expressed all of his opinions in that regard, and at no point in time in the deposition did Doctor Grimmer offer any testimony about any specific critique he had done, or examination or investigation, with respect to those parts of Doctor Eastman's answer where he referred to a document or a video or a transcript of some sort, or a case. So that, I think, was the essence of --

THE COURT: Where Doctor Eastman --

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: I'm sorry.

THE COURT: Where Doctor Eastman referred to a video or the details that you just outlined?

MR. MILLER: The answer was very long, 111 pages long. So I think, as I understood the undertaking by Doctor Grimmer, is that he went through that, and whatever the references were that were included in Doctor Eastman's answer -- there were references to cases. There were references to reports. There were references to video footage. There were references to transcription of hearings, a whole panoply of information that was contained in Doctor Eastman's answer. It was very, very, very complete.

So, when I inquired of Doctor Grimmer in the deposition what work he had done and what opinions he was prepared to offer, I asked him a number of questions about his opinions, and then asked him if had anything else to offer. He said, "Yes, I do. I have my four buckets I'd like to explain." And I said, "Okay. Go ahead and do so." At the end of that passage, I asked Doctor Grimmer, "Do you have any other opinions to offer?" And he says, "No, I think that's it."

And I asked him also if he plans on doing any future work. The answer was, other than preparing for the hearing, nothing else was contemplated. I said, "If you have anything more, different opinions or supplemental opinions, will you let me know?" And the representation was "Yes, we would let you know," and that communication was never made.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So, as far as I was concerned, your Honor, the record was very complete, in that Doctor Grimmer was given the opportunity to explain his opinions. We closed that out, as, you know, good examiners do, and I made sure that everything was captured, and he had the opportunity to explain what his opinions were, and the bases for those opinions.

THE COURT: So, just to be clear, your objection goes to Doctor Grimmer's testimony regarding any reference to Doctor Eastman's response?

MR. MILLER: That's one area.

So I think, if I remember correctly, your Honor, yesterday, the objection was made at the point where Mr. Carling started to inquire of Doctor Grimmer, you know, "What else did you do?," something along those lines, and he started to explain, "Well, I looked at all this information in the answer, and I developed opinions with respect to the credibility or the reliability of those sources of information that Doctor Eastman listed in his answer." And that's when I said, "I think he's beyond the scope, because we've closed this out."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So that was a starting point. I think there's other work that Doctor Grimmer apparently did, but did not testify about in the deposition, and he apparently did other critiques of forensic reports with respect to the 2020 election, and that was another area where I think I re-raised the objection that this is beyond the scope of his opinions set forth in the deposition.

So I think that captures it, generally. I don't have the transcription of yesterday's proceedings yet, but I think that's what I recall were the points and the bases for my Kennemur -- the case, Kennemur -- objection.

THE COURT: Okay. And the last objection goes to forensic work done by Doctor Grimmer which you contend he did not offer an expert opinion on?

MR. MILLER: That went beyond the opinions he expressed in the deposition, so when he started to venture into "Well, I looked at all these other reports as well. I looked at this state or that state," or "I looked at this testimony" or "I looked at this evidence," and none of that was expressed in his deposition.

So I think that's another sort of general area where Doctor Grimmer started to offer opinions that were inconsistent with the opinions that he had expressed and that I closed out in the deposition.

THE COURT: Were they inconsistent, or you're contending that they were supplemental?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: Well, "supplemental" is probably a better way to put it. They were opinions that weren't expressed despite questions right on point, that weren't expressed during the opportunity to do so in the deposition. My word was inconsistent with that, but I think it's better to say that they were supplemental to those opinions that were expressed. I'll accept that characterization.

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Carling, would you like to be heard on that objection?

MR. CARLING: Yes. I'll add a few things to my comments from yesterday. As I mentioned yesterday, Doctor Grimmer did submit an expert file, and it was not voluminous, and, in fact, during his deposition, he provided a "Further Notes" file to Mr. Miller which contained an outline of his opinions on various things, much of which was covered yesterday, and it involves Doctor Eastman's testimony to the Georgia subcommittee.

He mentions the parallel snakes, Francis Ryan, signature matching. That was part of Exhibit 3 to the deposition, which I don't believe the Court was provided with, but I understand Mr. Miller's position is that the expert file is somehow separate. But our position is that they were on notice as of the day of the deposition that Doctor Grimmer had opinions on these things.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I will also note that Doctor Grimmer was showing his expert designation during the deposition and said, "Yes, that's what I'm going to be offering opinions on," which, as the Court noted yesterday, included responding to Doctor Eastman's evidence cited in his answer, and, re-reading the transcript last night, I note that when Mr. Miller asked him if those were all of his opinions, what Doctor Grimmer said was, "Well, there's more details, of course, for each of these categories."

And then, as I think the Court probably last night, after that I said, you know, "You're prepared to speak about each particular piece of evidence?" And he said he was. So I believe we met our obligation of giving them an opportunity to ask more questions. His testimony yesterday has been consistent with what he said at deposition. He's just gone into more detail, which Respondent was on notice he would be doing.

THE COURT: Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: I sort of disagree with that procedure, your Honor. I don't think that attaching an expert file, regardless of its contents, is an opportunity to expand the opinions. When a file is created by the expert, brought to the deposition, and the expert is asked, "Do you have any opinions?," that would have been the opportunity to say, "Yes. As a matter of fact, I've got this big file, and that contains a bunch of stuff that I'd like to go into, Mr. Miller, because those form the bases for my opinions." That did not happen.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So the idea that, you know, the record is sort of seeded by the conclusion of the expert notes or an expert file, it doesn't overcome the expert's obligation to be truthful about the nature of their opinions. If I asked him two hours into the deposition, "Is that it?," you know, an expert testifying honestly would say, "No, I've got a lot more. You didn't go into this. I'd like to go into that now." But I asked him three times, "Is that it? Do you have any more opinions to offer?" And his testimony was "No, I don't."

So it's not on me to somehow extract that from him, and the fact that there's notes or whatever work product that the expert generated doesn't alleviate the obligation to be honest and fulsome with respect to the opinions that they have, and when they're asked -- because, obviously, they're there at the deposition.

They know what the opinions they expressed. They say, "That's a good question, because I think I have two or three more that I haven't expressed." So, when I close it out, then that's when this becomes a locked box. If it goes beyond that at any time, including a hearing, then the examining party has a right to say, "You didn't tell me about that," later on.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So, you know, your Honor talked about trial by ambush yesterday. This is an example of that, where there's a new opinion that appears at trial, and, as your Honor knows, the reason why we go through the exercise of taking a deposition is to lock it in, put it in a locked box, and so I know when I come to prepare for trial I'm not going to hear anything else from that expert.

And I don't know that I will. You know, most of the time, lawyers and experts are very faithful to the scope of their opinions in the deposition. So it sorts of goes to the point of having given you the transcript yesterday, because I had no idea that there would be, you know, some venture beyond the scope of the opinions given at the deposition. When it came up, I was prepared to deal with it.

So that's my view of this, and that's why it is prejudicial for Respondent to be hearing those opinions for the first time now, when there was opportunity to have provided those during the course of the deposition. The Kennemur case, which has been around for 40 years, makes that very clear. That's why we call it a "Kennemur objection."

THE COURT: Right. And I think that the -- I am going to review the transcript again, given your clarification as to the nature of your objections.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I will note, though, that when -- first of all, as far as the expert file is concerned, it was appropriate to turn over the expert file. The expert file, on the other hand, does not substitute in for expert witness testimony.

Nevertheless, Doctor Grimmer was asked -- I'm looking at pages nine through 10 of the transcript, where, Mr. Miller, you inquired about whether -- about the various categories of expert opinions that Doctor Grimmer had been designated to testify about in connection with the expert designation, and so Doctor Grimmer started, on page 10, to say yes, that he was going to testify about those three categories of opinions referenced in the designation, and he began to characterize them, and to give his testimony, and say that those could be put into the four broad buckets, and so we heard him begin to testify about his characterization of this expert opinion information in this forum, and then you said, at line -- he, Doctor Grimmer, said, from lines seven through 17, that he --

MR. MILLER: I'm sorry to interrupt, your Honor. Is that page nine? I apologize.

THE COURT: I'm looking at page 10 now.

MR. MILLER: Ten. Thank you.

THE COURT: Yes, at page 10, where you -- first, going back to line three, you said, "Are these three categories in paragraph 11A, B, and C an accurate description of those categories in which you are prepared to offer expert testimony in this case?"

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And he answered at line seven, "Yes, these are accurate. Another way to think about the categories here is to really think broadly about the evidence that John Eastman provided for illegal votes or fraudulent votes after the 2020 election, and my opinion," he goes on to say, "is that there's either no evidence for fraud or -- and what's more is that the evidence that was offered is based on either profound misunderstandings of statistics, or illogical use of evidence, or fundamental misunderstandings the way data merges work, and we can put these into four broad buckets."

And then you said, Mr. Miller, "Wait, wait, wait, wait, wait. Wait, wait, Mr. Grimmer." And then you went on to ask about the opinion. So Doctor Grimmer jumped into the opinions. I appreciate that, as the deposition progressed, you did ask on a number of occasions about his opinions, and you also directed his attention to his analysis of work done by Doctor Young, by Mr. Valentine, and he gave very specific opinions and answers regarding that.

On page 87 -- well, actually, he's giving a great deal of testimony starting with page 84. He is testifying about his view of -- his, if you want to think of it -- his four-bucket analysis, and he talks about what he considered to be the third set of claims, the first set of claims, the second, and he gives some extensive opinion testimony about that, through page 88, when, at the top of page 88, on line four, Mr. Miller, you ask, "May I refer to these categories as the 'four buckets,' using your phrasing?"

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

He says yes, and then you go on to say, "Have you now provided us with all of your opinions with respect to each of the four buckets of your critique?" And Doctor Grimmer responds, "Yes. Obviously, there would be -- as we discussed, there would be more details that come into each one of those buckets, but yes."

And so your next area of examination is not an inquiry into what those details are, but, rather, you being to ask Doctor Grimmer whether he has set out this, I'm going to call it, "four-bucket analysis," whether he's set that out in writing anywhere, and he acknowledges he did not produce a report, a written report.

You ask him whether or not he provided any testimony to a public body regarding these four buckets, this four-bucket analysis, and he answers that question regarding a particular case, testimony he gave in Gilbert v. Lombardo, and you then -- after inquiring about testimony to a public body, you inquire about his -- about consultations.

So it would appear that, while Doctor Grimmer identified or stated that there are more details associated with each of these buckets, and with his analysis regarding these various matters on which it was identified in March of 2023 that he was going to testify, that there was not the follow-up.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Like I said, I will go back and take a closer look to see if -- at least with regard to that first concern that you have, the first component of your objection regarding the testimony, or your challenge to his testimony regarding the NDC responses -- I'm sorry, regarding Doctor Eastman's response to the NDC. Then I will take a look at that as well, but, at this juncture, I don't see where that objection is well founded.

All right. Are we ready to go forward with Doctor Grimmer's testimony?

MR. CARLING: The State Bar is ready. I believe Doctor Grimmer is in the Zoom waiting room.

THE COURT: Okay. Would you bring him in, Elizabeth.

THE CLERK: Yes.

Good morning, Mr. Grimmer. Can you hear us and see us?

MR. GRIMMER: You're a little muffled.

THE CLERK: I'm sorry. Can you hear us and see us?

MR. GRIMMER: Yes.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE CLERK: Okay. Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Good morning, Doctor Grimmer.

MR. GRIMMER: Good morning.

THE COURT: Just a minute.

Mr. Miller, are you having some technical difficulties?

MR. MILLER: No. We just added those corrected exhibits onto my laptop, and Mr. Benveniste (phonetic) was loading them on. I think I'm all set now, but thank you for asking.

THE COURT: Got it. Okay. Thank you.

All right. Doctor Grimmer, we're going to continue with your testimony.

Would you again re-swear Doctor Grimmer.

THE CLERK: Yes.

Doctor Grimmer, can you go ahead and raise your right hand.

JUSTIN GRIMMER - STATE BAR'S WITNESS - PREVIOUSLY SWORN

THE CLERK: Thank you. Can you go ahead and state and also spell your first and last name for the record, please.

THE WITNESS: Yes. My first name is Justin, J-U-S-T-I-N, and my last name is Grimmer, G-R-I-M-M-E-R.

THE CLERK: Thank you so much.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you, Doctor Grimmer. We're going to continue with your direct examination by Mr. Carling, and then, when Mr. Carling finishes, then Mr. Miller will have an opportunity to cross-examine you this morning. All right?

Okay. Mr. Carling.

MR. CARLING: Thank you.

DIRECT EXAMINATION (RESUMED)

BY MR. CARLING:

Q Good morning, Doctor Grimmer.

A Good morning.

Q When we left off yesterday, I believe we were talking about the extent to which signature-matching issues were related to rejection of absentee ballots in Georgia. Doctor Grimmer, had we completed your testimony on that topic?

A I believe I've expressed my opinions about signature matching in Georgia, yes.

Q Okay. I'd like to direct your attention to page 64 in Doctor Eastman's answer, and, for the record, this is State Bar Exhibit 9.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. Just a second.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q Do you see a reference, Doctor Grimmer, to the Secretary of State in Pennsylvania eliminating signature verification on this page?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I believe I see it at line four to five, perhaps.
Q I'm sorry. I found the page I was looking for. This is page 62, I'm sorry, of Doctor Eastman's answer. This is it. Okay. All right. I apologize. Do you see the page that we're looking at now?
A I do, yes.
Q This is 63. Okay. It's confusing because the PDF says 64. Okay. In the middle of the page, starting at line nine, there is a line that says:

> "The Secretary of State's elimination of signature verification, contrary to Pennsylvania law" -- and cites a statute -- "caused, or least contributed to, a dramatic decline from 4.45 percent in 2018 to .28 percent in 2020, and the number of ballots that were disqualified because the signatures did not match the signatures on file, or, in other words, were illegally signed by someone other than the registered voter, affected more than 2.6 million ballots, of which nearly 60,000 would likely have been disqualified, using historic disqualification rates, when signature verification was conducted."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Do you see that?
A I do see that, yes.
Q All right. Did you believe the claim that signature verification issues affected, potentially, 2.6 million ballots in the 2020 election?
A Well, I believe the claim there is that's the number of mail-in and absentee ballots that were submitted in the state of Pennsylvania. That's where the 2.6 million number comes from.
Q Okay. Do you have an opinion as to whether signature verification issues caused or contributed to a dramatic decline in the ballots that were disqualified?
A So here it's similar to the issue in Georgia, where an aggregate decline is being used to explain some counterfactual, where "What would have happened had some other policy been in place?" But, like in Pennsylvania, there are many other reasons -- like in Georgia, excuse me -- there are many reasons why ballots can be rejected, including that they arrive after a deadline, and so, if they arrive after a deadline, that's another reason for rejection.
What's more, it's a little bit of an apples -- not even a little bit -- it's an apples-to-oranges comparison because there was -- in 2018, Pennsylvania did not have no-excuse absentee voting. That started in the 2020 election. And so it's difficult to make that comparison. And so I don't see the sort of evidence that we would expect to see in order to make a reliable claim that a change in the signature verification procedure caused a certain number of ballots that would have otherwise been disqualified to be then voted and accepted.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And what was the change that happened in 2018 in Pennsylvania?

A So, in 2019, as part of Act 77, no-excuse absentee voting was allowed in Pennsylvania.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. I missed what you said as to the effect of the 2019 no-excuse absentee balloting -- excuse me, absentee ballots being allowed.

THE WITNESS: So, prior to the 2020 election, Pennsylvania only had excused absentee voting, which required voters to have a particular excuse to vote not -- sorry -- to vote via a mail-in ballot, rather than a polling place. And then, for the 2020 election, Pennsylvania initiated no-excuse absentee voting, which allows individuals to apply for and then receive an absentee ballot without having to cite an excuse like being out of town, for example.

And so, because of that, that changes the composition of people who are voting, and so it makes it difficult to say that a reduction in the rejection rate is due to a particular policy, because there's, of course, lots of things changing. There's a big change in the way in which -- sorry -- the population of people who will be voting with a ballot that arrives by mail or through the County Clerk, and, of course, there's other things happening during the 2020 presidential election, such as candidates educating voters about how and when to return their ballots.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

BY MR. CARLING:

Q And, Doctor Grimmer, just to orient the Court and everyone else, the bucket that we're talking about today is your second one, correct, which is generally related to data analysis of voter records or administrative records? Is that correct?

A That's correct, yes.

Q Okay. So how is this claim about the Pennsylvania decline in absentee ballot rejections an example of this bucket of unreliable analysis?

A So here there's a claim being made, based on historical aggregate rejection rates, that a certain population of ballots should have been rejected, even though there is no underlying detail provided about a change in the underlying reason for those ballots being rejected, and so, while it is the case that the rejection rate in Pennsylvania in 2018 was around 4.45 percent -- I believe that to be an accurate number, to the best of my recollection -- we cannot attribute all of that to signature verification. In fact, it's unclear how to contribute what share of that to signature verification that may have occurred in 2018, compared to 2020.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In reports from data journalists, analyzing data from the 2010 and 2014 elections, obviously not as close and as perfect of data, but, nevertheless, useful, they report something on the order of 85 to 91 percent of ballots being rejected because they arrive after the deadline, which, of course, would have nothing to do with signature verification.

Q So 80 to 90 percent of the rejections are for reasons other than signature verification?

A Well, I want to be precise about this. So this is data that I've seen from the 2010 and 2014 midterm elections, and, again, it has the same critique about comparing 2018 to 2020. We see that in '10 and '14 because there's no -- in 2010 and 2014, there is only excused absentee voting in Pennsylvania, but, nevertheless, if we're going to use those years -- and that's years for which I have seen data about reasons for rejection in those years. I have seen estimates that are between 85 to 91 percent of ballots being rejected because they arrived after the deadline.

Q All right. Apart from signature-matching issues, do you have other examples of data analysis related to administrative records or voter records that is unreliable?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes. So another important category of claims that are made were made about individuals voting who are deceased or perhaps on a list of individuals still serving a felony term, and so these claims are made in Mr. Geels' affidavits in Trump v. Raffensperger, and then, I believe, are repeated in other locations.
Q All right. I want to --
A And --
Q I'm sorry. Were you done?
A Go ahead.
Q Well, I didn't want to interrupt you. Were you done with your answer?
A I was, yes.
Q Okay. All right. Doctor Grimmer, I'd like to show you Bryan Geels' affidavit in the Raffensperger case. This is Respondent's Exhibit 1048, Exhibit 3.
THE CLERK: I'm sorry. You said 1048 or 3?
THE COURT: 1048.
MR. CARLING: Well, the way Respondent did it is 1048 has a Sub-Exhibit 3.
THE CLERK: I see. Okay. Thank you.
BY MR. CARLING:
Q All right. Doctor Grimmer, I'm directing you to -- this is page 12 of the exhibit, and paragraph 29. Can you see this?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I can see this, yes.
Q And have you seen this affidavit before?
A I have, yes.
Q All right. And what is your understanding of what Mr. Geels is claiming in paragraph 29?
A So here you can see he's saying -- he's making an estimate of what he views as the number of individuals who were on the state's -- called the "active inmate file," or list of individuals who are currently serving a felony sentence, and, therefore, would be ineligible to vote in Georgia, and his estimate here is it's up to 2,560 individuals were on this list, the active inmate list, and, therefore, unable to cast vote, and cast a vote in 2020. That's the estimate that he made here.
Q All right. And do you believe that's a reliable estimate?
A I don't believe it's a reliable estimate, and, in fact, in Mr. Geels' affidavit, he makes clear that this sort of approach to estimating this quantity is going to result in errors, and to see why it's going to result in errors, we can think about what the specific process is by which he came up with this estimate.
So, in Georgia, he has information on individuals who turned out to vote, and he has information on individuals who are registered to vote. You can link that information exactly, because Georgia provides a unique voter identification number, what's called a "registration number," and given that unique key, you can move from one data set to the other, precisely, but that same key is not present on the active inmate file.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So, instead, to link up the active inmate file with the voter registration file, Mr. Geels here uses an individual's first name, last name, and birth year, and, as Mr. Geels acknowledges here in this paragraph, it is well known that using first name, last name, and birth year will cause what's called "false positives." That is, it will cause individuals to be matched to this active inmate file who, in fact, are not serving out a felony sentence, and, therefore, were quite eligible to vote.

This issue is well known, and it's, I think, a bit intuitive, because, if we only have someone's first, last, and birth year, depending on the name, if someone's name is John Smith, and born in 1960, you could imagine that could generate many false positives, and, as he says, the full analysis really needs to be done by the state of Georgia, because they will have a unique key in order to link up that active inmate to the voter registration to remove those false positives.

Q And so the Secretary of State has access to the active inmate file?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes, they have access to that, and my understanding is that they also have access to individual -- another unique key you could use, which is the Social Security number, and using --

Q So --

A Sorry.

Q Well, I was going to say, so, if someone is trying to determine whether any felons were allowed to cast votes in the 2020 election, would going to the Secretary of State to try to get that information be more accurate?

A That would be the way to make this determination. There is a robust literature within political science that also merges in statistics and public policy about the risks that come when we're merging data sets like this, and in that literature, the current state of the art when doing this sort of merge is to use address, which is, you know, some street address where they live, date of birth, not just birth year but date of birth, so that's month, day, and year, gender, and name.

It's an algorithm called "ADGN," so address, date of birth, gender, name, and the best evidence that we have is that that approach gets something close to Social Security number-level matches across data sets. But, in the absence of having that information to be able to do that link, the risk in producing this sort of analysis is that you're going to overestimate the number of people in this category, as Mr. Geels recognizes here.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q So is one of the issues with a technique that provides a lot of false positives that it will inaccurately inflate the numbers?

A Yes, just sort of by the nature of the error here. This is a procedure that's going to -- the false positive will cause us to overestimate. That means that we'll identify individuals who are on this active inmate list who are, in fact, eligible to vote, and so we'll have an overestimate of the number of individuals.

Q All right. Turning your attention to paragraph 27, there's an opinion expressed by Mr. Geels here around the number of deceased people that voted. Do you see that?

A I see that, yes.

Q And do you have any opinion as to the reliability of Mr. Geels' information in this paragraph?

A So here, again, it's going to suffer from the same problem. So, again, you can see Mr. Geels here running on to the second page that's on the screen. He has a death file, and this death file is a list of individuals who have deceased, and from that death file, he has first, last, and birth year. Here, again, though, this is a procedure that can generate many false positives, because there are many individuals who have the same first and last name and born in a particular year, and the result of that is that it's going to inflate the number of individuals who he is flagging as having been deceased and cast a vote.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q All right. Those are examples of errors related to matching procedures across data sets. Is that correct?

A That's correct, yes.

Q Okay. Are there other examples of unreliable techniques in the data analysis related to voter records, administrative records?

A In Mr. Geels' affidavit, he has a particular analysis regarding the number of people who were underage when they registered, and then cast a vote in the 2020 election, and there, there's a number of issues with that.

So the first thing to say, before even getting into the specifics of what's sort of wrong with this analysis and some updated numbers that have happened, the specific way in which Mr. Geels ran this query was that it looked over, in his view, the expanse of Georgia history to find individuals who he thought were added to the Georgia registration file before they were 17.

So, for example, if an individual was born in 1937, and was added to the file in 1953, they would be flagged in this procedure, flagged in this query, even though, obviously, that individual is certainly of the age of majority by the 2020 election.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

What's more, though, this particular number, in reading a response from Doctor Charles Stewart, who's a professor at MIT who wrote a reply to it, Doctor Charles Stewart, in the reply, says, "I simply -- I can't replicate this number. I can't find anything that looks like this number."

In an updated version of this expert report that was attached to a motion -- I'm trying to get the case right, but there's a second Bryan Geels report. It's either Trump v. Raffensperger or -- yes. It's an update in Trump v. Raffensperger. Mr. Geels revises the number downward to 2,000 or so, numbers for individuals who are in this category, and in examining exhibits and -- sorry. In examining discovery for this case, there is a third update from Mr. Geels, who, after adding a registration column to this query, now updates this number to be around 700.

And so these sorts of big changes to the numbers of individuals, in addition to identifying individuals who are quite old by the time they cast their vote, would be an indication that this is, you know, just an unreliable way to identify what were, in his view, potentially problematic individuals who cast votes.

Q And in the second Geels affidavit, where the number was adjusted from 66,000 to approximately 2,000, do you recall if Mr. Geels explained in that report why the number changed so dramatically?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I did not see an explanation in that report, no.
Q Are there other examples of numbers changing significantly between Mr. Geels' first and second report?
A Yes. So I believe in -- make sure I have this correct. In paragraph 25, Mr. Geels has somewhere on the order of 6,600 individuals who he said were added to the voter registration file before 2016.
Q And, Doctor Grimmer, I want to interrupt you for a second. The exhibit in front of you has a paragraph 25 on it. Do you see that?
A Yes.
Q And is this what you're referring to?
A That is what I'm referring to, yes.
Q Okay. All right.
A And so, here, this number here are individuals who he says were added to the voter file before 2016, and are in the voter file in 2020 and cast a vote, but, for whatever reason, are not in the voter file in 2016, if that makes sense. So, in the 2020 voter file, he says these individuals -- it says were added before 2016, and yet they're not present, he says, in the 2016 voter file.

In a subsequent declaration, this number is increased, I believe, on the order of 86,000, is the number that Mr. Geels has in his second declaration.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Doctor Grimmer, I'm going to try to put that up for you. I believe this is Respondent's Exhibit 1049.1. All right. Do you see category five in front of you?

A I do, yes.

Q All right. And is this what you were referring to as essentially -- well, how does this relate to paragraph 25 that we were just looking at in his first report?

A This looks to be the same individuals who were in paragraph 25. There is a small difference here. The small difference is that, in the previous example, it was just individuals who cast their vote by absentee, but here these are individuals who both cast their vote by absentee and vote in person.

But my assessment of the difference across this, because he does provide this data in an attachment to his report, is that that alone cannot explain the difference here. What it appears is that there was an additional constraint placed on this query, in the initial report, that was then relaxed in the second report.

Q And what would be the effect of relaxing that in the second report?

A It would expand the number of individuals. If we think about running a query, we're basically saying you have to satisfy some logical set of rules in order to end up as a result of the query. If I have two rules, and I remove one of them, it must be the case that what results is either the same or a bigger set.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Doctor Grimmer, directing your attention to page 60 of Respondent's Exhibit 1049.1, there's a table of illegal vote totals, presuming the state of Georgia election data is reliable. Do you see that?

A I do see this, yes.

Q You've seen this before?

A I have, yes.

Q What is your understanding of this table?

A So what Mr. Geels is doing here is, across his buckets, he's adding together the individuals who are in each category. He's making an attempt to de-duplicate that, so that no individual will appear twice. That's what the note says down there. And so this is his estimate of the number of people who are in these particular categories.

Q And based on your understanding of Mr. Geels' report, do you believe this information is reliable?

A I do not believe this information is reliable, no.

Q Why not?

A For the reason I just described. This analysis of individuals who he says should have been in the voter file but aren't, that alone is 86,000 in the second report, but it was 6,000 in the first report. So that alone drives up this number.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Many of the examples that are here either have to do with determinations made by the post office or an individual submitting a change of address, which does not invalidate the registration, or it has to do with extremely small -- what amounts to clerical errors in the data set, or clerical errors that can be made -- what looks to be a clerical error made by accounting.

So, for example, in this third bucket here, we have same -- sorry, not the third bucket here. One second. I'm misreading the buckets.

Q You're referring to the table?

A Yes. Sorry. I'm referring to the table, exactly.

Q Not your buckets, but the table rows?

A Not my buckets, the table. Yes, yes, yes, yes.

Okay. There is a category that he has that says, "Ballots that were issued before they were allowed to be issued, on September 15th," but a simple examination of that reveals that about 40 percent of those come from all the ballots in Grady County, which appears to have, for at least those ballots on September 8th -- when ballots were accepted from Grady County, it looks like they weren't accepted until September 23rd, and so, while I can't confirm that it was a clerical error, it would be surprising if there was a 15-day lag from when the ballots were sent to when they were returned. You don't see that elsewhere in the state of Georgia. And so that's an example of a clerical error that can increase -- that can result in numbers appearing in this table.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q What about the claim about vacant residential addresses?

A So the vacant residential address claim is related to the vacant mailing address claims. The vacant mailing address claim there, Mr. Geels is looking only at individuals who voted absentee, and in vacant residential address, he looks at the expanse of individuals who cast their vote in the 2020 election.

So vacancy is a determination made by the United States Postal Service. It's made based on the -- according to the United States Postal Service, based on the appearance of a home, or whether mail is being collected when it's being delivered to a home, but it's not an indication -- it's not a certain indication that a home is vacant, or that no one is -- that someone is no longer living there.

In fact, there's a FAQ page on the United States Postal Service page that says, "If your home is labeled vacant, this is how you can proceed," and it also describes how the United States Postal Service will retain your mail for you.

Q Did you read the expert reports in Trump v. Raffensperger that were submitted by the defendants in that case?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I did, yes.
Q And do you recall whether those reports addressed some of these same reliability issues that you've been talking about?
A Those reports did. In particular, Doctor Charles Stewart, again, a professor at MIT, addressed many of these same issues. Yes.
Q And is his explanation of these issues, in your opinion, something that a layperson would understand?
A That is my understanding.
MR. MILLER: Objection, your Honor, the question lacks foundation, and it's also beyond the scope.
THE COURT: Well, sustained as to lacks foundation.
BY MR. CARLING:
Q Well, based on your review of Charles Stewart's declaration and your understanding of his criticisms, were his criticisms expressed in his declaration something that requires statistical expertise to understand, or were they criticisms that a person without that expertise could understand?
MR. MILLER: Same objection. It's also compound.
THE COURT: Overruled. You can answer the question.
THE WITNESS: Doctor Stewart's characterizations

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

were made in very plain language, and conveyed many intuitive ideas about why we might be worried about things, like using first, last, and birth year to do data merges, or why determining that a home is -- or why relying on something like a national change of address is an improper way to assess who is ineligible or it's illegal for them to cast a vote.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q All right. Before we turn to what I believe would be your third bucket, do you have any other examples of issues you saw in Doctor Eastman's discovery related to the second bucket, data analysis related to administrative records or voter records?

A I think those are the primary examples.

Q All right. What did you say was the third category that you put this evidence into?

A The third category are a group of affidavits that come from individual voters who relay some experience they had when trying to cast their vote, or relay the experience a relative had while either trying to cast their vote or noticing that something happened with a deceased individual.

Q Sorry. The pagination is off between the exhibit and the answer. Doctor Eastman (sic), directing your attention to line 14 of this, it says there was sworn testimony by --

THE COURT: Just a minute. This is Exhibit 9?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. CARLING: It is Exhibit 19.

THE COURT: You said page 14?

MR. CARLING: It's page 61 of the answer, but page 62 of the exhibit, because the exhibit has an extra page at the beginning, just part of why I've been struggling to put us on the right page.

THE COURT: All right.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q At line 14, Doctor Grimmer, it says there was sworn testimony by Grace Lennon, a Georgia Tech college student, in the Georgia Senate subcommittee hearing, indicating that someone had applied for and voted an absentee ballot in her name after having the ballot redirected to an address unknown to her, without her knowledge or consent. Do you see that?

A I see that, yes.

Q And are you familiar with this claim by Grace Lennon?

A I'm familiar with it, yes.

Q All right. May I ask, also, Doctor Grimmer, did you read a report by Senator Ligon from the Georgia State Legislature?

A I did, yes.

Q Okay. And do you recall whether this was one of the examples he listed in his report?

A I believe this was an example, and she testified at a hearing that he held, I believe.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Right, testified at the hearing. Okay. So have you looked into this incident?
A I looked at the state's absentee voter history in order to try to understand what happened with this particular incident, yes.
Q Okay. And is that information that's available to anyone in the public?
A Yes, it is. The absentee voter history are a set of files that are promulgated by the Secretary of State's Office, and were available after the 2020 election.
Q And did your review of that publicly available information show that someone voted an absentee ballot in Grace Lennon's name?
A So my review of the absentee voter history showed that it is the case that there was a mail-in absentee ballot application that was submitted for Elizabeth Grace Lennon. That's her name. That ballot was directed to an address in Fayetteville, with an Arkansas zip code, but, for some reason, the application had it going to Arizona. If I look up that address, it looks like it's near the Arkansas football stadium.
However, that ballot, on its status, it says it was canceled, and the status reason says it was an administrative cancellation, and it's the case that, on

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

October 23rd, Ms. Lennon was able to cast her vote early, in person, which is also a record that's recording in the absentee voter file, and so, according to the state records, that's the ballot that was accepted and counted in the election.

Q All right. So the state records show that an absentee ballot was not voted in Grace Lennon's name?

A According to the absentee voter history, the mail-in ballots was canceled, and then Ms. Lennon voted early, in person, and that was the ballot that's marked as accepted in the absentee voter history.

Q So, if Ms. Lennon testified that she was unable to vote in person because of the absentee ballot, is that inconsistent with what the absentee voter file shows?

A If I'm recalling the testimony from Ms. Lennon, it's that she was given the capacity to vote, but was unsure if it was counted, and perhaps received subsequent information that perhaps it wasn't counted, but that is a concern that could have been resolved by looking at the state's records.

Q And the state records show that her in-person vote was, in fact, counted?

A That's correct.

Q Okay. Can you think of -- so is Grace Lennon's testimony regarding her votes an example of an affidavit by a voter that you would put in this third bucket?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A This is an example I would put in this third bucket, yes.
Q Okay. Are there any other examples that come to mind?
A There were two affidavits that were submitted in Trump v. Raffensperger that have a related argument, that I'd also put in this bucket. So one came from an individual, Lisa Holst, who expressed a concern that her deceased father-in-law had voted in the 2020 election, had voted in prior elections.
Q Doctor Grimmer, I'm going to show you Respondent's Exhibit 1048, Sub-Exhibit 5. This is an affidavit of Lisa Holst, looking at page two. Is this what you're referring to?
A That's what I'm referring to, yes.
Q All right.
THE COURT: Just a minute. This is 1048?
MR. CARLING: 1048, Sub-Exhibit 5.
THE COURT: Okay. Which page is that?
MR. CARLING: The affidavit is on page two.
THE COURT: In the overall numbering of the exhibit, what page is that?
MR. CARLING: Mine is a three-page Exhibit, for 1048, Sub-Exhibit 5, because 1048 has sub-PDFs, although, if you're looking at a paper one, it may be different.
THE COURT: Yes, it appears to be.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: It's 585, your Honor.

MR. CARLING: I see, 585.

THE COURT: 1048. Okay. I don't have a 585 in Exhibit 1048. Okay. One second. Okay. I'm not sure if you changed the exhibits. What's provided to the Court under 1048 is Trump v. Raffensperger. Maybe I do not have a correct copy of the exhibit. This is the actual complaint.

THE CLERK: Sixty-four pages. That's what we have.

THE COURT: So the exhibit record reflects that 1048 contains the Georgia federal complaint, Trump v. Kemp, but what I have at 1048 is Trump v. Raffensperger.

MR. CARLING: It is Respondent's exhibit, your Honor --

THE COURT: Yes. I'm waiting for Mr. Miller to --

MR. CARLING: -- so I may not have a full understanding, but I have noted that the evidence submitted in Trump v. Raffensperger, I believe, was resubmitted in Trump v. Kemp, which might be part of the confusion around the exhibit record.

THE COURT: Yes. The caption reads Trump v. Raffensperger. Let me see the case number. So do you have another copy of 1048? In the interests of time, we can move forward. I'll follow along on the electronic version.

MR. CARLING: I don't think we'll be on here for too long, and Doctor Grimmer maybe can explain.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. Well, I'll expect the Respondent to provide a copy, a full copy of 1048.

MR. MILLER: There is, maybe, a work-around on this, your Honor. Some of the exhibits in the Trump v. Raffensperger case have been marked a couple of times as exhibits. So, if you go to Exhibit 1036, page 584, you'll --

THE COURT: Okay. One second.

MR. MILLER: -- that should get you there, and then, if Mr. Carling wants to use that exhibit, per my offer, that might be a way to get you there, since you're the most important person to follow this.

THE COURT: 1036.

MR. MILLER: So the number was 1036, and it appears on page 584, on my version.

MR. CARLING: Yes. Ours is broken into multiple PDFs, but we may be able to get there. I'm sorry. What was the page number?

MR. MILLER: Five eighty-four.

MR. CARLING: Okay. We'll switch that.

MR. MILLER: It's the same.

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. MILLER: It's your choice, Counsel, but that way, the Court could be on the same page.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Well, actually, let's see.

MR. CARLING: That's fine. We can put that one up. Let's put up 1036, page 584.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q Doctor Grimmer, do you see the affidavit of Lisa Holst?

A I do see this, yes.

Q All right. Is this what you were talking about?

A This is what I was talking about, yes.

Q All right. And, generally, this category that we're talking about, these are affidavits of people who voted, or are related to someone who voted in the 2020 election. Is that correct?

A That's correct.

Q All right. So why is this affidavit not evidence that fraud occurred?

A The confusion here arises because Walter's wife, who I believe is Mary Holst, is registered as "Mrs. Walter Holst" in the voter file. So, in 2020, the vote was cast absentee, early, in person, and as the affidavit from Frances Watson in this confirms, Walter Holst's registration record was canceled in 2010, and Mary Holst is registered as "Mrs. Walter Holst," which is a phenomenon that is sufficient common on -- there's a Georgia My Voter Page information, and there it even will say -- if you're having trouble finding your information, it will say, potentially, you're registered as "Mrs.," and then your husband's name.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Can anyone use that web site to look up that information?
A Yes. So you would need to know the first initial, last name, and date of birth for the individual.
Q And so how does that -- why does that publicly available information lead you to believe that a ballot was not cast for a deceased Walter Holst?
A So, first, just by my review of the absentee voter history, it's the case that this was cast early, in person, which in Georgia requires showing photo identification. Second, as I was performing a search of this, I searched for Walter Holst. I found his obituary. I saw his wife, Mary, and then very easily found the date of birth. So I looked up her voter history on that My Voter Page, and, very clearly, she is the one who had voted, and from the obituary, I could see Walter Holst's date of birth, and he was no longer in the Georgia voter registration.
Q And that absentee voter history, that's publicly available information?
A The absentee voter history is the same one I was just describing before, promulgated by the Secretary of State's Office's. Yes.
Q Any other affidavits of voters that are an example of this category?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I believe there's one with the last name Rumph, maybe John Clint Rumph.

Q Well, we may run into the same issue here. Let's start with Respondent's Exhibit 1048, Sub-Exhibit 6.

MR. CARLING: So our records show, your Honor, this is Respondent's Exhibit 1048, page 587. Does the Court have page 587 of 1048?

THE COURT: No.

MR. CARLING: All right. Let's find it in 1036.

THE COURT: What is the document?

MR. CARLING: It's a declaration of Sandy Rumph.

THE COURT: Okay. I don't have it.

MR. MILLER: There's a similar work-around on this, your Honor, if you want to try this. If we go back to Exhibit 1036, which is a duplicate, page 587 should get you to the same declaration and exhibit.

THE COURT: Okay. Page 587. Okay. It's actually 588 on the hard copy, but thank you. Yes, I have it.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q Okay. I think we're there. It's Respondent's 1036, and this is page 588, as the Court noted. Okay. Doctor Grimmer, we'll put that up on the screen for you. All right. Do you see the affidavit of Sandy Rumph?

A I see this, yes.

Q Is this related to the issue you were just discussing?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A It is, yes.
Q All right. And what is your understanding of what Sandy Rumph is saying in this affidavit?
A To be clear, the claim here is not that there was a vote cast that was inappropriate, but, rather, her father-in-law passed away, and then, after he passed away, his registration was changed from deceased to active, and she found that to be suspicious.
Q And do you have an opinion as to whether there's any indication in this affidavit that voter fraud occurred?
A It seems clear that there was no ballot cast. There's no argument that a ballot was cast.
Q Aside from that, do you have an opinion as to whether the phenomenon she describes is suspicious?
A Well, what appears to have happened, which is based on the affidavit from Frances Watson from the Secretary of State's Office, is that Mr. Rumph's identity was stolen after he passed away, and there was a contact made with the Department of Driver Services in Georgia.

Now, Georgia has a procedure in place called "automatic voter registration," so that, when an individual goes to renew a driver's license, there is information that's automatically passed for voter registration purposes, and that contact with the Department of Driver Services is likely the explanation for the movement from deceased to active. But, as Frances Watson describes in the affidavit, they know this to be an instance of identity theft.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q So, Doctor Grimmer, generally, with this category of affidavits, in Doctor Eastman's discovery, did you encounter a number of affidavits from people who either voted or were related to someone who voted?

A I saw a lot of things like that, yes.

Q Okay. And did any of those affidavits present a reliable indication of fraudulent voting?

MR. MILLER: Objection, over-broad.

THE COURT: Overruled.

THE WITNESS: I did not see an -- to the best of my recollection, I did not see an indication of that. In most instances, I saw individuals who had a surprising experience when they went to vote, or had an unpleasant administrative experience when they went to vote, but no indication of either voter fraud or other manipulation of their ballots.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q And are the examples we've discussed today representative, generally, of this category of affidavits?

A To the best of my recollection, yes.

Q Okay. There was a fourth bucket. What was the fourth bucket?

A The fourth bucket were affidavits from individuals who were election workers or otherwise worked in the process of administering the election, who identified things that they found to be suspicious or surprising in the conduct of their work as an election administrator.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Were these affidavits of suspicious or surprising observations, in your opinion, evidence that fraud had occurred?

A In fact, to the best of my recollection, in no single affidavit did someone say, "I identified an instance of a fraudulent ballot being case," or "This is the specific ballots that were identified as being cast." Rather, these affidavits identified what they found to be practices that they had trouble reconciling, objections to the way certain observers were being treated, or observations about the delivery of certain kinds of ballots to various places.

Q I believe you said earlier that you read the Ligon report that was related to the December 3rd Georgia subcommittee testimony?

A I did, yes.

Q And does that report contain examples of this fourth category?

A It does, yes.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. Which report, again?

MR. CARLING: This is the Ligon report, which I believe is Respondent's Exhibit 1050, but I don't think we need to put that up right now.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

BY MR. CARLING:
Q So, Doctor Grimmer, people's affidavits describing things that they found objectionable, that is not an indication that a fraudulent ballot was cast. Is that what you were saying?
A In those affidavits, no one said, "I saw a fraudulent ballot being cast," or "I uncovered a network of individuals who are conspiring or administering election fraud." No one said, you know, "I uncovered 10 ballots that obviously were fraudulent, and I caught the person red-handed, and they were arrested and are being indicted."

There was never an affidavit that made that sort of argument. Instead, it was individuals who observed things they had difficulty understanding, or they didn't like how they were being treated as an observer, or observations about the way things were being delivered.
Q So, Doctor Grimmer, looking back over all these different examples and things you've testified about, many of them involved errors in statistical methodology. Is that correct?
A That's correct, yes.
Q In your opinion, do those errors require -- well, let me ask you a different question. In one of your PNAS articles, I believe you said that evaluating some of the statistical fraud claims requires expertise in statistics. Did you say that?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A That's what we wrote, yes. That's one thing.

Q Okay. So, suppose someone doesn't have expertise in statistics. Is there a way that someone without that expertise could have assessed the statistical fraud claims to evaluate whether they were indicative of fraud?

A I believe so.

MR. MILLER: Objection, lacks foundation, beyond the scope, not relevant.

THE COURT: Overruled.

THE WITNESS: I believe so, yes.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q How would they do that?

A When confronted with statistical evidence, even if one isn't a statistical expert, there are some basic questions that I think we all might want to know. For example, is this statistical procedure accurate as an indication of fraud? How often, when it says there's fraud, is there actually fraud, and how often, when it says there's not fraud, is there not fraud? That's a sort of basic question.

A second question that someone might ask is if the logic of the statistical analysis is coherent or consistent with basic understandings of the way elections occur in the United States. Take the Cicchetti analysis, for example.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

What Cicchetti does in that analysis is he compares either the vote count or vote share between Biden and Clinton in 2020 and 2016, and flags it as anomalous that there's some difference, but a sort of basic logical assessment of that would say that there are lots of reasons we expect these things to be different across elections, and there's no established literature, empirical pattern, or even common knowledge that would say election results are the same in every state.

In fact, if we took these tests to a logical extreme, if we think about Cicchetti's test, that says, if an election is not anomalous, then the results should be the same, it would imply we could just run one election, once when a state is founded, and then every election would subsequently be the same.

Obviously, that's not the case. Things change. Times change. Voters' preferences may change. Conditions change that people are persuaded. And so that's a basic way we can make that sort of assessment. In general, I think making basic inquiries about why individuals think particular analyses are indicative of fraud is a thing someone can do without a basis in statistics.

Q What would be those basic inquiries that someone could make?

A Again, asking about the accuracy of fraud, assessing the basic logic of the statistical analysis that's being conducted, and even inquiring about whether there is a research literature that supports these sorts of conclusions.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

There is a robust field across statistics, economics, political science, even into machine learning, that makes assessments of how elections work. Libraries are filled with this literature. And so it's worth asking if the analysis that's being conducted has any basis in that voluminous literature, or any basis in any scholarly research at all.

Q Well, if someone asks, you know, basic questions about, for example, how accurate Stanley Young's contrast analysis is at indicating fraud, was there any evidence or indication that his technique was accurate at finding fraud?

MR. MILLER: Objection, beyond the scope, lacks foundation, not relevant.

THE COURT: Explain to me how that's beyond the scope.

MR. MILLER: Because the question is intended to elicit an opinion from Doctor Grimmer about what a layperson, I think was the original call of the question, could do to determine the accuracy of forensic data, voting information.

THE COURT: Okay. I think that is an incorrect

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

premise. Could you repeat the question, please?

MR. MILLER: Well, sorry, your Honor, but I wasn't exactly repeating the question that Mr. Carling posed. I think I was stating the basis for my objection. But I'm happy to continue with --

THE COURT: I'm assuming your objection has some relationship to the question that was asked.

MR. MILLER: The line of questions. So I've made a couple of objections to this line of questions, which is essentially, you know, "What would a layperson be able to do with data like this to be able to verify the accuracy?" And I was starting to explain that, but I'm happy to defer to your Honor and however you want me to proceed. I'm happy to explain the basis for that objection.

THE COURT: Okay. As I understand the question, and this line -- and I see this is something of a different line, but this line of questioning -- going to Doctor Young's analysis, not necessarily from the perspective of a layperson's understanding or lack of understanding of Doctor Young's analysis, but Doctor Young's analysis.

MR. MILLER: Well, but still the question invites an opinion from Doctor Grimmer about how one would be able to determine the accuracy of Doctor Young's opinions or conclusions. I think that's the call of the question, in my mind, and I have a way to explain to your Honor why I think that's objectionable, but I'll wait until you prompt me to respond further.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Well, Doctor Grimmer testified regarding his analysis of Doctor Young's vote anomaly analysis in his deposition, and he gave a fair amount of detailed testimony about that. So I am not sure about the basis of your objection. If you think you need to elaborate more, feel free to do that.

MR. MILLER: Well, perhaps it will be more crystallized when we get questions that will get closer to questions that have been asked in the past, but the point I was going to make is that, to the extent that Doctor Grimmer is asked to provide an opinion about what a reasonable person would do to verify the accuracy of data with respect to voter irregularities, that that's where I have the problem, with that line of questions, because it's beyond the scope, and it lacks foundation, and it's not relevant, and I'm happy to explain that.

THE COURT: Okay. Do you still have the question -- the objection is overruled. Do you still have the question in mind, Doctor Grimmer?

THE WITNESS: If you could just repeat it, Mr. Carling.

THE COURT: Would you -- yes. Would you repeat it, please, Mr. Carling.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. CARLING: I was afraid you were going to say that.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q All right. Doctor Grimmer, one of the things you had said is that a layperson, when evaluation claims, could ask, "How accurate is this method for indicating fraud?," correct?

A That's what I said, yes.

Q All right. So, taking Stanley Young's contrast analysis -- well, first, what is your opinion as to whether that method is accurate at indicating fraud?

A Doctor Young provides no indication or assessment of the accuracy of his method for indicating voter fraud or even voting anomalies.

Q All right. You haven't seen that in any of the writings of Doctor Young that you've reviewed?

A I have not seen that, no.

Q What about for the parallel snakes phenomenon? Have you seen any information or indication that that technique is accurate at identifying fraud?

A I've seen no indication that that's accurate.

Q And you haven't seen any -- in the writings of the proponents of that statistical theory, you haven't seen any of them offer any information or indication that that's an accurate method of indicating fraud. Is that correct?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I have not seen them offer any indication that it's an accurate indicator of fraud. That's correct.
Q And the other, I suppose, semi-statistical theory we talked about is the phenomenon of the denominator relating to vote percentages, indicating electronic vote flipping. Do you recall that?
A I recall that, yes.
Q Have you ever seen any evidence or information to indicate that that's an accurate methodology for indicating electronic voting fraud?
A I've seen no indication that that's an accurate indicator of electronic voter --
THE COURT: I'm sorry. That that's an indicator of voter fraud, you're saying?
THE WITNESS: Yes. I've seen no indication that examining an estimated number of votes to be counted on election night, and seeing that increase, is an accurate indicator of voter fraud.
BY MR. CARLING:
Q All right. And you mentioned that, for some of these statistical claims, there's a logical component which, in your opinion, is not logical. Is that correct?
A I don't --
Q I may have framed that poorly, but can you explain the issue with logically coherent theories?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A So, when evaluating a statistical exercise, even if we are unfamiliar with how particular statistics are being calculated, it is the case that we can examine the underlying logic of the tests. So, for example, I'm going to go back to the Cicchetti example. Are there differences across these two elections? If we do see a difference, is that an indication of fraud? So the basic logic there is not -- as a basic logical matter, it doesn't follow that, if you see a difference, then there is fraud, and an individual, you know, vaguely familiar to U.S. elections, would know that, from year to year, states change in the vote shares candidates receive.

Q And they wouldn't require any statistical expertise to see that basic logical flaw. Is that correct?

A That's correct.

Q What about the bucket related to data analysis, records of illegal votes based on voter files and administrative records? If someone doesn't have expertise in elections or data, is there a way they could have assessed the reliability of those claims?

A There is, yes.

Q How would they do that?

A Well, for some of the claims, it just goes back to understanding election practices in the state. So, for example --

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Just a minute. Exactly which claims are you referring to, Doctor Grimmer?

THE WITNESS: So the first claim that I'll talk about here with knowing election practices would have to do with individuals who are on the rollover list in the state of Georgia, and just to refresh, the rollover lists are the set of individuals who apply for an absentee ballot, perhaps in a primary election, that indicate that they're either over 65, disabled, or qualified because they fall under UOCAVA, they're overseas, and these individuals apply once for an absentee ballot in the primary, and then will continue to receive absentee ballots for the elections, essentially, associated with that primary, so if there's a primary runoff, a general, and then a general runoff.

The fact that those individuals have their absentee ballot application recorded earlier is not an indication of something illegal, ineligible, or otherwise surprising. It's just an example of how the election is conducted in the state of Georgia. So that's one example of that.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q I just want to pick up where you left off, Doctor Grimmer. Were you giving examples of how someone could have assessed the reliability of claims related to data analysis and voter files without having expertise in elections and data analysis?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A That's correct.

MR. MILLER: Objection, lacks foundation.

THE COURT: Just a minute, Doctor Grimmer.

I'm sorry. Go ahead.

MR. MILLER: That's okay. Yes. It lacks foundation, it's beyond the scope, and it's not relevant. So now, your Honor, we're back to a question that does pose the issue, I think, more squarely that I wanted to raise with the Court, so, generally, questions surrounding, you know, would a layperson or somebody not trained in statistics be able to discern the accuracy of voting irregularity information? That's essentially my view of the call of the question. I don't know --

THE COURT: I see, but isn't it true that expert witnesses can, and often do, give testimony regarding what might be otherwise considered to be a hypothetical?

MR. MILLER: I don't think that question calls for a hypothetical. I do agree that experts can be asked hypothetical questions all the time. It's an effective examination tool, and a way to elicit helpful evidence to the trier of fact.

THE COURT: But the bottom line is, an expert doesn't have to have personal knowledge, right? And experts can testify, providing expert opinion, based on a variety of factors which do not include personal knowledge.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: I agree. Oftentimes they don't testify from personal knowledge. Here, I think we might have a blend of personal knowledge, as well as expert opinions as an extrapolation of, you know, the data that he's been asked to look at it. But let me see if I can focus the Court on my concern here. I don't know what issue in this case the questions regarding whether a layperson would have had the ability to discern an inaccuracy of election irregularity information -- to me, that's not an issue in the case. The only --

THE COURT: Okay. So you have a relevance objection, then. Is that --

MR. MILLER: That's what I'm trying to focus the Court on, is the thrust of this issue, but that's not an issue in this case.

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. MILLER: The --

THE COURT: Mr. Carling -- and I'm going to give you a chance to finish in just a minute -- but addressing, first of all, what sounds as though it's a relevance objection, how is this line of questioning relevant, regarding a layperson's ability to understand or comprehend the nature of the statistical analysis?

MR. CARLING: Well, as the designation for Doctor

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Grimmer indicated, he would be talking about Respondent's proffered evidence in his answer supporting his claims of election fraud, and Doctor Grimmer is talking about the reliability of that evidence, and the extent to which the reliability of that evidence could have or should have been something that Doctor Eastman could have learned is directly related to the allegations charging him with misrepresentations regarding that evidence. It's related to the mental state requirement, and it's just part and parcel of testimony about Doctor Eastman's statements claiming election fraud.

THE COURT: Okay. The objection, at least that aspect of it, is overruled.

Is there something you wanted to add, Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: Well, I wanted to respond to one point that Mr. Carling raised, and that is, it was in the designation, but the fact that an expert is going to testify -- let me be more specific -- that Doctor Grimmer is going to testify about a certain subject matter doesn't make it relevant. That has, really, no bearing at all, other than giving the responding party notice that that's an opinion that the expert intends to offer.

THE COURT: Is going to offer, right. That's true. However, what is at issue here is Doctor Eastman's conduct, what he knew or didn't know, and how he communicated, and with whom he communicated some of that information. That's a part of, not, obviously, all of, the nature of the alleged misconduct here, and so this testimony would be relevant on that issue.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: If I could respond to that, and I agree with the Court's characterization of that issue in the case, which gets us back to Doctor Grimmer and this line of questioning. This line of questioning can only be relevant to the issue of Doctor Eastman's ability to look at reports of voter fraud, just to pick a clear example, and determine whether that was reliable or not. This witness can't testify about what Doctor Eastman did or did not do or should have done.

THE COURT: And that's not what he's being asked to testify about. He's being asked to testify about whether a reasonable or a layperson could have had access to some of this information, like the absentee voter files, for example.

MR. MILLER: The extrapolation of that is, Doctor Eastman is a layperson. So, if the argument is eventually going to be in this case "Well, a layperson could have done that so easily. Doctor Eastman could have done that so easily," that's the only relevance of this line of questioning.

THE COURT: You'll have an opportunity to put on your case, and regarding will have an opportunity to testify regarding this issue. Okay?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: Thank you. We look forward to that. But I still want to focus on why this is a relevant line of inquiry. The only place that this line of inquiry could end up would be attempt to support the argument that Doctor Eastman had means to be able to discern whether the information that he was speaking about, or advancing, or talking about was reliable, and Doctor Grimmer is not capable of testifying as to what an attorney, or, in particular, Doctor Eastman, could or should do with that information. That's the only way this line of questioning becomes relevant, and Doctor Grimmer is disqualified from being able to offer that opinion. That's where we're at.

So where we're going to end up with is a situation where the Court might say, "Well, this should have been easily found out, unwound, you know, by a layperson, so, therefore, Doctor Eastman should have been able to look at this information and say, 'I can't accept that, and I'm going to do my own due diligence about it.'" That's where this line of inquiry goes. This witness can't testify to that. The Bar could have put on a case that said, "Here's an attorney expert who's going to talk about the obligations and the duties that a" --

THE COURT: What Doctor Grimmer has testified

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

about is the measures that he took to ascertain information relative to the allegations made in the various affidavits, made by Ms. Holst and a number of other individuals, and whose affidavits were considered to be support for certain positions adopted by Doctor Eastman and others.

So, for that reason, this is definitely going to be relevant. The objection is overruled. You've made your record, and we'll move on.

Okay. Mr. Carling, your next question.

MR. CARLING: Before I ask my next question, your Honor, it occurs to me that the Court accepted Doctor Grimmer as an expert yesterday while I was doing my initial establishing of his expertise and credentials, but I don't know that the Court specifically said in what, and so I'd like an opportunity to make the proffer for Doctor Grimmer that I was going to make yesterday, which is that, based on all of the research and teaching and publications that he described yesterday, that the State Bar is presenting him as an expert in voting and elections, including research methods and statistical analysis of elections and election administration and claims of voter fraud.

THE COURT: Okay. Any objection, Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: I don't object to that, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. MILLER: I think that's an accurate

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

characterization.

THE COURT: All right. And as the Court previously stated, Doctor Grimmer is abundantly qualified to testify regarding those topics as an expert.

So let's move on.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q Doctor Grimmer, I believe we left off -- you were testifying about ways that a layperson could have assessed claims in November of 2020 or December of 2020 regarding these analyses of voter files that were claimed to indicate fraud.

A Yes.

Q I'll confess I don't recall where you left off, but could you give us another example?

A Absolutely. So, even if someone doesn't have expertise merging data files, or hasn't look at big data sets, I think it is intuitive to know that, in a state like Georgia, that there could be many people who have the same first and last name who were born in the same year.

You might have that, you know, experience from their own life, or, you know, certainly, if an individual performs a Google search for themselves, they might find individuals who have those same characteristics. So there, even though someone may not have an understanding of false positives rates, they would know that it would be unlikely that first, last, and birth year would provide a unique key to merge across data sets.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Were you following the 2020 election in November and December of 2020?

A I was, yes.

Q All right. And during that time, were you following claims that were circulating regarding allegations of voter fraud?

A I was, yes.

Q And, by the way, when I say "voter fraud," what do you understand "voter fraud" to mean?

A It's a good question. I understand voter fraud to be the casting of a ballot that is not tied to that particular -- to the individual to whom the ballot was tied. So, for example, if a person is deceased and ballot is cast by someone, that could be an indication of fraud.

Q In November and December of 2020, what resources were available to members of the general public to help them evaluate claims of voter fraud?

MR. MILLER: Your Honor, I'm sorry to interrupt Doctor Grimmer. I apologize. I just want to make sure that I have a -- the record is made with respect to this line of inquiry, because now it's being pursued.

THE COURT: Okay. You have a continuing objection. Thanks.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: Thank you, your Honor.

THE WITNESS: So certainly, in November and December, state officials were putting out a number of statistics, but, for example, in the state of Georgia, the absentee voter file, absentee voter history, was promulgated sufficiently early that it was able to be used in cases where the -- by both plaintiff and defendant expert witnesses.

So, for example, in, I believe, the case Pearson v. Kemp, there's an expert report filed for the plaintiffs, Doctor Benjamin Overholt, who performed an analysis very similar to the numbers that I reported, identifying the rate of ballots being rejected for signature-related issues, and that report was then evaluated by Doctor Kenneth Mayer, who is a professor at the University of Wisconsin, political science professor, and they were able to use the voter history in order to construct those expert reports in November and December.

In addition to the information from official states, in addition to data that was being promulgated, there were individuals, experts in the field, writing memos and explaining why particular patterns were not indicative of fraud.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q And how would a member of the general public find that information?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Sort of making a basic investigation into an issue, looking for information on the Internet, is one way to do this, and I would suggest, though, that following up with individuals -- even if someone is skeptical, perhaps, of a fact-checking organization, one can follow up with those individuals who offer those opinions in those articles.

So, for example, it wasn't in November or December, but a neighbor of mine heard about my research, and he himself was skeptical of some of the results of the 2020 election, and I've had long conversations with him, sort of explaining the limitations of some of the claims that he believed.

And so there's lots of opportunity both to ask individuals or to find information on line, or to use official data and statistics in order to understand the particular claims that are being made.

Q And you've referred at various times in your testimony to publicly available information about voter histories or absentee voter histories. Is that correct?
A That's correct.
Q When you've referenced information that was publicly available, was that information publicly available in November and December of 2020?

MR. MILLER: Objection, over-broad.

THE COURT: Sustained.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

BY MR. CARLING:

Q I believe you referenced that at least with regard to the state of Georgia. Is that correct?

A I did reference that with the state of Georgia, yes.

Q All right. So did Georgia have its voter information publicly available in November and December of 2020?

A Georgia promulgated its absentee voter history and its voter history in November 2020.

Q Okay. Do states vary in terms of how much of that information is made public?

A They do vary, yes.

Q So, in other states, are there ways that members of the general public can get information about voter data or the reliability of the election?

A So certainly from official sources, say, secretaries of state, and related official organizations will provide that data. That's one way in order to make that verification, yes.

THE COURT: Doctor Grimmer, isn't it true, though, that in that time frame, November, December 2020, and even up to today, that individuals can consult the Internet, can go on line, and there is a lot of misinformation on line about the 2020 election? Would you say that's true?

THE WITNESS: So certainly, if one is going to look on line and try to find information about the 2020 election, the quality of that information varies quite a bit, ranging from, you know, official data or reports or memos from individuals who have expertise in that area to, like you said, misinformation or information that sort of lacks a foundation. So I agree that it could be the case that, in attempting to explore this information, individuals would have to use their best ability to discern what's a reliable source, which can be challenging.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. So your testimony regarding individuals searching on line for 2020 election information, is that directed to obtaining certain types of information on line?

THE WITNESS: So, if we just think about how would an individual encounter official state information, either they would see it in a news report or they themselves would seek out that information. That's one way they can acquire that information, and so I imagine that that would happen through a search.

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Carling.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q And, Doctor Grimmer, for all of the claims of voter fraud or illegality that were circulating in November and December of 2020, a layperson could have obtained information to help them evaluate the reliability of those claims. Is that correct?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A That's correct, yes.
Q And based on your review of the discovery that Doctor Eastman produced on this case, you found no reliable evidence of outcome-determinative fraud. Is that correct?
A That's correct.
MR. MILLER: Objection, leading.
THE COURT: Sorry?
MR. MILLER: Leading.
THE COURT: Okay. Sustained.
BY MR. CARLING:
Q All right. In your review of Doctor Eastman's discovery, all the information that he's produced, and in his answer, did you find any reliable evidence of outcome-determinative fraud?
A I did not, no.
Q And for all of those claims or proffered evidence, those were the types of claims that a layperson could have obtained information about in November and December of 2020 to help them evaluate the reliability of those claims?
MR. MILLER: It's leading and it's vague.
THE COURT: Sustained.
BY MR. CARLING:
Q All right. For all of the discovery and information in Doctor Eastman's answer, were those the types of claims that a layperson could have obtained information about in

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

November or December of 2020 to help them evaluate the reliability of those claims?

MR. MILLER: Objection, it's vague and it's over-broad.

THE COURT: Overruled.

THE WITNESS: Those claims -- there's obviously different ways to understand why claims fail, but the claims that I've identified all share a characteristic that we can understand, that they fail with a sort of basic understanding of the logic of what's going on in the test. It doesn't require understanding -- having taken a statistics class, but, rather, just understanding what's the comparison being made, and why would we expect this test to perform well, and my understanding is that a layperson could understand that.

MR. MILLER: Your Honor, I don't think we've defined what a "layperson" is, and I know that we've now gone probably a couple of hours of examination. It's not clear to me if that has an accepted use here.

THE COURT: That's a valid point, and you can inquire about that on cross-examination.

MR. MILLER: Thank you.

MR. CARLING: I don't have any more questions for Doctor Grimmer right now. Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: Do you mind if we take a short break, your Honor? Would that be appropriate?

THE COURT: Okay. Why don't we take a 10-minute break, and then we'll resume. I'd rather for us to finish with Doctor Grimmer, so we can release him before our lunch hour. So we'll take a late lunch hour, obviously.

MR. MILLER: Okay. I think I can do that.

THE COURT: Okay. So I have 12:00. Let's resume at 12:10. Let's go off the record.

THE CLERK: We're off the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

(Proceedings recessed briefly.)

THE CLERK: We're back on the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

We're back on the record on the record in the continued hearing of John Charles Eastman, in Case Number 23-O-30029.

Okay. Mr. Miller, cross-examination?

MR. MILLER: Thank you, your Honor.

CROSS EXAMINATION

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Good afternoon, Doctor Grimmer.

A Good afternoon.

Q So, Doctor Grimmer, were there incidences of voter fraud in the 2020 presidential election?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A My understanding from official sources is that there were a small number of incidents that could be identified as voter fraud. So I think, for example, the state of Georgia identified two individuals who perhaps voted someone else's absentee ballot, if I'm remembering this correctly, or there was like a signature issue. So that would be one example.
Q Okay. Well, let's move beyond just Georgia, because my question wasn't limited to the state of Georgia. It was really for the entirety of the 2020 general election. So let me ask it again and see how you respond. There were incidences of voter fraud in the 2020 general election, true?
A There were a small number of incidents of votes being cast that would be called "fraudulent," yes.
Q Okay. I'll take the last part of that as your answer, as yes. Do I have that right?
THE COURT: Counsel, the answer is pretty clear. He's repeated it twice now. Let's move on.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Okay. And there was voting irregularities in the 2020 general election, true?
A Can you define what you mean by an "irregularity," please?
Q Well, you defined it for me in the deposition. You remember my question asking you what the definition of "voter fraud" was, and "voter irregularities"?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes. Apologies.

Q Okay.

A Yes.

Q Okay. And you told me there that "voter irregularities" was allegations about where individuals casting ballots who are or may be ineligible to vote, and, therefore, those would be illegally cast ballots. Those would be voting irregularities. Do you agree with that testimony, Doctor Grimmer?

A So, in the sense that an allegation that a vote was illegal -- that would be what could be classified as an irregularity. I want to be clear that the allegation of it being illegal doesn't then make it illegal. Rather, if we say an irregularity is a thing an individual is alleging, I believe that's what I'm saying there.

Q Okay. Well, let's use your definition of voting -- of irregularity. So let me ask my question again, so you can answer it. There were voting irregularities in the 2020 general election?

A Yes. There were allegations of illegal cast in the 2020 general election, yes.

Q Okay. Well, not just allegations, Doctor Grimmer. You said you were following the 2020 general election pretty closely, and you've testified now for nearly four hours about a number of different parts of the general election results. So I'm not asking you whether there were allegations of voting irregularities. My question is, were there voting irregularities in the 2020 general election/

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I just want to be clear here, because you then went back to my definition from my deposition. I defined an irregularity as an allegation of an illegal vote. So I just want to be responsive to the question there, but there also were individuals who -- there also were ballots cast in the 2020 election that were illegally cast. That is true. That's true of every election in U.S. history.

Q Okay. So your answer is yes. Is that correct, Doctor Grimmer?

A That's correct.

MR. CARLING: Objection, it's been asked and answered, and his answer speaks for itself.

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Now, I just want to focus -- I'm going to start sort of broad, and then we'll work it down to more specific, Doctor Grimmer. Let's talk about Georgia for a minute. So you provided a lot of testimony about your assessment of the opinion of Doctor Geels, correct?

A That's correct.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Okay. And other than the information in the various Geels reports that you critiqued, did you perform your own investigation to determine the accuracy of the Georgia results in the 2020 general election?

A Can you say a bit more about what investigation you want me to conduct to assess accuracy of an election?

Q I'm just asking you whether you did an investigation to determine the accuracy of the Georgia election, 2020.

A In relation to objections made in the Geels affidavit, for example, I assessed those claims, but political scientists and social scientists generally do not set out to assess the accuracy of elections in this way. That's not an analysis I would expect myself to conduct.

Q Okay. So I take it, then, your answer, Doctor Grimmer, is that you did not undertake that analysis. Is that true?

MR. CARLING: Objection, it's vague and over-broad as to what he means by "analysis of the election."

THE COURT: Yes. I think that mischaracterizes the witness' testimony, too. You asked him whether or not he performed an investigation, which can be different from an analysis.

MR. MILLER: Fair enough, your Honor. Let me try to clarify it.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q So thank you, Doctor Grimmer. Did you undertake an investigation to determine the accuracy of the voting results in Georgia, 2020?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Actually, in the memo that was circulated called "Evaluating the Look Ahead America Report," we engaged in extensive analysis of claims made by Mr. Braynard, Matt Braynard, in both his affidavit and in claims made afterwards, and in so doing that investigation, it spoke to issues around the eligibility, and, therefore, the accuracy of those election results.

What we found in that -- first just in the conduct of that research, what we found was that individuals who applied to be on the national change of address, that's not an indication that they're ineligible, because there's a number of reasons why someone might appear on the national change of address, and then not -- and not have yet relinquished their residency in Georgia, or might not yet ever relinquish their residency in Georgia.

What's more, in that analysis, we found a number of sort of basic statistical mistakes, but that's one way in which we investigated a component of a claim made about inaccuracy. But I did not undertake an assessment of the accuracy of the election results.

Q Okay. Well, we just flipped the words again, so I want to make sure we've got a good record, Doctor Grimmer. I think I changed the question to ask if you had done an investigation, and I think the last part of your answer said, "I didn't do an assessment."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So let me make sure that we've got a clear record here. Is it true, Doctor Grimmer, that you did not undertake an independent investigation of the accuracy of the 2020 general election in Georgia?

MR. CARLING: Objection, it's vague as to "the accuracy of the election in Georgia," because, as Doctor Grimmer has testified, he did investigate aspects of the accuracy in certain claims.

THE COURT: Okay. Overruled. You can answer the question.

THE WITNESS: Across a variety of analyses, I've assessed how individuals cast their ballots, how those ballots are returned, and how that aligns with allegations made about inaccuracy, and an assessment of the accuracy of an election is not an analysis that I conducted, or that I would understand that social scientists would conduct in order to verify an election.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Did you undertake an investigation to determine the effect of voter fraud and voting irregularities in the 2020 general election?

A I did undertake an assessment of the role of voter fraud and irregularities in the 2020 election, yes. I've done --

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Nationwide?

A Across a number of states, we have undertaken that investigation, yes.

Q What states?

A So we've evaluated claims of voter fraud in Georgia, Pennsylvania -- make sure I have the states correct from our PNAS paper. That would include the swing states, which were bundled up with a series of claims made by individuals such as John Lott and other individuals about the effect of Dominion machines, which I think Russell Ramsland has made claims about.

And then, subsequently, in some of our work rebutting claims made by Doctor Frank, we've undertaken an examination of his claims of voter fraud in -- I don't want to misrepresent this -- I think it's in 42 states and in 28 counties across the U.S., and evaluated his claim in every single one of those counties, and shows that it fails in every single one of those counties.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. What was the issue that you evaluated in connection with the 42 states and 28 counties?

THE WITNESS: Yes. Sorry. I'll repeat that. My apologies. So this is related to Mr. Miller's question about our investigation about the 2020 election and the role of voter fraud.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

An individual, Doctor Douglas Frank, has made a series of claims throughout the country that he has statistical evidence that voting machines are being used in order to predetermine election results, and what we've done is undertake an analysis of that claim, which he says occurs at the county level. We've done that across 2,800 counties or so and, I believe, 42 states.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Miller.

MR. MILLER: Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q So you used the word or the phrase "layperson" several times in your testimony, Doctor Grimmer. How do you define a "layperson"? Is that anybody but you?

A I would not define it that way.

Q How would you define it?

A Just as an example, when writing for the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, you author a thing called a "significant statement" for an article, and that's intended to be interpretable by a layperson, which is taken to mean someone without the subject-specific expertise in that area. So here, for the discussion we are having, you might say someone who hasn't taken formal coursework in statistics, or perhaps formal coursework in the statistics of U.S. elections.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Now, you've testified that the claims or statements made by Doctor Eastman in this case were not based on reliable data. Do I have that right so far?
A I don't think I made a representation entirely about the data. I think my claims were that a combination of the data and statistical procedures that are deployed, or analysis strategies that are used, led to unreliable conclusions.
Q Unreliable conclusions by those that had prepared the reports?
A It would be an unreliable conclusion by anyone who undertook that analysis, yes.
Q Right. Well, I just want to be clear. When you say, "By anyone who undertook that analysis," that would be the person who actually undertook the research and prepared the report, correct?
A I mean, so I mean "unreliable" to modify the conclusion, not to assign it to an actor.
Q Okay. Well, here the "actor" that you're talking about is the person or persons who undertook the investigation, and performed the research, and came to the conclusion that there was some voter fraud or voter irregularities. Do I have that right?
A So they undertook a methodology that led to a conclusion that I found to be unreliable.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Okay. And so, when you say "they" in your answer, Doctor Grimmer, I just want to be clear that you're talking about those that actually undertook the investigation, did the research, and prepared the report containing conclusions. Correct?
A I just want to be sure I get the antecedent to this "they" correct. So, when making a conclusion, I'm characterizing that conclusion as unreliable. The person who produced the conclusion is the person who undertakes the analysis.
Q Okay. Good. I'm sorry, Doctor Grimmer. I didn't mean to cut you off. Did you complete your response?
A I did, yes.
Q Okay. Thank you. So we agree that the person that you're talking about, or persons that you're talking about, are those that actually undertook the research to produce the results that you consider to be unreliable. Good so far?
MR. CARLING: I'm going to object that asking him whether they agree is not the right way to frame his questioning. He can ask Doctor Grimmer and get answers, but asking to establish whether Doctor Grimmer agrees with Mr. Miller isn't a proper question.
THE COURT: Overruled.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE WITNESS: Again, I just want to be sure I'm not getting tripped up on the language here. So I'm thinking about individuals who undertake the analysis. They're the ones who reach the conclusion, and I'm characterizing that conclusion as unreliable, and if that refers back to what I said with the "they," then I agree with the question that you asked.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Okay. And, generally speaking, the basis for your saying that the conclusions in the report, or some of the conclusions in the report, were not reliable, because it was based on faulty methodology. Fair way to put it?

A No, that is not.

Q Okay. So you read Doctor Eastman's answer to the notice of disciplinary charges here, correct?

A I did, yes.

Q And in that, did you see that there were, as part of this case, certain charges that have been brought against Doctor Eastman based on statements or representations he made about voting irregularities or voter fraud? Correct?

A I did see that, yes.

Q Okay. And you're not here, Doctor Grimmer, to offer an opinion about anything that appeared in the charges here, correct?

MR. CARLING: Objection, vague as to "appeared in the charges." I mean, if he's asking about culpability or something, that would be one thing, but his testimony is obviously related to the charges.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q You're not an attorney, correct, Doctor Grimmer?

A I am not an attorney, no.

Q And you're not here to testify about the actions that a reasonable lawyer must take to determine the reliability of information in, as an example, expert reports?

A No, I'm not here to testify --

Q Okay. You have no basis to offer an opinion on that issue, correct?

A I'm not an attorney.

Q Well, I'm not sure you answered my question. You have no basis to offer an opinion on that question, correct?

MR. CARLING: May I ask that we re-ask what that question is? Because I just want to make sure the answer is --

THE COURT: Okay. Could you restate the question, please, Mr. Miller.

MR. MILLER: Sure.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q So you are not going to offer an opinion in this case, Doctor Grimmer, as to whether Doctor Eastman had the obligation or duty to do any further research or investigation on the expert reports that he was relying on?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I'm not offering an opinion about that, no.

MR. MILLER: Now, I want to talk about the Exhibit 174. Mr. Benveniste, if you could pull that up and put it on the screen for Doctor Grimmer.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Doctor Grimmer, in the meantime, I don't think you've memorized the exhibit numbers, so I think we called this -- or you called this the PNAS report.

A Yes.

Q Correct?

A I see it on my screen now, yes.

Q Okay. Great. And so we call this a report or a paper or a publication? What's the best way to refer to it?

A It's a publication.

Q Okay. And so you and a couple of others were the authors of this publication, correct?

A That's correct.

Q Okay. And in it, I think you were attempting to characterize, were you not, Doctor Grimmer, various categories or areas of claims that had been made with regard to voter fraud or voting irregularities, correct?

A That's correct, yes.

Q And it was your intention in this publication to provide your and your team's evaluation as to whether those claims of voter fraud and voter irregularity were reliable, correct?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A We, yes, made an assessment about whether those claims had a basis in evidence or not.

Q So I went through Exhibit 174, because I was trying to determine the basis for your selection of the voter fraud claims that had been made, and I found four or five different names. The first one was Charlie Kirk, correct, K-I-R-K?

A That's correct.

Q Okay. And the bases for -- well, you used Mr. Kirk's representations about voter fraud as part of your analysis, correct?

A That's correct.

Q Yes. And Charlie Kirk, is he a radio commentator?

A My understanding is that he is both a radio commentator and heads up an organization that I'm not remembering the name of that works at colleges as well.

Q And the claims that Mr. Kirk was advancing, that you critiqued in Exhibit 174, were made via Mr. Kirk's tweets, correct?

A That's correct.

Q Okay. So you started with, basically, looking at Mr. Kirk's tweets as the starting point of debunking or evaluating the claims that he had made in those tweets, correct?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A This is one place in which he made those claims, and we used --

Q Okay. And how was it --

THE COURT: Just a minute. I'm sorry. I didn't hear your answer, Doctor Grimmer.

THE WITNESS: Just that this is one place that he made those claims. I can't recall if this is the first place we encountered this specific claim from Charlie Kirk, and, if I do recall, a number of other individuals were making similar sorts of claims after the election, and we used this as a sort of exemplar of the claim.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Okay. So, when you say others were "making similar sorts of claims," you mean they were making similar sorts of claims to the ones that Mr. Kirk had made in his tweets, correct?

A That's correct.

Q And there wasn't, you know, a report or an investigation that was something else that Mr. Kirk drafted, and offered this as reliable information on voter fraud, as an example, correct?

A To the best of my knowledge, he did not produce anything like that, no.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Okay. And as far as you know, Mr. Kirk didn't have any training or experience in econometrics or statistics, correct?
A That's correct.
Q And Mr. Kirk was not holding himself out as an expert in that field?
A I don't know that. He's offering some pretty detailed analyses here, and reaching a summary conclusion that it's suspicious. So perhaps he is saying that he has some ability to discern what is suspicious or not, based on some analysis of statistical data.
Q Okay. Well, other than the tweets that you looked at for Mr. Kirk, was there any other information or data that you or your team had with respect to the claims that he was making?
A I can't recall at the moment. I believe that there's other articles that make similar sorts of claims, though.
Q Okay. Well, right now we're just talking about Mr. Kirk. Did you have any other information for Mr. Kirk, other than the tweets?
A I can't recall
Q Okay. And, by the way, in your work leading up to the production of Exhibit 174, you didn't see that -- well, let me ask a different question. You didn't see that Doctor Eastman -- in all the work that you did as part of your engagement in this case, you didn't see that Doctor Eastman relied in any way on Mr. Kirk's tweets, correct? In other words, when you went through the answer to the notice of disciplinary charges here, you didn't see Doctor Eastman referring to or relying on any information received from Mr. Kirk, correct?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I did not see Mr. Eastman -- I mean, excuse me, Doctor Eastman -- rely on tweets from Mr. Kirk, no.

Q Okay. And you didn't see Mr. Kirk's name listed, or his information or statements referenced, anywhere in Doctor Eastman's answer to the NDC, correct?

A As best as I can recall, I did not see it, no.

Q By the way, Exhibit 174, when was that published?

A I think it's going to -- it would be at the end of 2021 it would have been published. You can see the -- you see the "Edited by" line there? It will give the sort of history of it.

So it was received for review February 2022 -- sorry, February 22 of 2021 -- and then it received final approval August 30th. The production of this -- of course, there were a series of memos that went into the production of this that had an earlier appearance on line.

Q Okay. Well, I don't want to go into the other memos that went into this or were a basis of Exhibit 174. I just want to talk about 174. So is it fair to say, Doctor

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Grimmer, that 174 was published sometime after August 2021?

THE COURT: Let me just -- the exhibit itself, on page one, in the second column, at the bottom, says, "Published November 2, 2021." Does that sound accurate, in footnote one? Is it the same article?

THE WITNESS: Yes. And I just want to be clear that -- so "published" here means that it was placed in an issue of the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. It doesn't mean that this is first time the article appeared on line.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Okay. All right. So we'll use your publication date, then, according your definition, of November 2021. Fair?

A Again, I just want to be clear that "published" here means a very specific thing, which is about when it appeared in an issue of the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. It's not the first time that this article appeared on line, or that the contents were circulated on line.

Q And earlier version of -- well, were there earlier versions of Exhibit 174?

A So the antecedent of 174 was a memo that we wrote that -- sorry, excuse me -- Andy Eggers, Professor Andrew Eggers, and I wrote, and put on line -- I believe that would have been January 2nd or 3rd -- about claims that Doctor

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

John Lott was making about evidence of voter -- anomalous voting in Georgia. And so that was like the -- that was the initial antecedent of this, and then we built on that work in order to produce this paper.

Q All right. Let's move to another category that appeared in Exhibit 174. You call this "Biden's Share of Bellwether Counties Not Anomalous," find that on page two. You remember that as a second category that you were analyzing here as part of Exhibit 174?

A I do, yes.

Q Okay. And the original source of that claim about some anomaly in bellwether counties, that came from Bill Binney, right, B-I-N-N-E-Y?

A That would be one source, but, also, I believe President Trump was making similar representations in public speeches. It was a claim being regularly repeated, so that was, an exemplar of someone making this claim.

Q All right. Well, for Mr. Binney, the source of Mr. Binney's statement or representation about the anomaly in bellwether counties -- that came from a tweet from Mr. Binney, did it not?

A I thought it came from a popularly available article in The Federalist. Do I not recall that correctly?

Q I don't think so, according to the appendix here, Doctor Grimmer, but you're the expert, so what do you recall?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Well, again, I'm doing my best to recall. I remember a number of individuals making claims about bellwether counties in the 2020 election. Whether the initial source of that was a tweet or an article that we read about it bring surprising that Joe Biden won despite not securing a large share of bellwether counties, it's quite possible we cited a tweet as the source, but there's a number of sources for it.
Q All right. Well, let me ask you this, Doctor Grimmer. Going back to Doctor Eastman's answer to the NDC, you didn't see that Doctor Eastman had relied on Mr. Binney's tweet or tweets in any way in the information that Doctor Eastman set forth in his answer?
A I did not see that, no.
THE COURT: I'm sorry. Whose tweets?
MR. MILLER: It would be Mr. Binney, was the question, your Honor.
THE COURT: Mr. Binney. Okay. Thank you.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Another category of Exhibit 174 were "Differences Between 2016 and 2020 Are Not Anomalous." This was a category that you identified that you wanted to address in Exhibit 174, right?
A Correct.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And here you cited Mr. Cicchetti's declaration in the Texas v. Pennsylvania litigation, correct?
A That's correct.
Q Okay. And in Exhibit 174, you provided your critique of Doctor -- or, excuse me, Mr. Cicchetti's declaration or declarations in the Texas v. Pennsylvania case, correct?
A Yes. We articulated that critique, yes.
Q And, by the way, in the Texas v. Pennsylvania litigation, is it true, Doctor Grimmer, that you only reviewed Mr. Cicchetti's original declaration attached to the complaint?
A Yes. That's what we focused on in this paper, is the original declaration. That's correct.
Q Okay. And I'm sorry to interrupt, Doctor Grimmer. And you understood that Mr. Cicchetti had prepared and submitted and provided to the Court a supplemental declaration in that case, correct?
A Correct.
Q Okay. And that's not anything you analyzed in Exhibit 174, correct?
A Not in Exhibit 174, no.
Q And have you ever reviewed the supplemental declaration of Mr. Cicchetti in the Texas v. Pennsylvania case?
A I have, yes.
Q All right. We'll get back to that in a minute. So the next category was, in 174, your "Patterns of Straight-Ticket and Split-Ticket Voting in Michigan Was Not Anomalous," right?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A That's correct, yes.

Q Okay. And here the claim that you were analyzing was a YouTube video that was prepared or produced by Shiva, S-H-I-V-A, Ayyadurai, A-Y-Y-A-D-U-R-A-I. Remember that?

A I do, yes.

Q Okay. And so the claim that you're analyzing as part of Exhibit 174, and trying to debunk here, was a YouTube video, right?

A Yes. What's important about this claim, though, is it's directly related to claims that are also made in litigation. There's going to be the same basic issue here, which was not a thing I realized at the time of writing this but do realize now, that the same statistical error that Doctor Ayyadurai makes in this YouTube video, and promulgated, is found in other places as well.

Q Well, I wasn't talking about what you did subsequent with respect to the preparation of 174, Doctor Grimmer. Just so my question is clear, I'm only talking about what went into Exhibit 174. So you and I agree that what you were assessing in this exhibit, 174, was Mr. Ayyadurai's tweets?

A No, I don't agree to that.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q I'm sorry?
A I don't agree that I was assessing his tweets.
Q Okay. Well, that was one piece of information that you were assessing in 174, correct?
A I think it says, "YouTube video."
Q I apologize. So let me re-ask the question so I get it right. So, in 174, one of the things that you were assessing was Mr. Ayyadurai's YouTube video, correct?
A That's correct.
Q And apparently, in this YouTube video, there was some assessment of the issue or anomalies with respect to the issues of straight-ticket versus split-ticket voting, correct?
A That's correct.
Q Okay. And when you went through the answer of Doctor Eastman to the notice of disciplinary charges here, you didn't see Mr. Ayyadurai's name listed anyplace?
A I don't believe so, no.
Q Okay. So the next issue you have in 174 is what you called "Dominion Voting Machines Do Not Decrease Trump Vote Share," right?
A That's correct.
Q Okay. And in Exhibit 174, you attribute those claims to attorneys Rudy Giuliani and Sidney Powell, correct?
A I believe that these claims come from what was at the time an anonymous expert report, but I believe now that this is a report authored by Russell Ramsland. So similar claims are made in litigation, so, in part, the specific claims here are articulated by Rudy Giuliani and Sidney Powell, but the analysis that we undertake is in response to a specific report, and you'll see in SI Appendix, Section E, we undertake an extensive analysis of that specific report, and that specific report appears in some of the post-election litigation.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And the issue in that report was a critique of the Dominion voting machines. Do I have that right?

A It's not a critique of the Dominion voting machines.

Q Okay. Well, characterize the issue that you were responding to with respect to Dominion voting machines. These are your words, so that's what I'm going to use.

A The report makes the claim that Dominion voting machines caused a 5.6 percentage-point shift in votes to Joe Biden. So you see the quote here that:

> "Also indicates" -- so here it's Dominion or Hart voting machines -- "indicates that Biden consistently received 5.6 percent more votes in those counties than he should have."

Q All right. Well, let's move on. Exhibit 174, another category was "The Turnout Was Not Unusually High in Counties

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Where Republicans Made Fraud Accusations." Do I have that next one right?

A I just want to be sure that -- I think you skipped a category.

Q I may have.

A Okay. So that's not the next one, but you want to direct my attention there, just to be sure?

Q Sure.

A Yes.

THE COURT: Which one, again, page five?

MR. MILLER: Yes.

THE COURT: "Turnout Was Not Unusually High"?

MR. MILLER: Yes. That's the one I'm addressing now. Thank you, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. All right. Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q All right. So let's talk about that one. And so, on that, you list -- well, let me ask it better. You were responding to claims that somebody by the name of John Lott, L-O-T-T, had made with respect to this allegation of turnout, correct?

A That's correct.

Q Okay. And, by the way, in Doctor Eastman's answer to the notice of disciplinary charges, you didn't see that Doctor Eastman relied on Mr. Lott's tweets in any way?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A This is not an assessment of John Lott's tweets.
Q Okay. Well, where did the information come from with respect to -- that you attribute to Mr. Lott here?
A John Lott circulated a paper in mid to late December where he made this claim and the claims that were in the previous section.
Q Fair enough. All right. So let me ask it again with respect to Doctor Eastman's answer to the NDC. There was nothing in his answer that you saw that related to this paper that John Lott wrote?
A The paper was in discovery, but it was not in the notice of disciplinary charges, in Mr. -- I mean, Doctor Eastman's response.
Q Okay. Fair enough. So you didn't see Mr. Lott's name listed anywhere in Doctor Eastman's answer?
A The best I recall, I did not, no.
Q Okay. So is it true, Doctor Grimmer, that the only name that you can testify to that you found in Doctor Eastman's answer that was discussed in Exhibit 174 was Mr. Cicchetti, right?
A To the best I recall, yes, but there is a subsequent appendix where we include a set of address analyses. I'm not sure if any of those analyses are there. And, also, just to be clear -- no, you asked about names. So I'll stop myself there.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Yes. Okay. Well, I looked at the appendix, and I didn't see anything else that mentioned anything that Doctor Eastman raised in his answer, but you tell me whether you agree with that or not.

A To the best of my recollection, that is correct.

Q Okay. Fair enough. So you also testified about Stanley Young, correct?

A That's correct.

Q All right. Now, your assessment of Doctor Young's analysis was based on his use of voter count, correct?

A That's correct.

Q And another way to think of voter count is raw numbers, right, number of voters, correct?

A It is the number --

Q Or number of ballots. Let me be more clear, Doctor Grimmer, with you. When we ask about or use the phrase "voter count," we're talking about the number of ballots, correct?

THE COURT: Well, that's vague. When you say you're talking about the number of ballots, are you talking about absentee ballots, counted ballots, rejected ballots? So could you clarify that, Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: Sure. Well, I meant to be all-inclusive, your Honor. Thank you for the clarification, and so any ballot that ends up being canvassed and counted.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: And counted?
MR. MILLER: Yes.
THE COURT: Okay.
MR. MILLER: Thank you.
THE COURT: All right. Do you understand the question, Doctor Grimmer?
THE WITNESS: Yes. So Doctor Young's analysis is about the number of votes cast for a particular candidate.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Okay. It's a better way to put it. Thank you, Doctor Grimmer. So the number of votes case, all right, not necessarily -- well, are votes cast and votes counted -- are they the same?
A In this case, it's going to be the votes cast and counted, yes.
Q Okay. Good. All right. And did you -- have you ever looked at a report by Doctor Young where he doesn't use votes cast or counted, he uses voter share?
A So there are other issues in Doctor Young's analysis. For example, in Pennsylvania, where -- Q Well, wait, wait, wait. Sorry to interrupt, Doctor Grimmer, because it doesn't sound like you're going to be responding to my question. So I wasn't asking you to critique anything. My question is very simple, and that is, did you ever see a report by Doctor Young where, instead of using votes cast, he uses voter share as part of his analysis as to whether there was anomalies?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A He undertakes an analysis that involves vote share, but it is not the same contrast analysis that I critiqued. It is a different analysis.

Q Okay. So let's go back to the beginning of that, so you and I can be on the same page. You did review a report by Doctor Young where he used vote share, in other words, a percentage, as opposed to votes cast, true?

A Yes, but it was a completely different analysis. That was not the contrast analysis.

Q I understand that. I'm just wanting to make sure that you and I have apples and apples here. So let's do this. Let's pull up Exhibit 1041. So, on the screen, Doctor Grimmer, we put up Exhibit 1041. This is the Pennsylvania 2020 voting analysis report of November 2020. Do you see that?

A I see that, yes.

Q And you reviewed that, correct?

A I did --

Q And there was a--

A -- yes.

Q I'm sorry to interrupt, Doctor Grimmer. There was a portion of Exhibit 1041 that Doctor Young drafted, correct, or was attributed to him?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A He's listed as the author, yes.
Q Yes. Okay. And in Exhibit 1041, Doctor Young used vote share to calculate or support his conclusions, correct?
A There are analyses where the defendant variable, variable that's being analyzed, is vote share, but, again, it's different than the subject I analyzed, which was his contrast analysis. It's a completely different analysis, and I'm happy to describe why that is not a reliable methodology to detect --
Q I'm sorry. Yes. You've done that, Doctor Grimmer, so we know what you have to say about that. All I'm trying to ask you to look at here is whether this is a report where Doctor Young uses vote share, or percentages, as opposed to vote count, which you critiqued in your testimony earlier today and yesterday.
A The critique, though, is not that we can never vote counts to uncover something about the world. The critique was, in this particular analysis, vote count was inappropriate.
Q Okay. Well, did you analyze Doctor Young's conclusions in Exhibit 1041?
A With regard to vote share, I --
Q Yes.
A Sorry. I was answering. I'm sorry. I did, and provided that in the code that I submitted with my expert file.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q So using vote share -- well, let me back up. So, across Pennsylvania, for example, you recall that Biden's vote share was roughly 70 percent of registered Democrats, true?
A Can we please go the analysis? Because there's a number of issues here that get into details, and I want to be sure I get it right.
Q Well, that's okay. I'm not actually focusing on this particular analysis right now. I'm asking another line of questions. So let me see if you can answer that one.
THE COURT: Just a minute. Could you restate the question?
MR. MILLER: Sure.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Is it true that Biden's vote shares were roughly 70 percent of registered Democrats in Pennsylvania?
A I'm not recalling that particular statistic broken out. I know I've reviewed it before, but I'm not remembering that particular tabulation.
Q And do you know what I mean when we talk about the "10 anomalous counties"?
A I do know what we're talking about there, yes.
Q Okay. And is it true, Doctor Grimmer, that, in the 10 anomalous counties, that Doctor Young analyzed the percentage of Biden votes was 101 percent?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A It's really going to be helpful if we go to the analysis, because this is a mischaracterization of what happens, what Doctor Young does in the analysis. He does not have data broken out by an individual registered Democrat and the vote share for Joe Biden. He is instead calculating a vote relationship between these two variables.
Q By the way, do you have any assessment of Doctor Young's credentials with respect to analyzing voting data?
A I've never seen a published paper about elections or the statistics of elections, and, based on the papers I reviewed, I have concerns about his ability to review and analyze election data and data generally, yes.
Q Only because of what you reviewed, right?
A Well, I was not familiar with Doctor Young before.
Q Okay. So you never looked at his CV or background or scholarly attributes?
A I mean, I know he has a PhD and has published extensively in a non-election field, but I'm not in a position where I'm going to make an assessment about his work on, you know, the environment, which I know that he's published on.
Q Okay. Well, with respect to your critique of Doctor Young's analysis, do I have this right, Doctor Grimmer, that you essentially made the same critique of Mr. Cicchetti, and that was that he was using raw votes, as opposed to vote shares, in his analysis?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A So Mr. Cicchetti also undertakes an analysis that involves vote shares, and makes a claim about that being anomalous, and in the replication code for the paper that we were just describing, the exhibit before this, we show that that is also a faulty way to perform that task.

Q Right. So you looked at both analyses by Mr. Cicchetti, both that was based on raw votes, or vote count, and vote shares. Is that true?

A They're directly related as the same basic analysis. So Mr. Cicchetti is saying, "I see a difference in vote counts or a difference in vote share," and he wants to make a comparison there. What Doctor Young is doing in this report instead is he says, "I find these anomalous counties, and now I want to run what's called a regression, or find a line of best fit between the share of votes for Joe Biden in that county and the" -- this is why it would be good to see it.

I can't remember if it's the number or share of Democratic registered voters in that county. I believe it's the share of registered voters who are Democratic, and he says there's something anomalous about this. Of course, there's nothing anomalous about -- first of all, it's a very different analysis, has nothing to do with the contrast analysis. It's a completely different undertaking.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And what's more, we can't make an inference about how Democrats voted or how other individuals voted using this particular kind of data. It is a well-known problem. It's known as the "ecological inference problem." You cannot make an inference about individual voter behavior based on aggregate data.

And so the particular analysis that Doctor Young conducts cannot possibly inform how individual Democrats voted, or the rate at which Democrats voted for Joe Biden. What's more, if we were to look at what Doctor Young does in this report, what you'll find is that, for him to obtain what calls "anomalous," he has to make a series of ad hoc analysis decisions that are in no way justified or clearly articulated a reason for.

At one point, he says, "Because these two counties are odd, we have to remove them," and as I show in the code that I provided in my expert file, if you don't make those two counties, which he includes in the anomalous counties -- if you don't remove them, what he calls "anomalous" is no longer anomalous.

So this analysis is just very distinct from his contrast analysis. It's distinct from comparing Cicchetti using numbers and shares, and it is also in error, and unreliable evidence of voter fraud. It's not really an indication of anything.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Just a minute. Doctor Grimmer, you testified that Mr. Young makes a series of ad hoc -- were they ad hoc assumptions or ad hoc -- I didn't hear the word that followed.

THE WITNESS: Analysis decisions. Just to give an example --

THE COURT: Analysis decisions. Okay.

THE WITNESS: -- he says, "I'm going to calculate a rate" -- what he wants to say is a rate at which Democratic voters voted for Joe Biden, but, in order to perform that calculation from that regression, he then says, "I need to drop Allegheny and Philadelphia County," and provides no reasoned basis for this, other than to say that they're odd.

Well, in the evaluation of statistical literature in the evaluation of peer review, it's well known that when individuals make decisions like that, it can lead to a phenomenon that's often called "fishing" or it's called "P hacking," because it's often associated with statistical significance.

In these situations, individuals make decisions because it helps them to lead to a particular conclusion. Now, of course, I don't know if Doctor Young did that, but I do know from my analysis using data from Pennsylvania that the only way to reach what Doctor Young says is anomalous is to drop those two counties.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q By the way, you've prepared reports for litigated matters previously, Doctor Grimmer, correct?

A That's correct.

Q Okay. And one of those was a case in Nevada. Remind me of the name.

A I think it's Gilbert v. Lombardo.

Q Gilbert v. Lombardo. You were retained by the defendant in that case to perform an analysis, correct?

A That's correct.

Q And did you provide a written analysis with respect to the issues that were raised in the Gilbert v. Lombardo case?

A I did, yes.

Q And did you provide that to a lawyer?

A I did, yes.

Q And was it submitted to the Court?

A It was, yes.

Q And did you expect that the lawyer would rely on the conclusions that you made in the report?

A It was not a sort of blind reliance. We had a lot of conversations. I worked with a really excellent lawyer, Sam Mirkovich (phonetic), in Nevada, and in that particular case, it was a set of claims made about voter fraud that were at first difficult to disentangle, because they were sort of 90 pages of mathematical gibberish.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And so, over the course of the 10 days in the production of that report, I both made my expert assessment of what was going on in that evidence, and talked to Mr. Mirkovich about the evidence and the reliability of the evidence I was producing, and he would ask questions and make inquiries about the particular lines of argument I was making. So it wasn't as if I submitted something and then he said, "Well, whatever you submit I'll take as gospel." He made inquiries.

Q So you talked about Mr. Geels' work with respect to the Georgia election, 2020, correct?

A That's correct.

Q And you looked at Doctor Geels' affidavit or declaration that he submitted to the Court in the Trump v. Raffensperger matter, correct?

A I think there's three affidavits, but I viewed all of them, yes.

Q Okay. Well, why don't we pull up Exhibit 1036.

THE COURT: 1036?

MR. MILLER: Yes.

THE COURT: Which page?

MR. MILLER: Well, I wanted to get up the first page here, your Honor, but you'll find that at 545.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: All right. Okay. Thank you.

MR. MILLER: It's 1035, 545.

THE COURT: All right. I have that. Thank you.

MR. MILLER: Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q So do you see this, Doctor Grimmer? You were asked some questions about this by Bar counsel, correct?

A Correct.

Q And this is one of the -- well, we'll get to it in a second, but this contains one of the declarations of Mr. Geels that you looked at, correct?

A I believe -- if I'm recalling, Exhibit 3 was the -- was Mr. Geels' exhibit, but that's just based on my recollection.

Q Sure. Well, let's go to page 554, and let's look at paragraph 24.

MR. MILLER: And if you could blow that up, Mr. Benveniste.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q So here you testified in response to questions from Mr. Carling on this, but paragraph 24 talks about the illegally cast ballots for underage voters, in essence, true?

A His estimate of voters who are registered, he says, before their 17th birth.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Correct. Okay. So we have that right. So what's being expressed here in paragraph 24 by Mr. Geels is the registration of underage voters, correct?

A It's the registration and having -- well, what he calls "registration," the "Date Added" field in this voter file, and it's individuals who both cast a vote in the 2020 election and, he says, were added early.

Q I'm sorry. I missed the very last part of that, Doctor Grimmer.

A No problem. I'll just repeat it. It's the combination of individuals who voted in the 2020 election and individuals who he says were added before their 17th birthday.

Q And do you recall, Doctor Grimmer, that Mr. Geels had submitted a subsequent declaration correcting the information here depicted in paragraph 24?

A I recall that he submitted that. I know that the numbers are updated. It was not outlined as a correction. The numbers were updated, though.

Q Okay. So we know that it went from -- in the subsequent declarations, it went from 66,247 to a number more like 2,400, correct?

A I think it's even lower than 2,400, but it's, you know, 2,000 and change. We'll say it's approximately 2,000.

Q Okay. All right. So let's say it's approximately

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2,000. So you were aware that there was a subsequent declaration by Mr. Geels that had reduced it from 66 and change to something around 2,000, correct?

A Correct.

Q Okay. And then I think you testified that there was even a third declaration from Mr. Geels, where it was revised further to something around 700, correct?

A Correct.

Q And was it your -- did you have any critique of whether the 700 registered voters was an accurate number?

A So the key issue, I believe, is, has this individual had another interaction where they would essentially have the opportunity to update their registration while being of age. So, even if you take the date added, even if you take the registration date to get down to this lower number of 700, when these individuals do something like interact with the Department of Driver Services in Georgia, they have the opportunity to update that registration, and at which point they would have registered as of age.

Q Okay. So I'm not sure that answered my question, but, of the 700 that was depicted by Mr. Geels in his third declaration, do you agree or disagree that that number represented voters that had illegally registered, in violation of Georgia law?

A I have no basis upon which to make the assessment,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

because, first, date added and registration date will have, sometimes, an unclear relationship to when someone was registered.

And, second, even if someone had been added when they were 16, you have to make an assessment about whether they re-interacted with the state, which would include going to the Department of Driver Services and updating a license. At that point, they would have updated their registration, which would have happened when they were the age of majority.

Q Did you ever independently research the same issue, as to whether there was any voter that had registered illegally under Georgia law for the 2020 election?

A I have not assessed whether individuals illegally registered to vote in the 2020 election in Georgia.

Q All right. So you disagree with Mr. Geels' characterization of those numbers, but you hadn't come to an independent conclusion yourself, true?

A So that's just the characterization of the numbers. I'm disagreeing with how Mr. Geels is interpreting the state voter registration file, and saying that that interpretation cannot possibly yield that number without more information. I have not undertaken my own analysis of the state voter file to make a determination of the number of individuals who, you know, have supposedly registered underage.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Okay. Had you undertaken that analysis, Doctor Grimmer, you don't know what that would have yielded, then, correct?

A I don't know what it would yielded, no. Presumably, given that we're now talking about including additional filters, so it looks as if -- if we go from date added, and then we add on registration, as Mr. Geels did, and then we add on this additional "Did you interact with the Department of Driver Services or re-register otherwise?," it would be less than that 700 number that he has in this subsequent -- in the final affidavit that he submitted on this matter.

Q Sure. But greater than zero?

A Or equal to zero.

Q Okay. Did you ever hear from any source that Mr. Geels had made a mistake in paragraph 24 and transposed some numbers that resulted in generating the 66,247 number there on the screen?

A So let me think. I believe, in other reading, I was sort of searching to try to understand what was going on with this Geels, and I believe there is a reference in a response Doctor Eastman made in a litigation about something involving the January 6th Committee, and I'm sorry for not knowing the exact case name, and I believe there's a footnote where that transposition is articulated.

Q You also testified about Mr. Geels' opinion with respect to the applications for absentee ballots pursuant to Georgia law?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Do you mean specifically the rollover list?
Q Yes.
A Yes, I did testify about that.
Q Okay.
A Yes.
Q And make sure I understand this. You had provided an opinion that the entire number of those on the rollover list, or the list, were rollover eligible, correct?
A That's my understanding of that, yes.
Q Okay. And were there any other factors in you coming to a conclusion with regard to the application for absentee ballots?
A I'm sorry. I don't know what you mean by "factors." I'm sorry.
Q Sure. You testified about Mr. Geels' opinions with respect to the applications for absentee ballots, correct?
A That's correct.
Q Okay. And tell my your conclusion with respect to -- or your critique of Mr. Geels with respect to that issue.
A Yes. So he identifies 300,000 individuals who are -- who applied -- what he says is outside the legal window for absentee ballots. Doctor Charles Stewart, in his reply to this brief, points out that, on his assessment of these individuals who have applied outside of this window, a large share of these individuals are over 65, which would be an indication that they're eligible for this rollover list.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And so, from that, it's a reasonable conclusion that individuals who are applying outside of this window, given that practice in Georgia, is that individuals who roll over will have their application date set 180 days before the election, and, given Doctor Charles Stewart's analysis that -- I think he said something like 90, but I'm not recall exactly -- of these individuals over 65, it's a reasonable inference that what's going on here is that these are the individuals who are eligible to roll over.

Q And you didn't do an independent analysis of Mr. Stewart's conclusions in that regard, did you?

A I did not do an independent analysis of Doctor Stewart's conclusions, no.

Q Now, you talked about HB 316 and its impact on absentee ballot application, correct?

A I believe I spoke primarily about it, with the return of absentee ballots, but HB 316 does cover absentee ballot applications. There's some revisions there as well.

Q Well, HB 316 required that there be certain bona fides about the ballot being returned, correct?

A There is a verification process that HB 316 requires.

Q Sure, that required the envelope to be signed, correct?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes.
Q And it provided that the signature on the absentee ballot match the signature on record, correct?
A That's my understanding of the law, yes.
Q Okay. And that the voter also needs to furnish other information that was requested on the envelope, like date of birth?
A I thought HB -- so maybe I'm misremembering here, but I thought HB 316 revised it so that no longer had to provide date of birth and address on the envelope.
Q Okay. Well, my understanding, Doctor Grimmer -- you can tell me whether you agree with this or not -- is that that came about as a result of a 2018 court decision. Is that your understanding as well, in other words, the fact that you didn't have to provide date of birth further on the absentee envelope?
A I thought that was explicitly revised in HB 316, but I can't remember, you know, the specific part of the code that did it.
Q Before HB 316, voters were allowed to cure an issue with an absentee ballot, correct?
A Again, my impression was HB 316 enabled the cure process. That's what passed -- that was led to curing happening in Georgia.
Q Okay. So you think that was a change made by HB 316,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

as opposed to something that had been mandated by Georgia law?

A HB 316 certainly revised the curing process.

Q In what way?

A Again, my impression was that it enabled election plaintiffs to contact individuals who had their ballots rejected in order to have those revised, in order to have those rejections cured. That is, they provide information in order to successfully cast the ballot.

Q So I think your testimony in response to questions by Bar counsel was that there were other reasons for -- this was one of your buckets -- other reasons for the signature mismatch, correct?

A I don't think I testified about other reason for a signature mismatch.

Q Okay. Well, what was the issue with respect to signature mismatch in 2020?

A So my understanding is that a claim is made that the reduction in absentee ballot rejection rates is due to a change in the way signatures were matched in 2020, and I did offer testimony about that claim, yes.

Q Okay. And what was your conclusion with respect to whether there was a higher rate of rejection based on signature mismatch in 2020?

A Compared to --

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q 2018 or 2016.
A Okay. So it is the case that absentee ballot rejections went down from 2016, 2018, compared to 2020, but when we look at the reasons for those rejections, the biggest decreases happened because individuals returned their ballot before the deadline, and because individuals -- there is a simplified oath envelope which corresponds to the information that's on the outside of the ballot that's returned. It's the envelope on the outside.

The smallest reduction of those three reasons has to do with either the signature being matched or the signature not being there on the ballot, and that stated reason. So, just to reprise, the numbers that I confirmed when comparing to the Secretary of State's numbers, in 2016, it looks like something like 0.28 percent of absentee ballots were rejected for a signature reason, either a signature mismatch or it's missing, and in 2018, I believe it was 0.2 percent, and then, in 2020, by my calculation, it was something -- it was 0.15 percent of absentee ballots were rejected for that reason.

Q Just on that topic really quickly --

THE COURT: Just one second. The 0.15 percent, was that your calculation in the overall 2020 general election vote count --

THE WITNESS: That was -- apology.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: -- or as to a particular state? I'm sorry?

THE WITNESS: Yes. I'm sorry. So this is in reference to the state of Georgia, and then, just to be even more clear about what's in the denominator there, so this counts all mail-in absentee ballots that were accepted or rejected. Those would go in the denominator, and then the numerator, it counts ballots that were rejected for a signature reason. That means that the status reason in the absentee voter history is either that the ballot was rejected because there was a signature mismatch or no signature. That's how it would end up in that grouping.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q For Georgia, Doctor Grimmer, does the Secretary of State information include the reason for the disqualification?

A It does, yes.

Q Okay. And that's in the voter history file?

A It's in the absentee voter history file, and it was actually used by an expert in Pearson v. Kemp, both a plaintiff expert and then defendant expert. So the plaintiff expert was Doctor Benjamin Overholt, and then the defendant expert was Doctor Kenneth Mayer.

Q So, just to make sure I'm clear, that information with respect to the reason for the disqualification is maintained in the voter history file in Georgia?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I'm sorry. I want to be super clear. It's that absentee voter history file, and so voter history file will be an aggregation of everyone who turned out to vote in the election, and just to get a sense of what that file will look like, it merely contains a registration number, and then it will give you an election code. So it's like the general election and election date, and then it will say whether the person voted absentee, provisional -- there's another column called "Supplemental." I believe that exhausts the columns.

The "Absentee" is an indication of everyone who -- if it's yes, it would be an indication they'd be in this absentee voter history file in Georgia. In there, that includes everyone who either voted mail in person -- or, sorry, they voted mail-in ballot, or early in person, would be in that absentee file. There's a third category. A very small number of voters in Georgia, like throughout the company, vote electronically through UOCAVA.

And so, in that absentee voter history, which is different than the voter history, there is a field called "Status Reason," and so one is able to make an assessment of the reasons for the ballot being rejected based on the provided status reason.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: Your Honor, I think I'm close to being finished with Doctor Grimmer on my exam. May I take a few minutes to speak with Doctor Eastman? And then I'll come back and finish up.

THE COURT: Okay. Let's take a five-minute break.

MR. MILLER: That's sufficient.

THE COURT: Okay.

THE CLERK: We're off the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

(Proceedings recessed briefly.)

THE CLERK: We're back on the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

We're back on the record in the continued hearing of John Charles Eastman, in Case Number 23-O-30029.

Mr. Miller.

MR. MILLER: Thank you, your Honor. I don't have any further questions at this point.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Redirect, Mr. Carling?

REDIRECT EXAMINATION

BY MR. CARLING:

Q Just, Doctor Grimmer, on your definition of "voter fraud," I want to make sure I understood it. Does voter fraud include attempts to cast large numbers of votes without the voters' knowledge, for example, elector vote

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

flipping?

THE COURT: Just a minute. For example -- what did you say?

MR. CARLING: Electronic vote flipping.

THE COURT: Electronic vote flipping. Okay.

THE WITNESS: Yes, that would be included in voter fraud.

BY MR. CARLING:

Q And what is -- is "ballot stuffing" an expression in your field?

A I think I know what someone would mean by "ballot stuffing." It isn't sort of like a term of art that's used in the analysis of elections, although it might be. So the basic idea of ballot stuff is, perhaps, fraudulent votes are added to a collection of votes which might -- I think the origin comes from 19th century elections, which were conducted in a very different sort of context, where individuals, on election day, may insert additional ballots into the ballot, which would be ballot stuffing, I think.

Q And would you consider those to be fraudulent ballots?

A If the insertion of those ballots were not connected to an individual who had cast those ballots, I would, yes.

Q Okay. And are there -- can instances of voter fraud involve fraud perpetrated by election officials?

A An election official could facilitate or themselves

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

commit an act that would lead to ballots being cast that's not being voted by that particular voter, yes.

MR. CARLING: All right. I don't have any other questions. Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: Nothing further, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you, Doctor Grimmer. We appreciate your participation in this proceeding. You're excused as a witness.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness was excused.)

THE COURT: Okay. So are you still planning to call Mr. Brater after lunch?

MR. CARLING: We are, your Honor. I believe he's somewhat flexible, so, whenever the Court would like to return from lunch, I believe he'll be available.

THE COURT: Okay. Why don't we take our lunch break from now until 2:45. Let's go off the record.

THE CLERK: We're off the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

(Proceedings recessed to reconvene.)

//

//

//

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

AFTERNOON SESSION

--oOo--

THE CLERK: We're back on the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

We're back on the record in the continued hearing of John Charles Eastman, in Case Number 23-O-30029.

Before the next witness is called, there are a few housekeeping matters that I want to sort out, and then we can -- which should only take a few more minutes.

First of all, I don't think, Mr. Miller, that you re-filed that motion in limine. Did you?

MR. MILLER: You want us to renumber it to seven?

THE COURT: Yes.

MR. MILLER: I don't think we've done that yet, no, but we will.

THE COURT: Okay. Well, if that could be done, say, by Monday, that would be great.

MR. MILLER: That's fine.

THE COURT: Okay. And then I'll expect the Office of Chief Trial Counsel to file its opposition no later than July the 10th.

Another housekeeping matter. I don't -- regarding OCTC's motion in limine, which would be the only one I haven't ruled on so far, motion in limine number six, did the parties meet and confer in an effort to resolve that issue?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: I reached out to Mr. Carling early this morning, and we're trying. I'm certain we'll get it done.

MR. CARLING: He did, and we talked about discussing it later today, or as sooner after as possible. So, not yet.

THE COURT: Okay. Well, I can tell you at this point the Court is inclined to exclude the testimony of William Briggs, Patrick Colbeck, Anthony Cox, Junior, Mark Finchem, Heather Honey, Sandy Juno, Jeffrey O'Donnell -- just a minute -- and Jeffrey O'Donnell, given the fact that those individuals were not identified in the pre-trial statement.

The Court is inclined to allow the testimony of Joseph Fried as a percipient witness, given the fact that Respondent did provide notice of Mr. Fried's testimony, although his testimony, I'm assuming, would not be the testimony that -- he was identified as an expert -- that, as a percipient, he would testify regarding the other -- well, matters about which a percipient witness could testify.

And then the Court would allow the testimony of Kurt Olsen as a percipient witness, based on the characterization of his percipient witness testimony on page 64 of the joint pre-trial statement.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So that is my tentative. The parties can inform the Court next week sometime with what you are -- where you end up, and then I will determine whether or not to go ahead and file this as a final order on motion in limine number six. Okay?

Any questions about that?

MR. MILLER: If it turns out that we can't reach any common ground in our meet-and-confer, your Honor, Respondent would like to be heard on that, and we're willing, obviously, to defer to the Court on scheduling, but I just want to make it clear that we'd like to be heard on that.

THE COURT: Okay. Well, given the fact that we will not -- the parties are not available again until August, and I would assume that these needs to be sorted our regarding these witnesses before that time frame. Would you like to be heard on that today after the -- after we finish with our next witness?

MR. MILLER: I haven't gotten back to it to be able to discuss it today. I think I was waiting for Mr. Carling and I to be able to meet and confer on that, expected -- I'm not sure what I expected, but I wanted to at least go through that process, and I'm certain that we'll have a fulsome discussion, but, if it works with the --

THE COURT: Okay. Well --

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: Go ahead. I'm sorry.

THE COURT: Well, also, I will expect to hear from the parties regarding -- before I file an order on motion in limine number six, I'll expect to hear from the parties, no later than June 7th.

MR. MILLER: July, your Honor?

THE COURT: I'm sorry. Well, yes, let's get in the right month.

MR. MILLER: We're leaving June.

THE COURT: Thank you. Yes, yes. I don't want to get stuck in June when everybody else is moving on to July. Right. July the 7th.

MR. MILLER: And one last detail on that, your Honor. I think one of the reasons why we deferred this yesterday is that Bar counsel didn't have an opportunity to file an opposition, and so perhaps that has to happen. I think the way I took it yesterday was give Bar counsel the opportunity to oppose it, and then we'll go from there.

THE COURT: I'm talking about motion in limine number six. A response was filed on that June 28th.

MR. MILLER: Okay. I mixed them up.

THE COURT: You're thinking about number seven?

MR. MILLER: I am.

THE COURT: Yes. Okay. Well, that's what I was saying. On number seven, the Office of Chief Trial Counsel will have until after the same day, July 7th, to file its opposition to motion in limine number seven, which is -- we're renumbering the one that Respondent characterized as one. Okay?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. CARLING: Your Honor, would it be possible for us to have July 10th, as the Court originally indicated? I'm taking Monday off.

THE COURT: Did I originally say the 10th?

MR. CARLING: You had said July 10th for our opposition.

THE COURT: Okay. Then I will leave it on the 10th. Sorry. I didn't write the 10th down.

MR. CARLING: Okay. Thank you.

THE COURT: So I had thought the 7th. All right. Okay. So that's motions in limine six and seven.

Also, the Court previously, yesterday, took under submission an issue that arose regarding Exhibit 305, and Exhibit 305 is the New York Supreme Court's Appellate Division, First Judicial Department, decision with regard to the matter of Rudy Giuliani, and let me just go back for a minute.

Mr. Carling, were you seeking the admission of Exhibit 305?

MR. CARLING: We were. We sought to move into evidence.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. And I recall that Mr. Miller objected to that. The Court would note that Exhibit 305 is a court document. However -- so, therefore, the Court would take judicial notice of that. However, the Giuliani decision does contain a great deal of hearsay. Under the State Bar Court Rule 5.104(d), I believe -- just let me confirm that -- yes. 5.104(d) provides that hearsay evidence may be used for the purpose of supplementing or explaining other evidence, but, over a timely object, will not be sufficient in opposition -- let me see what's going on here -- will not be sufficient in itself, excuse me, to support a finding unless it would be admissible over admission in civil actions.

And so the information contained in Exhibit 305 is hearsay. However, it is hearsay that is admissible with regard to the information found on pages 21, 22, and 23, which all address the issue that Doctor Eastman testified about previously, specifically regarding the Georgia video that, according to the allegations contained in one of the filings that he testified about, contained allegations of ballots being found in a suitcase or suitcases under a table in Georgia, and that being an example of illegal and/or irregular voting practices in Georgia.

So, therefore, Exhibit 305, pages 21 through 23, received into evidence.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: I --

THE COURT: And I'm not going to deny the motion, as in the request, as to the other pages, but, at this point, we do not have evidence that would support -- evidence that we cannot -- a finding has not been made regarding other evidence found in Exhibit 305. And if you're like to be heard on that, feel free to let me know that.

MR. MILLER: I would like to be heard on that. Yesterday I -- excuse me. Today, your Honor, I believe -- yesterday, when Bar counsel had asked to move 305 into evidence, we did make an objection, which resulted in the Court taking it under submission, and I appreciate that. I think the record is probably clear in terms of the objection, and the bases for objections. I think that it was hearsay.

The Exhibit 305 was hearsay, and also not relevant, and I think the further points that I made were that it's a different proceeding, with a party, in a different state, with different rules, different arguments, different evidence, a different disciplinary system, all of which would lead to, at least in my advocacy, that it would no bearing at all in any issue in this case. The fact that it bears a factual similarity to an allegation that was made there, to an allegation here, would not be reason to consider this.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Now, I'm prepared to argue, if the Court stands by its ruling that it should be given no weight, so I'll certainly reserve on that, but, as a foundational matter, the proceedings, or at least the portion of the proceedings that the Court has found have some bearing here, in my view, has no such bearing, no such relevance here. It's not res judicata. It's not collateral estoppel. It's not issue preclusion or resolution. And what I don't know, but I'll argue, just to preserve it -- I'm not even sure this is a final ruling.

So there is a review process in New York, as there is here, and the last I checked, this was in that process. So I think we need to exercise a lot of caution -- or, when I say "we," I mean the Court.

THE COURT: Well, the first cautionary measure that should be taken is for you to determine whether or not you really want to make that argument, that this document or this proceeding is final.

Either way, this document speaks for itself in terms of what is set forth there regarding the very narrow issue that it is being, at this point, admitted for, with regard to pages 21 to 23, regarding the testimony that Doctor Eastman gave yesterday. This would appear to supplement and/or explain his testimony about the allegations found in Exhibit 270, relating to the allegations about Fulton County election officials' activities with regard to suitcases under a table at the State Farm Arena, and the surveillance video in conjunction with that.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So it's not the disciplinary proceeding itself that is being -- is a subject of the underlying basis for the admission of those pages, but, rather, those pages relate to the video evidence from the security cameras, and, further, is offered to explain and/or supplement Doctor Eastman's testimony yesterday.

But I cut you off. Is there anything else you want to add for the record before --

MR. MILLER: No, your Honor. Thank you. I appreciate that clarification. I think my initial concern, and probably as well as yesterday, was that there was -- at least potentially, this was being offered to establish either culpability or some level of discipline based on the finding in New York. But your clarification helps me, your Honor, so thank you.

THE COURT: Right. That's not the basis for the admission of those pages.

MR. MILLER: I do understand that now, your Honor. Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. All right. Thank you.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And, Mr. Carling, do you have anything to address on that issue?

MR. CARLING: No

THE COURT: Okay. All right. So those are -- with regard to Exhibit 99, the Court also took Exhibit 99, a video transcript of a C-SPAN video of a news conference by a Georgia official. Let's see, here. I think it was Gabriel Sterling.

And so the Court took judicial notice of that document, which was appropriate in that it was not a video of a -- it was a video that broadcast an official public proceeding, which was that -- wait. Let me have a look. Let me find that. Okay. Which was the press conference of Gabriel Sterling on January 4, 2021. And so the Court is going to -- I already took judicial notice of that. I said I would revisit that, and I did, and it's appropriate. Okay?

Anything else before we go on to calling the next witness?

MR. CARLING: Just to clarify the Court's ruling just now, the Court was admitting Exhibit 99 into evidence, not just judicially noticing it but admitting it. Is that correct?

THE COURT: Judicially noticing and admitting 99 into evidence, yes.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. CARLING: Thank you.

THE COURT: And, again, 305 is admitted as to pages 21 through 23. Okay? All right.

Do have any other loose ends that we need to address before we call the next -- before the next witness is called?

MR. BECKERMAN: No, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: No, your Honor. Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. And I understand the next witness is Jonathan Brater --

MR. BECKERMAN: Yes, your Honor.

THE COURT: -- B-R-A-T-E-R?

MR. BECKERMAN: My apologies. Yes, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. Brater. Okay. Thank you.

Okay. Can you contact Mr. Brater? Is he --

MR. BECKERMAN: He's ready.

THE COURT: All right. Great.

THE CLERK: Good afternoon, Mr. Brater. Can you hear us and see us?

THE COURT: I don't think he can hear us or see us.

THE CLERK: Good afternoon, Mr. Brater. Can you hear us and see us?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. BRATER: Yes.

THE CLERK: Thank you. Okay, Judge. Would you like me to swear --

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Good afternoon, Mr. Brater. This is Judge Roland, and we appreciate you taking time out of your schedule today to participate in this proceeding.

You will first be sworn as a witness by Elizabeth Alvarez. After that, your direct examination will begin. It will be conducted, I assume, by Mr. Braverman (sic), and then, after he finishes with his direct examination, the cross-examination will take place, and Mr. Miller will conduct the cross-examination.

Right?

MR. MILLER: Yes, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. All right. And then the parties might go back and forth with some additional questions after that. Okay? Can you hear me?

THE WITNESS: Yes, I did. I understand, your Honor.

THE COURT: All right. I don't know. You sound a bit garbled. Are you close to a speaker?

THE WITNESS: Is that better, your Honor?

THE COURT: Much better. Thank you. Okay. All right. And if there's anything that you're unclear about, if you can't hear or, you know, see anyone, then make sure that you bring that to my attention, please. Okay?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE WITNESS: Understood.

THE COURT: All right. Okay. Mr. Braverman (sic).

THE CLERK: I need to swear him.

THE COURT: Sorry?

THE CLERK: I need to swear him in.

THE COURT: Yes, please.

THE CLERK: Okay. Mr. Brater, can you go ahead and raise your right hand.

JONATHAN BRATER - STATE BAR'S WITNESS - SWORN

THE CLERK: Thank you. Can you go ahead and state and spell both your first and last name for the record, please.

THE WITNESS: Yes. Jonathan, J-O-N-A-T-H-A-N, Brater, B-R-A-T-E-R.

THE CLERK: Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. And I apologize, Mr. Beckerman. I gave Mr. Beckerman a new last name. It's Mr. Beckerman who will be conducting your direct examination.

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you, your Honor. You weren't the first, you won't be the last. I appreciate that.

THE COURT: I hope I am. Go ahead.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

DIRECT EXAMINATION

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Good afternoon, Mr. Brater, or perhaps for you it's good evening?

A It is.

Q Could you tell us, what do you do for a living?

A I am the Director of the Michigan Bureau of Elections, which is part of the Michigan Department of State. In that capacity, I supervise the Bureau of Elections, which supports the Michigan Secretary of State, who's the chief election official for the state of Michigan, administering Michigan's election law and supervising local and county clerks in their duties under the election.

Q And when did you begin in that role?

A January 2020.

Q And what, if anything, drew you to that position?

A Well, I had long been interested in election, in governmental policy. So, previously to my role as Director of Elections, I had worked at the Michigan Department of the State, beginning in 2019, as the department's Legal Policy Director, and when the previous Director of Elections retired, I applied for the position and was hired.

Q Mr. Brater, I'm going to turn now to the 2020 general election conducted in Michigan. Could you tell us how, if at all, that was impacted by the COVID pandemic?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Certainly. Well, in the first instance, because of the nature of elections, which ordinarily involve a lot of people in a confined space for an extended period of time, both on election day, when voting, but also in clerk's offices, when clerks are working in close quarters, when voters are coming in to register to vote, to apply for absentee ballots in Michigan, and many other functions, all of those things became much more difficult to do safely because of the pandemic, and so the primary impact in terms of the way people voted was that it shifted the need to have a much higher percentage of people voting by what we call in Michigan "absentee ballots," but which are generally vote-by-mail ballots.

So the biggest it had from an election administration standpoint was that the Bureau of Elections, in addition to municipal clerks and county clerks in Michigan, had to prepare for a much larger number of absentee ballots. That also included having the necessary tabulators, voting equipment to process those ballots. It involved making sure that there were enough election inspectors, which are what we call "poll workers," to process those ballots, and it also involved educating voters in the process of voting by mail.

Additionally, another major impact was the need to put in place protocols to ensure that, when people did need to be in person with each other, that they could do so in a safe manner. So that meant changing, sometimes, the layout of a typical polling place, when possible, making sure that social distancing was followed, including personal protective equipment whenever possible, such as masks or face shields or plexiglass dividers and hand sanitizer.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

It also impacted elections with regard to the supply chain, so it made much more difficult for election officials to order supplies, including voting equipment, paper. It affected the Postal Service with regard to the way election mail moved around. So, in general, you know, overall, it required much more voting to be done by mail, and also a lot of security and safety procedures to be put in place that ordinarily would not be necessary when it came to in-person election activities.

Q As part of your work in election administration, are you in contact with county election officials in Michigan?

A Yes.

Q And why is that?

A Well, in Michigan, elections are run in a decentralized manner. So the Secretary of State is the chief election official, but the actual administration of elections is done, in fact, primarily by city and township clerks.

In Michigan, there are 1,520 different cities and townships, which are the election jurisdictions in Michigan, and those clerks, which we interact with frequently, are primarily responsible for setting up polling places, setting up tabulators, retaining election records after election day, but also, in Michigan, county clerks play important roles in the election process.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So we have 83 counties, and the county clerks also have important responsibilities such as ordering ballots, procuring voting equipment, and supporting the county canvass which is done after each election.

Q So you just mentioned a county canvass. Is that one of the safeguards in place to secure an accurate election in Michigan?

A Yes.

Q So I'd like to get into those safeguards. Perhaps it would be easiest to divide them into pre-election and post. Are there pre-election safeguards in Michigan that were in place during the 2020 general election?

A Yes.

Q Could you please describe those for us?

A Certainly. There's a number of safeguards that apply both to verifying the identity and eligibility of voters, and also to the equipment and materials that are used on election day. So, in Michigan, before voting, you have to register to vote. That requires you to provide information about your identity and residency, including a signature, which is used to establish your voter registration record.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

When you go to vote, if you vote in person, your registration is available to the election inspectors on an electronic poll book that has your name and registration on it, and you must also complete a paper application to vote before being issued a ballot.

If you are voting absentee or by mail, you first have to apply for an absentee ballot, and the absentee ballot is not issued to you unless the signature on your absentee ballot application matches your voter file signature that the clerk has, and then, again, when you return your actual absentee ballot, that ballot is not accepted for tabulation unless the signature on the absent voter ballot envelope matches the signature on file.

When it comes to equipment and materials, firstly, before any voting equipment can be used in Michigan, it has to be certified by the Board of State Canvassers. That is a bipartisan board composed of two Democrats and two Republicans. It is independent of the Secretary of State. It does not report to the Secretary of State.

The Bureau of Elections provides administrative support to that entity, but that entity must certify voting equipment before it can be used, and before doing so, equipment is subject to review and testing by the Bureau of Elections, after it has been reviewed by an accredited voting system test laboratory, which has to be accredited by the National Institute of Standards and Technology, along with the Election Assistance Commission. So that governs the way that equipment has to be certified for use.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Additionally, before each election, prior to being used in polling places, tabulators have to first undergo what we call "logic and accuracy testing," which is essentially ensuring that they are tabulating the paper ballots as expected. In Michigan, everyone votes using a hand-marked paper ballots. Voters with disabilities and others can also use a ballot-marking device that can produce a paper ballot, but that paper ballot is also put into a tabulator.

So there are generally two stages of testing. There's a preliminary test that is done when the ballots are printed, and then there is another public accuracy testing, which anyone can attend, which is done to verify that the ballots are being tabulated correctly. So, before election day begins, all of that testing has to occur. So those are generally the safeguards that apply to both the voters and the voting equipment that's used before election day.

Q Are the results of the testing you just described that occurs pre-election -- are those made public?

A Yes.

Q And pertains to the 2020 general election, approximately when were those results made public for the various tests you described?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Well, they're made public, essentially, in real time, is my understanding, as soon as the test is completed, which, again, is a public meeting. Those materials are available. They also have to be retained after the election, so they can be reviewed by anyone by submitting a Freedom of Information Act request. They're also reviewed when the Bureau of Elections and county clerks conduct post-election audits.
Q You mentioned certification of the voting equipment. Could you tell us, what is the purpose of such certification?
A It's essentially to ensure that the equipment meets the standards required for use in Michigan. Certification in Michigan I don't think is particularly different from the processes used in other states or at the federal level by the Election Assistance Commission, but, essentially, it requires extensive review by a voting system test laboratory, which is comprised of, really, the biggest experts when it comes to the way voting equipment works.
They thoroughly test all the elements of the voting system to make sure that it performs as expected. The Bureau of Elections then conducts its own testing and review, and prepared a report for the Board of State Canvassers, and they certify it only if they believe that it is appropriate for use in Michigan, based on a thorough review of all the components.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q You mentioned the Board of State Canvassers. Who are they? What is that entity?

A It is a four-person body. It is composed of two Democrats and two Republicans, and they serve various functions in Michigan. They are independent of the Secretary of State. They do not work for or report to her. They are an independent body, and they serve various functions including certifying election results, determining whether there have been sufficient numbers of ballot signatures on nominating petitions for candidates, as well as initiate petitions for ballot initiatives, and then, as I noted, they also certify voting equipment.

Q Are there any other pre-election safeguards that were in place in Michigan for the 2020 general election?

A I believe I've described, generally, the processes in place as regards voting, registration to vote, identifying voters before they're issued ballots, and then the certification of voting equipment. So those are generally safeguards that are in place.

Q So, then, what, if any --

A I guess one more --

Q My apologies.

A -- one more (indiscernible) is that there are also paper backups for materials that are used. So I had noted previously that election officials use an election poll book on election day to verity voters when they come in to cast ballots, that they're registered to vote.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

That is a program that's developed by the Michigan Bureau of Elections, and it is displayed on a laptop computer that's used at polling places. That laptop computer is not connected to the Internet, and, also, there are paper backups of the electronic poll book so that clerks can use -- or the election inspectors --

THE COURT: I'm sorry, Mr. Brater. Are you saying paperback -- or what is the --

THE WITNESS: I'm sorry. I'll slow down.

THE COURT: Is that an acronym you're using?

THE WITNESS: I'm sorry, your Honor. Electronic poll books. I didn't understand.

THE COURT: Electronic -- what was the word you said after that?

THE WITNESS: I'm sorry. I will try to slow down, your Honor. In addition to the electronic poll book tool that is used at polling places by election inspectors, who are our poll workers in Michigan, there is also paper backup of that poll book, so that, in the event that the electronic tool is not working properly, the election inspectors, the poll workers have a paper list that they can use to verify that voters are registered when they come in to cast ballots.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Beckerman.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Now that we've discussed the pre-election safeguards in place, can you tell us what, if any, safeguards were in place in Michigan to ensure a secure and accurate election result?

A Certainly. Well, that begins on election night, so, at the conclusion of election night, after all ballots have been tabulated, first a bipartisan set of election inspectors has to close out the polling place. They have to seal all paper ballots in containers, ballot containers that are sealed with tamper-evident seals. The seal number is recorded, and that ensures the security of the ballots for other post-election processes.

All the materials, including copies of the poll book materials, are then delivered to a receiving board, which retains the materials, as well as copies that are sent to the County Clerk, which holds them for the county canvass. So, firstly, you know, of course, the ballots themselves are secured, along with the other materials that are used on election day, including the poll book.

Following that process, there is then a county canvass. Each of the 83 counties conducts a canvass of all the election -- unofficial election returns in their county, and verifies that the returns are accurate. They do that first by verifying that the paper printouts of the tabulators that show the counts of the ballots cast match the unofficial electronic results that have been recorded. If there any apparently tabulation errors, the county boards of canvassers then -- you know, they have the ability to re-tabulate is there is some kind of error.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

They can also bring in the municipal officials and clerks and materials as needed to review any discrepancies, and they also verify and balance out the precincts at the municipal level to ensure that either the number of ballots tabulated matches the number of names in the poll book, or, if they do not, the explanation for why those numbers are different, like, for example, somebody being issued a ballot but then walking out of the polling place without tabulating it.

So only after that process is complete do the bipartisan county canvassers certify at the county level each result, and, again, like the Board of State Canvassers, each county board of canvassers -- and there are 83 of them -- is composed of two Democrats and two Republicans. Following the county canvass, then the results go to the Board of State Canvassers. As I noted, that is a bipartisan body of two Democrats and two Republicans.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Board of State Canvassers then reviews the materials that have been submitted by each of the 83 county canvassers and verify their accuracy. Only after Bureau of Elections staff have reviewed those materials and presented them to the board does the Board of State Canvassers then certify those results. Following the certification --

THE COURT: Just a minute, Mr. Brater. Roughly, what's the period of time between when the -- or at least in connection with the 2020 election results -- in the time frame between when the county canvasser results went to the state canvassers?

THE WITNESS: The county canvasses are completed 14 days after the election, and the Board of State Canvassers convenes 20 days after the election.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

THE WITNESS: So, following the certification at the state level by the Board of State Canvassers, candidates then have the opportunity, if they so choose, to request a re-count. So, if any candidate believes that the results are not accurate, for example, if a candidate believes that the ballots were not tabulated correctly by tabulators, they have the opportunity to request a re-count, and they can request a re-count statewide, if they're a statewide candidate. They can request a re-count of certain specified precincts, and, if they do, that re-count is conducted by a hand-count of paper ballots. So a bipartisan group of volunteers working under supervision of county clerks and, in the case of a statewide result, the Board of State Canvassers, will then hand-review those paper ballots to verify that they're accurate.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Following the re-count, or if no re-count is requested, the election results are then final. In the case of a presidential election, there's then the Electoral College, and then, following all of that, there are post-election audits that are conducted. I mentioned those previously, but that involves primarily county clerks, but also the Board of State Canvassers and the Bureau of Elections, reviewing precincts across the state to verify that the tabulators counted ballots accurately, once again, and also ensuring that all of the required documentation was created and retained.

In the case of a presidential election or statewide elections, Michigan recently began implementing risk-limiting audits, which also involve a statewide random sample of ballots to again verify that the results of the election were correct.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q You mentioned that the Board of State Canvassers is tasked with the certification of the results. Did the Board of State Canvassers in Michigan certify the results of the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2020 general election in Michigan?
A Yes.
Q You mentioned that candidates can request a re-count. Did that occur in the 2020 general election in Michigan?
A No candidate for statewide office requested a re-count.
Q What about for President?
A No.
Q Okay. And then you mentioned the two types of post-election auditing. What was the result of those audits conducted as pertaining to the 2020 general election in Michigan?
A Well, as pertains to the precinct-level audits, both county clerks and the Bureau of Elections determines that procedures were widely followed. You know, it's never the case that every single jurisdiction does everything perfectly, but, by and large, procedures were followed, and records were retained as necessary. When it came to the ballot audits, those audits showed on every case that the voting equipment correctly tabulated ballots.
Q After the Board of State Canvassers certified the results, did the Secretary of State or any other executive in Michigan further certify the election results pertaining to the 2020 general election?
THE COURT: I'm sorry. Just a minute. Could you repeat the question?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. BECKERMAN: Yes.

THE COURT: After the --

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q After the State Board of Canvassers' certification -- sorry, there was a bit of feedback -- did the Department of State or any other executive further certify the election results in Michigan?

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

THE WITNESS: Well, in the case of a presidential election, the electors meet to determine how Michigan's electoral votes will be determined. So that process involves the signing of certificates by the electors as well as other state officials. I believe, if I'm not mistaken, the Secretary of State and the Governor sign those.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q And after those results were certified, did your department receive any pressure to decertify the results?

A There were various entities and individuals that made claims that the election should not be certified or should be decertified. I would note there is not a provision, at least not that I'm aware of, in Michigan election law to decertify a presidential election results, but we received various claims to that effect.

Q And did any of those claims came from a state legislature, as a body?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A No.
Q I'd like to turn your attention now to Exhibit 112. Mr. Brater, can you see Exhibit 112?
A Yes.
Q And have you seen this document before?
A Yes.
Q And could you tell us what it is?
A This a report that summarizes the audits that were conducted in the November 2020 general election. It describes the precinct procedural audits and their outcomes. It also describes the statewide risk-limiting audit exercise that I described to you involving randomly selecting ballots statewide, reviewing them, and again confirming that the random sample of paper ballots matched the results of the statewide race for president.

In the case of the 2020 election, there were also some additional audits that were conducted, really more than any previous election, including a review of absent voter counting boards in four cities to determine why, in some cases, those precincts were out of balance as of election night between the number of names and the number of ballots. In most cases, we determined that they could be resolved with more time.

And then, finally, this report also includes description of a full hand-count that was conducted in

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Antrim County, and confirming that the ballots tabulated. The ballots were tabulated correctly the tabulators in that county.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. Which county was that?

THE WITNESS: Antrim County.

THE COURT: Antrim County. Okay. Thank you.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q I'd like to direct your attention to page three of Exhibit 112, looking at the -- towards the end of the second paragraph there. There's a part at the end of the second paragraph that reads:

"Unofficial results reporting errors were not new to 2020, but received substantial attention when they were amplified to support other false claims about election results."

Do you see that, Mr. Brater?

A Yes.

Q Could you explain to us what that means?

A Sure. Well, as I noted, the official election results are determined by boards of county canvassers in a process that can take up to two weeks, and so election results are not official at the county level for up to two weeks after the election, and they're not official at the state level until the Board of State Canvassers certifies them 20 days later.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

However, of course, people want to know who appeared to win the election, so Michigan, like other states, makes unofficial results available as soon as possible on election night, and that way that is done is using technology to electronic transmit, from the cards that are used to program the tabulators on election night, the unofficial results, which are then quickly added to on-line resources like county web sites so that, you know, members of the public, members of the press can see who appeared to win the election. Most people tend to just view these as the election results, but they're technically unofficial until the canvass process and the other processes I described are complete.

It is often the case that, with 1,520 municipal jurisdictions and thousands of precincts, that, from time to time, there will be some errors made in producing the unofficial results. That can happen for a variety of reasons.

For example, a clerk may accidentally upload a card twice to the unofficial reporting software, which could result in, you know, doubling those returns for the unofficial results. It can sometimes happen that they will fail to upload a card, which can result in zeros when there actually, of course, were votes cast.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

There was one particularly notable one in Antrim County, however, which occurred because, in that case, the County Clerk had failed to update all of the cards used in tabulators after programming change was made, and when that occurred, the unofficial results displayed inaccurate results for elections in the county, including the presidential, and in Antrim County, which I mentioned earlier, on election day, all of the tabulators correctly tabulated the paper ballots in the presidential.

So the actual tapes that came out of the tabulators showed the correct results in the presidential election, and that was later confirmed also to be accurate by a hand-count of the paper ballots. However, when it came to the unofficial electronic results, those were initially erroneous, because of the human error in not updating all the program cards to match the election programming.

So, you know, although, you know, as noted here, results of this type are not, you know, unheard of, when it comes to a statewide election that's administered by thousands of individuals, in this case, there were individuals who amplified this to suggest that it somehow was indicative of fraud, or some sort of conspiracy, or claiming that this meant somehow that the voting equipment could not be trusted, when, in fact, the explanation for why the unofficial results were inaccurate was known very quickly, and was explained multiple times, and confirmed through numerous reports and audits, including, again, a complete hand-count of all the paper ballots in Antrim County.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And what type of voting equipment was used in Antrim County for the 2020 general election?

A Antrim County used Dominion Voting Systems equipment.

Q Okay. And those systems were certified in Michigan?

A Yes.

Q I'd like to direct your attention to page four of Exhibit 112. We'll be looking towards the top. At the top here, it reads, "Post-election audits of the 2020 general election were the most extensive in Michigan's history." In what way, Mr. Brater, were the post-election audits the most extensive in the state's history?

A Well, the precinct procedure audits that are listed there are the same audits that were done in prior elections, but the next two categories had never been done before in statewide elections in Michigan.

So we reviewed -- we conducted a full review of absent voter counting boards, which are the special precincts that are used to count absentee ballots in some jurisdictions, in four of the largest municipal jurisdictions in Michigan, specifically, Detroit, Livonia, Grand Rapids, and Sterling Heights, which are four of the largest cities in Michigan.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

That had never been done before, so, in this case, we scrutinized and reviewed the process of checking in and tabulating absentee ballots in a way that had never been done before.

Additionally, risk-limiting audits had never been done for a statewide election in Michigan. This is the first time we had conducted an exercise in which we randomly selected thousands of ballots from more than a thousand local jurisdictions to verify that, from that poll of random ballots, the results matched the tabulated results for the presidential election. That had also never been done before.

And then, finally, we also conducted a full hand-count audit in Antrim County, as I had mentioned earlier. That had also never been done before. There of course had been re-counts, which are similar to a hand-count audit, but a whole county had never been audited in the way that we did Antrim County for the 2020 election.

MR. BECKERMAN: Your Honor, may Exhibit 112 be admitted into evidence?

THE COURT: Any objection?

MR. MILLER: No objection.

THE COURT: Exhibit 112 is received into evidence.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q I'd like to turn now to Exhibit 113. Mr. Brater, can you see Exhibit 113 on your screen?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes.
Q And have you seen this document before?
A Yes.
Q And have you reviewed this document prior to today?
A Yes.
Q Could you tell us what it is?
A The Office of the Auditor General is an entity that is part of the Michigan State Legislature, and it conducts performance audits of state agencies in Michigan, including the Bureau of Elections. So this was a performance audit that was conducted over the course of mostly 2021, reviewing various functions that the Bureau of Elections is responsible for performing.

In this case, the Office of the Auditor General is reviewing the Bureau of Elections maintenance of the state-qualified voter file, which is the statewide voter registration system, along with the training of election officials and the supervision of post-election audits. Those are the primary subjects of this audit.
Q And are you aware of the conclusions reached in this audit?
A Yes.
Q I'd like to direct your attention now to page 11. The first bullet point reads:

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"99.1 percent of registered electors information in QVF accurately reflected data contained in the SOS driver's license file, DLF, for electors with an active driver's license or state identification."

First, do you know the meaning of those acronyms?

A Yes.

Q Could you tell us what a QVF is?

A Yes. "QVF" is the acronym that is used for the qualified voter file, which is our statewide voter registration database.

Q And who maintains that?

A The Bureau of Elections.

Q And is "SOS" an acronym for Secretary of State?

A Yes.

Q And do you agree with that conclusion?

A Yes.

Q Moving now to the second bullet point, which reads:

"99.99 percent of the electors who cast votes during our audit period were within acceptable age parameters. We followed up on the 13 individuals with recorded ages under 18 who cast votes, and noted election officials manually added 12 to the electric poll book on the day of the elector, and one had an inaccurate birth date in the QVF. We also noted one additional individual with a recorded age over 122, whose birth date was not verified or updated as of the date the individual cast a vote. These 14 instances occurred in 10 different counties."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Do you agree with that conclusion?

A Yes, although I would clarify that. The fact that an individual in the qualified voter file has a recorded age over 122 does not mean that that individual is actually over 122 years old. It could be the case that they had a placeholder birth date, which I think is likely the explanation here, because this report came out in 2022, and the placeholder birth date usually used is January 1st, 1900, which would be 122 years prior to that. So, with that clarification, I do agree with this conclusion.

Q Understood. Moving on to the third bullet point, which reads:

"99.99 percent of votes cast during our audit period were not identified as a duplicate vote. Since the prior audit, BOE developed a process to review potentially duplicate votes using the QVF voter history."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Skipping down a few lines within that bullet point: "BOE further reviewed the remaining 150 records, and resolved 109 of them at the time of our review, and referred 41 for further investigation to either the Secretary of State's Office of Investigative Services or the Department of Attorney General."

Do you agree with that conclusion?

A Yes.

MR. BECKERMAN: Your Honor, may Exhibit 113 be admitted?

THE COURT: Any objection?

MR. MILLER: No objection, your Honor.

THE COURT: Exhibit 113 is received into evidence.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q I'd like to move on now to Exhibit 169. Mr. Brater, can you see Exhibit 169 on your screen?

A Yes.

Q Have you seen this document before? And if it's helpful, we can scroll through a bit.

A Yes.

Q What is this document?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A This is an affidavit that I submitted in the Dominion lawsuit. I believe the defendant was Fox News in this case.

Q And I'd like to now move down to page eight, and if we could scroll down, actually, to page nine. Mr. Brater, do you see what we've just scrolled through, pages eight through 10?

A Yes.

Q Could you tell us what we're looking at here?

A This is a declaration that I submitted in the matter, I believe, of King v. Whitmer.

Q And if we could -- just a moment. If we could look at page 16, and I'm going to direct your attention to paragraph 17, which addresses claims of Mr. Ramsland. Who is Mr. Ramsland?

A Mr. Ramsland is an individual who submitted a report in support of claims that were made, I believe, in possibly multiple litigation matters, but, in this case, it was King v. Whitmer, and the materials he submitted contained a number of factual errors.

Q Paragraph 17 reads?

"Mr. Ramsland's claims, cited by plaintiffs, demonstrate a fundamental lack of understanding of basic facts about Michigan's election system. He includes in his claims two counties,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Macomb and Oakland, that do not use Dominion Voting Systems."

Could you explain what you mean by "fundamental lack of understanding"?

A Well, in this case, Mr. Ramsland was claiming that these two counties, and records from those counties, somehow supported a theory that Dominion Voting Systems equipment was not functioning properly or was not reliable. In fact, these two counties, Macomb County and Oakland County, those are the second- and third-largest counties in the state of Michigan, aside from Wayne. They use different equipment.

So Macomb County uses ES and S, Elections Systems and Software equipment, whereas Oakland County uses Hart InterCivic equipment, and so I believe what this is referring to is, in his report, he was using results from those counties to support an argument that Dominion Voting Systems equipment was not working properly, when, in fact, those counties don't even use that equipment.

Q So is it fair to say you've reviewed the claims of Mr. Ramsland?

A Yes.

Q Do you find them credible?

A No.

Q Why?

A Well, there are, as noted here, just some very basic errors about election administration in Michigan. It appears to me that it was a series of statements thrown together to try to justify a conclusion that was not supported by evidence, that there had been some kind of massive fraud in Michigan, which there was not.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I think number 18 is a good example of that. He claimed that it was suspicious that a large number of votes were reported at the same time for unofficial result reporting, so he thought it was suspicious that thousands of votes had been recorded simultaneous by jurisdictions because, in his view, it would have impossible for thousands of people to put their ballots through tabulators at the same time, but that's not what's happening when results are recorded, unofficial or otherwise.

What's happening is the ballots that have been tabulated all throughout the day, since the polls open at 7:00 a.m., or since jurisdictions start counting absentee ballots at 7:00 a.m., those ballots are being put into tabulators all day, but the results are not going, like, one vote at a time to the unofficial result reporting software. In fact, they are not reported until the election is closed out, and that's when the entire file, with the results, unofficial in this case, of all the ballots that were tabulated go to the county for the unofficial result reporting.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So this is just such a fundamental misunderstanding of the basics of election administration, frankly, and I think other states as well, not just Michigan, but I think it's indicative of the level of seriousness with which these individuals are trying to support their claims that the election in Michigan was somehow fraudulent or stolen.

THE COURT: Just to be clear, Mr. Brater, it's your testimony that these claims, the claims you're referring to, reflect a fundamental misunderstanding of what?

THE WITNESS: Of the practices that are used to conduct elections in Michigan.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q I'd like to draw your attention now to page 17 of Exhibit 169, paragraph 19. Just a moment. I'm summarizing now, but paragraph 19 indicates a lack of proof that large numbers of ballots were illegally counted in Detroit. Can you explain the basis of that?

A Certainly. There were various claims made by the plaintiffs in this case and others that, in Detroit, there were somehow large numbers, thousands of ballots, that were not real ballots, or ballots that had not been submitted by real voters, that were being counted. There were various claims, such as, like, truckloads of ballots being brought in that didn't correspond to voters, or ballots that were being run through tabulators multiple times.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I think, in some cases, these stemmed just misunderstanding of what people were looking at, not understanding those practices. For example, a lot of these claims originated at the absent voter counting board location in Detroit, where all the absentee ballots are tabulated.

So, for example, some individuals saw absentee ballots that were being brought in late at night or early in the morning Because those absentee ballots had been delivered by voters to the City Clerk's Office by 8:00 p.m. on election night, and they thought that that was suspicious, but that's actually the normal practice. When ballots come in, they first have to be checked in by the clerk, and then brought over.

I think some individuals were also confused when they saw blank ballots that were being brought in to the counting center. The reason for those is that when, for example, ballots for members of the military come in, they come in in a different format, and they often need to be duplicated, by a bipartisan team of election inspectors, onto another ballot, so that they can be put through tabulators. So that's done to make sure that members of our military and others overseas are able to vote. So, again, I think individuals didn't understand what they were looking at, and thought that that was evidence of fraud.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And then, finally, you know, another example I mentioned was ballots going through tabulators multiple times. In reality, sometimes, when you're using high-speed scanners, which are the types of tabulating equipment that is used at absent voter counting boards, you might put through a batch of ballots, for example, 50 ballots, and the scanner may reject that. It may be an invalid scan.

So, when that happens, the tabulator doesn't accept those results, and you take the batch again and scan it through until it accepts the results. So these ballots aren't being counted multiple times, but they be put through the scanner multiple times to ensure they can be reported.

So there were various, you know, sort of other even more baseless claims that were being made about Detroit, but the explanation here just indicates why there's really no way any of these claims could have been remotely accurate or remotely close to the scale of any kind of illegal voting that could have occurred. So, for example --

THE COURT: I'm sorry. I missed what you said. There is no way -- what was your last sentence?

THE WITNESS: There's no way that these claims could have actually been any kind of reliable estimate of any kind of illegal voting that could have occurred in

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Detroit, and the reason for that is that, in fact, there were not an unusually large number of ballots that were counted or tabulated in Detroit compare to the rest of the state. In fact, it was somewhat lower.

From 2016 to 2020, turnout in Detroit went up by about four percent, so turnout increased slightly, but that was actually a lot lower than statewide. Statewide, our turnout in Michigan was 15 percent higher. So, again, that was true of many states across the country. There was very high --

THE COURT: Wait. Fifteen percent higher than what?

THE WITNESS: Than 2016.

THE COURT: Okay.

THE WITNESS: So that was consistent with a lot of states, where turnout in 2020 was very high, but the point here is that these allegations that somehow there were, you know, heaps of illegal ballots and an unusual number of ballots getting counted in Detroit aren't supported by this data, which actually shows that the number of ballots in Detroit were relatively low compared to the state as a whole.

Another thing that is notable here is that former President Trump actually got a higher percentage of votes in Detroit in 2020 than he did in 2016. Detroit is obviously, as these numbers show, a very heavily Democratic city, but, in 2016, Mr. Trump got only about three percent of votes in Detroit, where, in 2020, he actually got five percent of votes in Detroit. So this theory that ballots in Detroit were somehow being used to rig the election against Mr. Trump are again not supported by the fact that he actually did better there than he did in 2016.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And then, finally, the suggestions that the ballots that were being tabulated at the TCF Center, which was the location of the absent voter counting board, were somehow not corresponding to real voters, is also not supported by this data, because, in fact, at the Detroit absent voter counting board, just like at every other counting board, the election officials have a list of voters who have submitted absentee ballots that they compare to the total number of ballots that were tabulated.

In this case, it was about 174,000 absentee ballots for Detroit, and, in fact, the number of names on the poll books was quite similar to the number of ballots tabulated. It didn't match exactly because there are sometimes small errors in checking in voters and things like that, but, in fact, the number of ballots tabulated actually was slightly lower than the number of names of voters who had submitted absentee ballots. So, again, if there had been some sort of massive fraud involving fake ballots that didn't correspond to real voters, the number of ballots would have, in fact, been much higher than the number of voters, rather than slightly lower.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So these are some examples of why these claims can be easily disproven just by looking at the election data from Detroit.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Mr. Brater, you mentioned in the context of claims of double counting or ballots that a batch could be rejected by a tabulating machine such that a batch would have to be re-scanned. Could you explain for us what might lead to a batch being rejected by the machine?

A Sure. I mean, these are -- so what are used at large absent voter counting boards are called "high-speed scanner," or sometimes they're called "high-speed tabulators." In the case of Dominion, it's equipment called ImageCast Central, which is used, again, for absentee ballots, as opposed to the ImageCast Precinct, which is used primarily in in-person voting locations.

So, at an in-person voting location, the voter will go up one at a time. Each voter will go up and put their ballot into the tabulator, and the ballot (sic) will either accept or reject that ballot. You know, if they reject it, the voter might have to put it back in, or it might be telling the voter that they had, you know, over-voted a race, voted for too many candidates, or something like that, but then the voter eventually puts their ballot in and moves on.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

High-speed scanners are designed for use with absentee ballots because, in this case, there's a large number of ballots that need to be counted in a short period of time, and the ballots aren't being put in there by the voter, because they're absentee ballots. So, instead, they're being put in by an election worker, and so, typically, the way these -- the way this (indiscernible) works is it's essentially a scanner, which is attached to a computer that has the programming and the election management software on it.

So the ballots are put on in a stack into the scanner. You then hit, basically you know, "Scan," or whatever the term is on the software, and the scanner will then attempt to scan through all the ballots in the stack, but, just like any other sort of scanning operation, there's all sorts of reasons why it may reject a scan. There could be two ballots that get stuck together, or something gets folded over. Whatever it might be, when you get to the end or halfway through the scanning of a stack of ballots, the machine may tell you, "This batch was not scanned properly."

When that happens, the tabulation equipment is not actually counting those ballots yet. It doesn't count them until all the ballots are scanned through and you click "Accept" for that batch. So, if there is a problem, and you have to re-scan them, you just take the stack out and, you know, you might try to figure out why it didn't go through, if there was a, you know, corner folded over or something, and then you would scan it through again, and then, when it ultimately accepts the batch, only then do you hit "Accept."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So, you know, an individual who is unfamiliar with the way this works might see an election worker taking the same batch of ballots and scanning them through multiple times, but that's, in fact, a totally ordinary process, and each ballot is actually only counted once.

Q Now, Mr. Brater, we've been discussing your affidavit from the King v. Whitmer case. Did you attach exhibits with that affidavit?

A I don't remember.

Q Well, let's look at page 65.

A Okay.

Q Mr. Brater, do you recognize what we're looking at on the screen, page 65 of Exhibit 169?

A Yes.

Q And what is this?

A This is a report that was completed by the Michigan State Senate Oversight Committee. The Senate Oversight Committee conducted a series of hearings regarding the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

November 2020 election, and at the conclusion of that process, they issued this report.

Q And have you reviewed this report prior to today?

A Yes.

Q Okay. I'd like to turn your attention to page 67.

THE COURT: Sixty-seven?

MR. BECKERMAN: Yes, your Honor, and we're going to look at the fifth paragraph there, which states:

"This Committee found no evidence of widespread or systematic fraud in Michigan's prosecution of the 2020 election."

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Do you see that, Mr. Brater?

A Yes.

Q And do you agree with that statement?

A Yes.

Q I'm going to turn now to page 69, the top paragraph, which states:

"Extraordinary claims require extraordinary proof, and claiming to find something extraordinary requires first eliminating the ordinary. Also, sources must lose credibility when it is shown they promote falsehoods, even more when they never take accountability for those falsehoods."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Do you see that there?

A Yes.

Q And that's a statement from Senator Edward McBroom. Do you know -- can you tell us, who is Senator Edward McBroom?

A Yes. He's a senator. He's in the Michigan State Senate. At this -- he represents the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. It's a largely rural area. He is a member of the Republican Party, and at this time, he was the chair of the Senate Oversight Committee. He is still in the State Senate now, but is no longer the chair of that committee because, at this time, the Michigan State Senate is now controlled by the Democrat party.

Q I'd like to turn your attention to page 99. Again, we're going to be looking at the top paragraph under "Conclusion," which reads:

"The Committee can confidently assert that it has been through" -- sorry -- "that it has been thorough in examination of numerous allegations of unlawful actions, improper procedures, fraud, vote theft, or any other description which would cause citizens to doubt the integrity of Michigan's

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2020 election results. Our clear finding is that citizens should be confident the results represent the true results of the ballots cast by the people of Michigan."

Do you agree with that conclusion?

A Yes.

Q I'd like to turn now to page 121 of Exhibit 169. Can you see this document which is at page 121, Mr. Brater?

A Yes.

Q Have you reviewed this document before?

A Yes.

Q Could you tell us what it is?

A Certainly. Well, this was -- as I noted earlier when I was talking about the unofficial election night result errors, and the way that they were amplified and used to make false claims about elections, this is describing, basically, what occurred in Antrim County, so it's a document that the Department of State put out after the Bureau of Elections had discussed this issue both with the Antrim County Clerk as well as Dominion Voting Systems and ElectionSource, which is another company that helps clerks use Dominion Voting Systems.

After we conducted those discussions, we determined, basically, the source of the issue, which is that the county had not properly updated all the cards that were used to program the tabulators in the county, so that, even though the presidential election results were actually accurately tabulated by the tabulators, and even though the tapes that came out of the tabulators correctly indicated the results from those tabulators in Antrim County, the unofficial results were incorrect, temporarily, because of that programming error. So this was a basic explanation of what occurred in Antrim County.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. BECKERMAN: Your Honor, may Exhibit 169 be admitted into evidence?

THE COURT: Any objection?

MR. MILLER: There is an objection, your Honor. It lacks foundation. 169 is an amalgam of a number of different documents, none of which Mr. Brater has been questioned about, and, therefore, there is no foundation. The only exception would be on pages 121 and 122, which is the one document that Mr. Brater had the foundation the testify about, or personal knowledge to testify about the foundation.

MR. BECKERMAN: May I be heard, your Honor?

THE COURT: Yes.

MR. BECKERMAN: Your Honor, this exhibit has been judicially noticed as part of the court filing.

THE COURT: Okay. But I understand that Mr.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Miller is objecting on the grounds of lacks foundation. I assume that's with regard to -- that's a challenge as to Mr. Brater's knowledge about this document --

MR. MILLER: Yes, essentially.

THE COURT: -- or the contents of the --

MR. MILLER: I mean, there's no witness that's been able to lay the foundation for this, except for those two pages that identify --

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Beckerman?

MR. BECKERMAN: Your Honor, my understanding is that the purpose of the request for judicial notice was to establish that these documents are all part of the court filing, and to establish the authenticity and foundation for these documents. I can further represent to the Court that the first declaration in Exhibit 169 is from Mr. Brater laying out his knowledge of the various attached exhibits. Our position is that wouldn't even be necessary, to lay the authentication and foundation, given the judicial notice of this court filing.

THE COURT: Well, I think the objection goes to whether or not Mr. Brater has knowledge of the information contained in the document, and/or drafted, reviewed, played a role in connection with the information there, played a role in connection with generating any of the information there.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. BECKERMAN: And, your Honor, if I may, each of the subsequent documents after the affidavits are official government records. Again, a foundation has been laid. They have been authenticated, both on the face of them -- there's indicia of reliability -- as well as through the information provided in our request for judicial notice.

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Brater, have you seen this document before?

THE WITNESS: Your Honor, are you referring to the entirety of Exhibit 169 or just these --

THE COURT: Yes, I am.

THE WITNESS: I believe that I have, yes.

THE COURT: Okay. And did you play a role in connection with the preparation of any aspect of Exhibit 169?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: Okay. The objection is overruled.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Mr. Brater, I'd like to discuss with you now some claims of fraud or illegality made pertaining to Michigan's administration of the 2020 general election. Have you heard the claim that the Secretary of State in Michigan sent out ballots to all registered voters, contrary to state law, in the 2020 general election?

A Yes.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And could you tell us your thoughts on that claim?
A It's inaccurate in two important ways.
Q Could you tell us both of those ways?
A Yes. Well, the first reason that it's not accurate is that the Secretary of State did not sent ballots to anybody. The Secretary of State sent out absent voter ballot applications, not ballots. So, in order to actually get a ballot, an individual would have to complete that application, sign it, and submit it to their local municipal clerk, who would then review the application before issuing a ballot to that voter.

Also, importantly, absent voter ballot applications are widely available in Michigan. You can download one from the Michigan Department of State web site. You can even write your own, if you want, on a napkin. There is no specific required format for an absent voter ballot application, as long as it includes the required elements, most importantly the voter's signature, which is what the clerk uses to identify the identity of the voter before issuing a ballot to the voter. So there's a big difference between sending an application and sending a ballot.

Secondly, it was not in violation of state law. The courts in Michigan have confirmed that the Secretary of State has the authority send absent voter ballot applications to voters.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Are you aware of claims that Michigan established remote drop boxes only in heavily Democrat precincts, without the statutorily mandated video surveillance?

A I'm aware of claims of that nature. I'm not sure whether I've heard it phrased exactly that way.

Q What are your thoughts on claims of that nature?

A They're without basis in fact.

Q What do you base that statement on?

A Well, first of all, absent voter ballot drop boxes have been utilized in Michigan for a number of years. If you went around the state in past years, you would see that municipal jurisdictions use drop boxes for a variety of purposes. They may be for absent voter ballot envelopes. They may be for absent voter ballot applications. They may for other things, like taxes or other things you might need to submit to your municipal government.

So there's nothing new about the use of drop boxes in Michigan, and they've been used across the state. It certainly is true that there were more absent voter ballot drop boxes that were utilized in Michigan in 2020, because of the large increase in absent voter ballots, because of the desire to facilitate the ability of people to drop off those ballots safety, what with social distancing, and also because of concerns about the U.S. Mail and the ability for the absent voter ballots to mail it back through the mail on time.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But, in connection with that, the drop boxes were distributed all across the state. It was not simply in heavily Democratic areas. The Michigan Department of State purchased boxes at any jurisdiction, regardless of what the political makeup of that jurisdiction might be, to order, and jurisdictions were also able to secure drop boxes from other sources. So there's just no basis of the claim that the Department of State was somehow placing drop boxes in certain areas and not others.

Secondly, the claim about legally mandated video surveillance, you know, first of all, the Department of State doesn't place video surveillance on municipal property. That's something that's done by the local jurisdiction, and depending on when those drop boxes were installed, there may or may not have actually been any requirement for there to be video surveillance. So that statement is inaccurate in a large number of respect.

Q In what way does that depend on when a drop box was installed?

A There is a statute that was passed -- I don't remember the exact time, but I believe it was sometime in 2020 -- that included some requirements for video monitoring, but drop boxes that had previously been installed, prior to the legislation passing, which I think was sometime in the fall of 2020, were exempt from that requirement. They're essentially grandfathered in.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Are you aware of the claim that in Michigan, pertaining to the 2020 general election, absentee ballots were delivered at 3:00 a.m., were counted without affording candidates the opportunity to observe, contrary to state law?

A I've heard a claim of that nature, yes.

Q What are your thoughts on the claim of that nature you heard?

A Well, in the first respects, for the reasons I discussed previously, in Detroit, it was the case that, in some cases, absent voter ballots were not actually counted until the early morning hours, or even the later hours on Wednesday, and there are multiple reasons for that. One is that there was a huge volume of absentee ballots in Michigan in 2020, and under the Michigan election law, in 2020, jurisdictions were not allowed to begin tabulating those ballots until the polls open on election day at 7:00 a.m.

So, unlike some other states, where they can actually start processing or even tabulating those absentee ballots before election day, and, therefore, get through them all easily in term to release the results shortly after the polls close, that's not the case in Michigan. So, in Michigan, in many cases, especially larger cities, it took a long time to get through all the ballots, and in many cases, certainly, at 3:00 a.m., ballot counting was still ongoing.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Secondly, voters have the right to return their absentee ballot as late as 8:00 p.m. on election night, which is when the polls close. So, if that happens, steps have to be taken before that absent voter ballot can actually be tabulated. First, the absent voter ballot envelope has to be brought to the Clerk's Office. For example, if it was brought to a drop box or a satellite location, it would need to be brought to the Clerk's Office.

Then the municipal clerk would need to review the envelope, match the signature, and then accept the ballot into the qualified voter file system to indicate that that voter had returned their ballot. Then the envelope would have to be delivered to the absent voter counting location, and then it would need to be sorted into the right counting board, or precinct, and only then would it be -- the envelope be opened, and then tabulated. So the whole process could, you know, take several hours, especially on a busy night like the November 2020 election night.

And then, with respect to the notion that candidates weren't allowed to observe the process, I mean, first of all, candidates themselves don't serve as challengers or monitors in polling places. Those are appointed by the political parties, or they can also -- you know, other entities can also appoint challengers. But it's not the candidates themselves that are reviewing the process.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

But, in any case, in the locations at which absent voter ballots were counting, challengers and poll watchers were permitted to view the process by which absent voter ballots were processed and tabulated.

Q Did you hear claims, pertaining to Michigan in the 2020 general election, about ballots being delivered from vehicles with out-of-state license plates?

A Yes.

Q Do you have thoughts on those claims?

A Well, they don't seem relevant to me in any way, but I honestly don't know whether or not that occurred. But absent voter ballots, for the reasons I mentioned, would be brought from the City Clerk's Office to the location at which the absent voter counting was taking place, and so they were, I believe, delivered using automobiles. I don't know what the license plates on those automobiles said, but I am confident that the city and township clerk, in all instances, controlled the automobile that was being used to deliver absent voter ballots from the Clerk's Office to the counting location.

Another thing I would note is that there were all sorts of misperceptions about people thinking they were seeing things that they weren't really seeing on election night. I believe there was one instance in which an individual claimed that some ballots or some other materials were being illegally offloaded from a truck, and it later turned out that that was actually a media organization that was unloading its cameras or equipment to do its news coverage. So I'm not even convinced that, if an automobile that had an out-of-state plate was present near an absent voter counting location, that anything coming out that vehicle actually would have been an absent voter ballot.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Mr. Brater, a few minutes ago, you testified that the Secretary of State did not sent ballots out, but sent out absentee ballot applications. Who were those sent to?

THE WITNESS: Those were sent to registered voters in Michigan.

THE COURT: Okay. Only individuals who had previously registered in Michigan, then? Is that right?

THE WITNESS: That's correct, your Honor, yes.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Okay. Mr. Beckerman.

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you, your Honor.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Mr. Brater, does Michigan -- strike that.

Does Michigan law hold that ballot counted without an observer present be thrown out?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A No.
Q Could you elaborate?
A Well, challengers and poll watchers have the right to observe the process, but there's no guarantee that challengers or poll watchers will actually come, and, in fact, in most locations, they don't. So there's places all across the state where there's absent voter counting boards set up, and absent voter ballots are being tabulated by a bipartisan team of election inspectors, but there isn't anyone there who is a challenger.

So, obviously, the voters don't get disenfranchised because a challenger not to show up to the watch the process in those cases. Even if, you know, there was something that occurred where a challenger was trying to observe the process and wasn't able to, the remedy for that would not be to disenfranchise the voter by not counting their ballot. There's no provision in the election law that says that, if some other procedure isn't followed, that the ballots aren't counted.

Q Mr. Brater, was the 2020 general election conducted in Michigan secure and accurate?
A Yes.
Q What do you base that on?
A I think that the first thing that's important to understand is that election administration in Michigan is heavily decentralized and heavily bipartisan. So the actual election is conducted by local officials across the state, city and township clerks who are Democrats, who are Republicans, who are nonpartisan. There is no central control of the way that voters can submit their ballots, either in absentee ballots or in in-person ballots.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And then, additionally, beyond the clerks themselves, the actual polling places are operated by election inspectors who are ordinary citizens who are, you know, Democrats and Republicans. There are requirements that there be a balance between Democrats and Republicans who operate as election inspectors.

So, just like in every other election that's been conducted in Michigan in, you know, history, or at least recent decades, as far as I know going back, the same procedures were used by the same bipartisan, decentralized set of individuals who conducted the election, and so there's -- just as that process has worked to deliver secure and accurate and fair results in every other election, it was also used in 2020.

But, even if that weren't the case, even if you somehow were to believe that thousands of Democratic and Republican and independent clerks and election inspectors were somehow part of some incomprehensibly complex conspiracy to, you know, conduct a fraudulent election, there is also independent verifiable paper evidence that can be reviewed, and was reviewed, to demonstrate the election results were accurate.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

When it comes to claims about voting equipment, regardless of what anyone tries to put forth in some sort of expert report or other, regardless of what sort of claims they make about voting equipment being insecure, or prone to error, or baseless claims that it's intentionally designed to be fraudulent, notwithstanding the extensive testing and certification that's done before it's used, even if you believed all that, we have paper ballots that can be reviewed for the entire election.

So you could look at every paper ballot in the state of Michigan, and we would have done that if someone requested a re-count, and verify what the actual hand-marked paper ballots said about the election. So, even if you somehow believes these claims about tabulators not working properly, for whatever reason, we still have those actual paper ballots

We also have paper records that correspond to every individual who voted in Michigan. So, to vote in Michigan, you either need to complete an application for absentee ballot, to vote absentee, or you have to complete a paper application to vote, to get your ballot in person, and so those records also exist, and are also retained, and can be reviewed to verify that each individual who cast a ballot was a real person.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

And, again, you know, between all of that evidence that exists in paper form, and was retained for the required retention period, no individual has provided any serious evidence or any proof based on those records that any sort of widespread fraud occurred in the election in Michigan in 2020.

So, between the checks and balances that we have in place with our decentralized system, both on election day and afterwards, during the county canvass and the state canvass, in between the independently verifiable paper records, there's simply no way that the types of claims that were being made about the election in 2020 could have been true.

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you. Nothing further

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: Thank you, your Honor.

CROSS EXAMINATION

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Good evening, Mr. Brater. My name is Randy Miller, and I represent the Respondent, John Eastman, in this proceeding. How are you?

A I am good. How are you?

Q Good. So you're an attorney licensed to practice law

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

in Michigan, correct?
A I am an attorney licensed to practice law in New York. I'm not licensed to practice law in Michigan.
Q Fair enough. Okay. So your licensing is in New York, and how long have you been a licensed attorney in New York?
A Since 2012, I believe.
Q Okay. I'm going to ask you some questions about some litigation that I found involved the state of Michigan relating to the 2020 general election. I'm going to start with a case, to see if you're familiar with it, called Genetski, G-E-N-E-T-S-K-I. Are you familiar with that case?
A I believe there may be multiple cases.
THE COURT: Just a minute. Is that litigation that was filed in Michigan?
MR. MILLER: Yes.
THE COURT: Yes.
THE WITNESS: I believe there may be multiple cases involving that name, but I am familiar with at least one, yes.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Okay. And I guess, because of your position, what comes along with that is that you get named as a defendant in these cases, in your official capacity, correct?
A Yes.
Q And so, in the Genetski cases or related cases with the same name, what sort of involvement do you have personally with respect to that litigation?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Well, if I'm --

MR. BECKERMAN: I'm going to object that it's vague. We don't know which of these amorphous Genetski cases we're talking about.

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Well, we've got -- so let me give you the one that I first came across here. This is called Robert Genetski, versus Ms. Benson and yourself. This is in the Michigan Court of Claims, and this was filed on November 20 -- excuse me, November 2, 2020. Does that ring a bell to you, Mr. Brater?

A Yes.

Q Okay. So let's start with that one, and I'll go back to the question I asked you previously. What sort of involvement do you have, in your official capacity, with the Genetski case?

A Well, it depends on the case. I believe, in that case, I was a defendant. I may have submitted an affidavit or some factual material. I don't remember whether I did nor not in that case. And I would discuss the case with our legal counsel, which would have been the Michigan Department of Attorney General.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And in your official capacity, again, as a named defendant in these cases, would you have familiarized yourself with the nature of the allegations in the Genetski case?

A To the best of my ability, yes.

Q Yes. Can you summarize, generally, the allegations in the Genetski matter?

A I believe that involved a challenge to instructions or guidance that the Bureau of Elections had provided to clerks with regard to reviewing signatures on absent voter ballot applications and absent voter ballot envelopes.

Q And do you know what the outcome of that Genetski matter was?

A As I recall, the Court determined that the document that the Bureau of Elections provided was guidance, but was not binding on clerks, that clerks were not required to follow it as a mandate, because it had not been promulgated as a rule under the Administrative Procedures Act.

Q Another case that I found. This one is called O'Halloran, versus Ms. Benson and yourself. Do you remember this one, Mr. Brater?

THE COURT: I'm sorry. What's the name, again?

MR. MILLER: It's O'Halloran, O, apostrophe, H-A-L-L-O-R-A-N, and some other individuals, but that's the lead plaintiff, and the defendants are Ms. Benson and Mr.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Brater.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q The question, Mr. Brater, is do you remember this matter?

A Can you tell me when that lawsuit was filed? I remember a lawsuit of that nature, but I don't remember -- with that name on it, but I don't remember when it was filed.

Q It was filed in October 2020.

A Yes. I mean, I don't remember specifically what that lawsuit was about.

Q Well, maybe I can help you remember, refresh your recollection in this. O'Halloran, at least my review of it, related to a poll challenger manual, and the allegation essentially was that that infringed on the rights of the poll challengers. Does that refresh your recollection about the nature of that matter?

A And you said this was October 2020?

Q Yes.

A I remember a lawsuit involving poll challengers in 2020. I don't actually remember whether the Secretary of State or myself were a defendant in that case, but I do remember a lawsuit being filed on that subject.

Q Okay. Well, I can represent to you, Mr. Brater, that the caption does list your name, as well as Ms. Benson, as the named defendants in that case, in your official capacities. Do you know -- do you recall in the O'Halloran matter whether there was a court ruling relating to the invalidation of the poll challenger manual that the state of Michigan had in place?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, lacks foundation.

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Well, what do you remember about the outcome of that matter?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, vague, lacks foundation.

THE WITNESS: I don't remember --

THE COURT: Just a minute.

THE WITNESS: All right.

THE COURT: The objection is overruled. However, as I recall, Mr. Brater has testified he doesn't recall this case.

Is that right, Mr. Brater?

THE WITNESS: I do not recall the case -- what the case is about. I do recall a lawsuit being filed by an individual named O'Halloran. I believe that counsel stated that it was from October 2020.

THE COURT: That's correct. Do you have an understanding -- or do you have any knowledge regarding the outcome of this O'Halloran v. Benson and Brater matter?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE WITNESS: I don't specifically remember the outcome of that case, at least with respect to Mr. Miller's claim that a challenger guidance document was invalidated in 2020. I don't remember that specifically.

THE COURT: Okay. Then the objection is overruled -- I'm sorry, the objection is sustained. Sorry.

Mr. Miller.

MR. MILLER: Thank you, your Honor.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q What is the acronym "APA"?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, vague.

THE COURT: Overruled. Do you know, Mr. Brater?

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Well, let me try it this way, and we can move this along. Is that the Administrative Procedures Act?

A In Michigan, the acronym APA is generally used to the Michigan Administrative Procedures Act.

Q Okay. Well, where I'm reading, it looks like it may be abbreviated as the Administrative Procedures Act. Do you believe that they're one and the same?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, vague as to source, where this is coming from.

THE COURT: Okay. Sustained.

What are you looking at, Mr. Miller?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: The court order.

THE COURT: Okay. Which court order?

MR. MILLER: It's the court order --

THE COURT: Is this an exhibit, first of all?

MR. MILLER: It's not an exhibit, no.

THE COURT: Okay. So a court order in which matter, in which case?

MR. MILLER: Well, that reference actually was taken from the Genetski case, as to that acronym.

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. BECKERMAN: If I may, your Honor?

THE COURT: Yes.

MR. BECKERMAN: I'm also going to object to counsel testifying regarding facts not in evidence.

THE COURT: Okay. Overruled.

What is your next question?

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Maybe you can't identify the specific case, Mr. Brater. I appreciate that. Do you recall that there was a matter filed in Michigan that challenged something called a "poll challenger manual"?

A Yes. I'm not sure the exact term was "poll challenger manual," but I am aware of a case on that subject matter.

Q Fair enough. And are you familiar with a poll challenger manual or something like that, that related to the role of poll challengers?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes.
Q And tell me what that is. I take a manual means this is a book that's provided to election workers that regulates the rights of poll challengers. Do I have that essentially correct?
A It's a document that describes the provisions in the Michigan election law that apply to both poll challengers and poll watchers, along with the requirements that apply to clerks and election inspectors with respect to poll challengers and poll watchers.
Q And do you recall, Mr. Brater, whether the O'Halloran decision had anything to do with the poll challenger manual that you just discussed?
MR. BECKERMAN: I'm going to object based on foundation.
THE COURT: Just a minute. Overruled. You can answer the question, Mr. Brater.
THE WITNESS: Well, again, I'm not really sure what lawsuit you're referring to. I believe you said there was a lawsuit from 2020. I am familiar with a lawsuit, I think, from 2022 on that subject, but I don't recall one specifically (indiscernible) 2020.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Well, the date of the court order I'm looking at in the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

O'Halloran matter, dealing with the poll challenger manual, is March 9, 2021. Does that help you orient whether this is something that you recall?

A No. I mean, I don't recall specifically what that order was.

THE COURT: Okay. Let's move on. The witness -- you've asked him just about every way you can. You have not been able to refresh his recollection regarding this O'Halloran matter. So let's move on.

MR. MILLER: Okay, your Honor. Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Do you recall a case called Carra, C-A-R-R-A? That would be the name of the plaintiff, and I'll represent that you were named in your official capacity as a defendant in that matter. Do you recall that?

A That sounds familiar, the plaintiff name, but I don't specifically recall that lawsuit.

Q Okay. Fair enough. Do you recall a case brought against you in your official capacity dealing with the issue of the six-foot separation between poll workers?

A I don't recall a lawsuit involving a six-foot separation between poll workers.

Q Was that a COVID --

A (Indiscernible.)

Q I apologize, Mr. Brater. I may have interrupted you.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Go ahead and complete your thought.
A There may have been some litigation involving how far away poll challengers had to stand. I don't recall anything about poll workers having to stand six feet apart from each other.
Q Okay. Was the six feet apart -- was that a COVID regulation?
MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, vague as to what we're referring to by the "six feet apart."
THE COURT: Sustained.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Do you recall whether, as of November 2020, there was a regulation in force in the state of Michigan that required poll workers to stay at least six feet apart from each other?
A I don't recall a regulation that required poll workers to stand six feet apart from each other.
Q Okay. Well, are you differentiating a regulation from state law?
A I was just answering your question. I don't recall a state law, either, that required poll workers to stand six feet apart from each other.
Q Fair enough. I'm going to pull up an exhibit and have you look at it, Mr. Brater. It is Exhibit 1042, and you'll see this on the screen just like the exhibits shown to you by Mr. Beckerman. So do you see the first page of what we've marked as Exhibit 1042? The title is "Michigan 2020 Voting Analysis Report."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes.

Q Are you familiar with Exhibit 1042?

A I've looked at it.

Q And in what way did you familiarize yourself or become familiar with Exhibit 1042?

A I'm not sure when I first saw this document. I believe I probably saw it at some point in 2020.

Q Okay. And what's the process that either the Secretary of State or Bureau of Elections -- I don't know which one you're formally part of, maybe both -- but what's the process when you come into receipt of material like this that related to the 2020 general election?

A I don't know that there's a specific process. It would depend on the nature -- the manner in which we became in receipt of it and what was being requested. So, if it were being submitted to us in connection with, for example, a Board of State Canvassers meeting, we would provide it to the Board of State Canvassers for their review. If it were a litigation matter, we would forward it to the Department of Attorney General. So it really just depends on the nature in which we receive the information.

Q Okay. Well, how about this exhibit, the Michigan 2020

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Voting Analysis Report? Do you know how that was handled internally once you became aware of it?

A No.

Q Do you recall any of the allegations or -- let me strike that.

Do you recall any of the information or data depicted in the Michigan 2020 Voting Analysis Report?

A I can't recall that simply by looking at the cover of the report, no.

Q Well, let's take a look at page eight, and if we can blow up maybe the top half of -- well, actually, it's the third full paragraph, the one starting with "Findings." So I want to just read this to you, Mr. Brater. Can you see that okay? We blew it up for you on the screen.

A Yes.

Q Okay. So this one from Exhibit 1042 says:

> "Two Michigan counties stand out as problematic, Wayne and Oakland counties, 40,000 and 46,000 estimated excessive votes, respectively. Problematic districts and precincts within these counties demonstrate unusual Democrat-Republican ratios relative to their history and excessive vote in favor of Biden, often in excess of new Democratic registrations."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Does that refresh your recollection about the nature of the Exhibit 1042 report?

A I remember reading that statement.

Q And do you know what was done internally within the Department of State to investigate the findings that I just read to you in this report?

A No, but I would note that, I mean, there's -- just from reading the statement, it's clearly not a reflection of -- an accurate review of data, because there is no registration by party in Michigan. So the end clause there, where it says, "New Democrat registrations," that could not refer to anything in Michigan, because you don't register by party in Michigan.

THE COURT: Okay. Just a minute. I'm sorry. I missed what you said. So, in Michigan, voters are not registered by party? Was that your testimony?

THE WITNESS: That's correct, your Honor.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q And I don't know that you responded to my question, Mr. Brater. My question is, what investigation Department of State undertake after it received this report? I think you went on to explain that it didn't make sense to you, what you were reading here, but that wasn't quite the call of the question. The question was, what did you do about it?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Just a minute. Wait. I think you need to lay a foundation as to who generated this report, and Mr. Brater has testified that he recalls seeing the report sometime in 2020. Mr. Miller, who generated the report?

MR. MILLER: There are different parts of the report that were generated by different specialists. So, for example, the Court might appreciate this guidance on page five. There's a section here, "Analysis of Michigan County Vote Counts," and that's by Doctor Young.

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Brater, you testified that you saw this report sometime in 2020. How did you happen to see the report in 2020? How was it -- do you recall how it was provided to you or how you -- how it came into your possession?

THE WITNESS: I don't remember whether it was provided to me or delivered to the Bureau of Elections, or if I just saw it on the Internet. I really don't remember how I first saw this.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Miller.

MR. MILLER: Yes. Thank you, your Honor.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q I think the question was, what did you do to investigate this? And I'm not sure we got a response yet,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Mr. Brater, so, if you have one, I'd appreciate it.
A Well, I don't recall taking any steps to investigate the impossibility of Democrat registrations in our state, given the fact that you don't register by party in our state.
Q Do voters in Michigan register by party leaning?
A I don't understand what that means.
Q Sure. Is the voter data tracked at all by the state of Michigan?
THE COURT: That's vague. Which voter data are you referring to?
MR. MILLER: Well --
THE COURT: I mean, address, date of birth?
MR. MILLER: Let me try it differently, your Honor.
BY MR. MILLER:
Q Do the political parties track voter data in Michigan for Michigan voters?
MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, foundation.
THE COURT: Overruled. You can answer if you know.
THE WITNESS: I believe they use private tools that predict voter behavior to identify people they think may be Democrats or Republicans, but I don't really know how that works.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: When you say "they," who are you referring to?

THE WITNESS: The political parties. Sorry, your Honor.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q And do you know whether the issues raised in this report, Exhibit 1042, were resolved in any way?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, vague.

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Did the Department of State take any action to address the issues raised in Exhibit 1042?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, asked and answered.

THE COURT: Overruled.

MR. BECKERMAN: Also vague as to the issues within Exhibit 1042, which haven't been established.

THE COURT: Sustained. This report appears to be at least 24 pages in length.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Other than what I read to you, Mr. Brater, do you have any understanding of the detail in Exhibit 1042 with respect to voting issues in the 2022 general election?

A I believe this report had some claims regarding the number of votes cast, ballots cast, in Michigan and in certain areas in Michigan. Beyond that, I don't remember the details of any claims that were made, and I'm not aware of any action that the department took to attempt to verify any of these claims.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q So let's have you take a look at what we've marked as Exhibit 1043. First question, Mr. Brater, is do you recognize at least the first page of Exhibit 1043, which is entitled "2020 Presidential Election: Startling Vote Spikes"?

A I don't remember whether I've seen this document before.

Q Let's put up Exhibit 1044, and I'm showing you the first page of Exhibit 1044. The title of this is "Edison Time Series Distribution Analysis in the 2020 Presidential Election." Mr. Brater, does this look familiar to you?

A I believe I've seen this before.

Q And do you know if the Department of State took any effort to investigate the information that was depicted in this report?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, vague, and lack of foundation. We don't know in what capacity Mr. Brater even saw this.

THE COURT: Sustained.

MR. MILLER: I think I missed part of the objection. Was the objection "capacity," don't know what capacity --

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Do you want to repeat your objection, Mr. Beckerman?

MR. BECKERMAN: That the question was vague. It's unclear in what capacity Mr. Brater received this. It's unclear to the extent he's aware of the various claims within this document.

THE COURT: Okay. And the objection is sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Would you have seen Exhibit 1044 in your capacity in the Department of State?

A I would have reviewed this document while working. I don't know that reviewing it necessarily would have been in connection with any specific responsibility, other than being generally aware of election issues in Michigan.

Q Okay. And do you know if any action was taken by the department in response to Exhibit 1044?

A Well, first, I don't see anything specific to Michigan here, in case I'm -- unless I'm missing something. Secondly, as I previously explained, this appears to be asserting that -- what they call a "dump of votes," which I understand to be lots of unofficial results appearing at the same time.

As I've explained, that's the way that unofficial results are reported. They're reported all at once, once the jurisdiction submits its ballot -- its election data, after all ballots have been tabulated. So, if we saw something that was saying it was suspicious that lots of election results were delivered at the same time, that's not something we would investigate, because it's not suspicious, but, having said that, I don't recall us, the Bureau of Elections, taking any specific action with regard to the claims made in this document.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: If we can show Mr. Brater Exhibit 1046. This is another report, entitled "2020 Presidential Election Contrast Analysis."

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Let me ask you to start, Mr. Brater, does this report look familiar to you?

A I don't remember whether I've seen this document.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. You don't remember whether you've seen it, or when?

THE WITNESS: I'm sorry, your Honor. I don't remember whether I've seen this document or not.

THE COURT: Or not. Okay. Thank you. I just didn't hear you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Now, in response to some earlier questions -- I think I have this right, but correct me if I'm wrong -- you mentioned that Michigan uses voting machines. Is that a good way to put it, "tabulating voting machines"?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A I think a more accurate way of putting it would be that Michigan uses tabulators to scan hand-marked paper ballots.
Q Fair enough. We often see the phrase "voting machines," and I think it's probably a little bit generic. So I think that you put it is correct, that these are tabulators. We understand each other on that terminology?
A Yes.
Q Okay. And you mentioned earlier that there were different types of tabulators used in different counties or townships in Michigan. Do I have that right so far?
A Well, to clarify, all cities and townships within a county will use the same type of equipment, "type" meaning Dominion, Hart, or ES and S, but all three systems are used in Michigan by various counties.
Q So ESS is just another manufacturer of a tabulator, correct?
A Yes.
Q And Hart is another manufacturer of a tabulator, correct?
A Yes.
Q And Dominion would be a third?
A Yes.
Q And all three, do those comprise the manufacturers of the tabulators for counties in Michigan?
A Yes. Those are the only three that our counties use.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q Okay. And do they operate similarly in terms of their functionality?

A I would say generally, yes, in the sense that they involve an election management system that is used to program cards which are placed in the tabulators, which are then used to tabulate and scan the paper ballots. Of course, there are differences in the, you know, specifics of how each system works, but generally they do the same thing.

Q And is it left up to the counties, at least initially, as to what manufacturer of tabulators it will use for its constituents?

A Yes. The County Clerk decides which manufacturer to use, or what equipment. They are instructed to consult with their city and township clerks, but the County Clerk makes the decision.

Q So let me ask you about a couple more cases, Mr. Brater. Another one is called League of Women Voters v. Secretary of State, and I know that you were named in your official capacity as a defendant in that one as well. Do you recall that case? And I'll represent, just to give you an orientation on the time, that that was filed in May 2020.

A I generally remember a case being filed by the League of Women Voters at that time, but I don't remember what, specifically, that one was about.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. You said May 2020?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: May 22, 2020, is the filing date.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q And do you recall that the League of Women Voters case had challenged mail ballot return?

A I don't recall it "challenging" that, as you phrased it. I don't understand what you mean by that.

Q Sure. Let me break it down a little bit further. Did it deal with the deadline for mail ballot returns?

A I remember a case having to do with a deadline for returning absent voter ballots. I don't remember whether it was that case specifically.

Q Okay. And as of -- this would be, obviously, before the November 2020 general election. What was the deadline to return mail ballots as of May 2020?

A The ballot had to be received by the clerk by 8:00 p.m. on election day.

Q Okay. And did that later change, either -- well, did that change before the general election in November 2020?

A No. That was the requirement for the November 2020 election.

Q Okay. And do you recall the outcome of the League of Women Voters matter that I just described for you?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, the witness has already stated he doesn't remember that case.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q I'm going to try another one, Mr. Brater, a case called Leaf, L-E-A-F, v. Whitmer. The filing date on that is December 2020. Do you remember a case styled in that way?

A Not specifically. I do remember a case with that plaintiff name.

Q Do you recall a case, regardless of the name, that had raised the issue of the destruction of election data?

A I believe that there was one or more lawsuit in which allegations were made or claims were made regarding election data being allegedly destroyed, but I don't recall the names of those cases.

Q Okay. And for the November 2020 general election, what were the regulations with respect to the preservation of election data?

MR. BECKERMAN: Objection, relevance.

THE COURT: What is the relevance of that question? Well, first of all, what are you referring to as "election data"? Because there's, we know, a massive amount of information that is obtained and compiled in conjunction with elections. So what is the election data that your question is referring to?

MR. MILLER: It would be whatever -- state by state, but whatever information is retained with respect to the voting history, is primarily what it is.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Are you specifically asking Mr. Brater about a decision in -- or litigation that was filed in Michigan regarding the alleged destruction of election data?

MR. MILLER: Yes.

THE COURT: Which election data are you referring to?

MR. MILLER: Well, yes. I mean, it would go back however long it goes back. So there's regulations of the amount of time where that data is obligated to be retained, and that was one of the allegations --

THE COURT: I'm not asking about the -- your question assumes that Mr. Brater has an understanding as to what you're referring to as "election data." Specifically, what are you referring to?

MR. MILLER: Well, do you want me to ask Mr. Brater, and we can get the information from him? I mean, I can tell you what --

THE COURT: I think you need to first clarify what you're referring to in your question.

MR. MILLER: Sure. The data is information on individual voters. It's voting history. It's whether they voted by absentee or in person. It would contain addresses. It would obtain some other demographic information. Any number of fields of information constitute the voter data, changes from state to state.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Wait. Okay.

MR. MILLER: Yes.

THE COURT: I understood your question to be one regarding -- to pose to Mr. Brater as to whether he recalled a case that raised the issue of destruction of election data, not voter data. Are you now asking him about voter data?

MR. MILLER: Yes.

THE COURT: Okay. That's a different question.

Mr. Brater, you can answer that question.

THE WITNESS: I'm sorry. Could you repeat the question? I'm not sure that I'm being asked.

BY MR. MILLER:

Q Sure. Fair enough. So do you recall a case in 2020 that had raised the issue of destruction of voter data?

A I don't recall specifically whether an allegation was made that voter data was being destroyed. As I noted, I do recall there was one or more lawsuits filed that involved claims that election records were being destroyed.

Q Okay. And what sorts of election records did you understand were alleged to have been destroyed, what sort of data?

A I believe it may have related to electronic copies of electronic poll book data, but I don't specifically remember.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Q And what were the regulations in place for the November 2020 election with respect to the preservation of election data, perhaps poll book, P-O-L-L, B-O-C-K (sic)?
A Well, if by "regulations" you mean legal requirements, there's a variety that apply. When it comes to federal elections, the Civil Rights Act, I believe, of 1960 -- or I could say, "Civil Rights Act" -- requires the preservation of federal election records for 22 months following the election. That would include any election records covered by that act.

Additionally, there are state laws that have specific required retention periods for election records. They vary by the type of record. Some of them might go as long as six years. Some of them are much shorter. But all of those statutes would have been in effect for any applicable records for the November 2020 election.
Q For the state records that were required to be maintained for a certain period of time, do you recall whether there was a court finding or court order that those regulations had not been complied with by the state?
A No.

MR. MILLER: I don't have any further questions, Mr. Brater. Thank you very much.

THE COURT: Okay. Redirect, Mr. Beckerman?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. BECKERMAN: Your Honor, if you could grant me just a moment to confer?

THE COURT: Okay. Let's take five minutes. I know we're going late, and I know it's very late there, Mr. Brater, but I figured we might as well try to finish up with you, so we don't have to ask you to return. Okay? So let's take a five-minute break.

THE CLERK: We're off the record.

THE COURT: And, Mr. Brater -- I'm sorry, just one second -- you can mute your electronic device and stop your video during the break, but don't click "Leave," please.

THE CLERK: We're off the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you.

(Proceedings recessed briefly.)

THE CLERK: We're back on the record, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

We're back on the record in the continued hearing of John Charles Eastman, in Case Number 23-O-30029.

Okay. Mr. Beckerman?

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you, your Honor. I just have a very brief question.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Mr. Brater, does the Department of State in Michigan receive allegations of fraud pertaining to elections?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

A Yes.
Q Are those, to a certain extent, unsolicited?
MR. MILLER: Objection, vague.
BY MR. BECKERMAN:
Q I'll re-ask. Are those solicited or unsolicited from your department?
MR. MILLER: Still vague.
THE COURT: Overruled.
THE WITNESS: I would say they are primarily unsolicited, but they may be solicited to the extent that we instruct election officials to contact us if they have become aware of any election law violations.
BY MR. BECKERMAN:
Q Is there a threshold finding or a threshold investigation that is done by your department before determining whether to act or further investigate claims of fraud or illegality?
THE COURT: I'm sorry. Would you repeat the question?
MR. BECKERMAN: Yes.
BY MR. BECKERMAN:
Q Is there a threshold that needs to be met, as found by your department, as to the credibility or reasonableness of allegations of fraud before you investigate further?
MR. MILLER: Objection, vague.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Sustained.

MR. MILLER: It's also compound.

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. BECKERMAN:

Q Let me try that again. Are all claims of fraud received by your office investigated?

A No.

Q Why not?

A Well, in order to devote resources to the investigation of possible illegal activity, the department needs some sort of plausible or actionable information to investigate. So, generally speaking, the Department of State has an Office of Investigative Services, which will review potential criminal or other illegal activities, and then, at times, will refer things further to the Department of Attorney General or the Michigan State Police for criminal investigation.

In order for the Bureau of Elections to refer something to the Office of Investigative Services, the Bureau needs to have something that they can review and verify the veracity of. So, for example, the Auditor General report that we reviewed earlier discussed our investigation of potential duplicate voting. So, in that case, if we become aware that a voter record appears to have multiple vote entries, that's something that we can investigate. We can review the data, the qualified voter file. We can contact the clerk of the municipal jurisdiction and ask them to look at the paper records.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Then, based on what we find, that may be something where we determine it actually wasn't one person voting twice, but it was some of record keeping error, like a "Junior" and "Senior" getting mixed up, or we may find that it's suspicious, in which case we'll refer it for the Office of Investigative Services to review. But, you know, we are not a law enforcement entity, so, generally speaking, you know, we need something that we can actually look and review, that has some sort of verifiable, actionable information, before we can refer it for further investigation.

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you. Nothing further.

THE COURT: Okay. Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: No further questions, your Honor.

THE COURT: Thank you, Mr. Brater. Again, I know it is very late where you are, and we appreciate you staying and participating in the proceeding today. You are excused as a witness. Have a good weekend.

THE WITNESS: Thank you, your Honor.

(The witness was excused.)

THE COURT: Okay. Let's see. Do we have anything else we need to address, other than the scheduling issue? I remember that Mr. Miller indicated, I think it was yesterday or maybe even the day before, that you'd like to address scheduling. At this point, our next -- we'll again be in session on this matter on August the 22nd, the 22nd through the 25th.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: Yes, your Honor. Thank you.

THE COURT: Well, you know what? Before we get to that, let me ask Mr. Carling where things stand in connection with the Office of Chief Trial Counsel's case in chief.

MR. CARLING: We still have Doctor Eastman's testimony to finish, and we have our expert, Matthew Seligman, to call, and we have two remaining state officials, Bo Dul and Jake Rollow.

As I notified Mr. Miller, we're going to call Secretary of State Jocelyn Benson in aggravation only, so wouldn't be part of our case in chief. So our remaining witnesses are completing Doctor Eastman, Matthew Seligman, Bo Dul, and Jake Rollow.

THE COURT: Okay. Doctor Eastman, Matthew Seligman, Bo Dul, and who was the last, fourth, person?

MR. CARLING: Jake Rollow, R-A-L-L-O-W (sic).

THE COURT: Yes, I remember. He's on the witness list. Okay. And so how much more time do you think you're going to need with Doctor Eastman?

MR. CARLING: If we had a full day, I think we could complete that. I know it's been coming in piecemeal and slowly, but I don't think our testimony would take longer than that.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. And then, Mr. Miller, are you inclined to cross-examine Doctor Eastman after the Office of Chief Trial Counsel completes his examination, or are you inclined to examine him in conjunction with your case in chief after OCTC rests?

MR. MILLER: Well, normally, I would probably take my client, if they're a defendant, as part of the plaintiff's case, or, here, OCTC case. Depends on when Mr. Seligman is going to be examined.

THE COURT: Okay. Because -- explain the relationship. If Doctor Seligman testifies, at what period of time will that determine which approach you're going to take?

MR. MILLER: Yes. Well, if we -- if Mr. Seligman comes before Doctor Eastman, then I would probably do Doctor Eastman's examination then, as soon as Mr. Carling completes. If Mr. Seligman is coming later, then I would probably wait to put on Doctor Eastman as part of my case.

THE COURT: Okay. And how much time do you think you're going to need with Doctor Seligman, Mr. Carling?

MR. CARLING: I think the State Bar's examination of him would be a half-day.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. MILLER: My view is that that's ambitious, but I certainly trust the good faith estimate.

MR. CARLING: Well, I wasn't including Mr. Miller's cross-examination.

MR. MILLER: I didn't think that it did.

MR. CARLING: Okay.

MR. MILLER: It just would seem -- and that's not intended to have a reflection on the length of examination.

THE COURT: It kind of does --

MR. MILLER: Everybody is going to do the best they can.

THE COURT: -- but it's okay.

MR. MILLER: Yes.

THE COURT: Okay. Well, these are --

MR. MILLER: It has gone --

THE COURT: We're just -- these are estimates. These are estimates.

MR. MILLER: Fair.

THE COURT: I'm trying to figure out where we stand.

MR. MILLER: I'll leave it alone.

THE COURT: Okay. Bo Dul, how much time you'll need for that witness?

MR. CARLING: An hour.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. And Jake Rollow?

MR. CARLING: An hour.

THE COURT: And that will be it for OCTC's witnesses?

MR. CARLING: Yes, for our case in chief.

THE COURT: Right, for your case in chief.

And then, Mr. Miller, with regard to your witnesses, in what order are you inclined to put them on? You've identified a number of character witnesses, but I read your identification of those witnesses to mean that some you anticipate will offer testimony, either in person or remotely, and then others will provide declarations. So how many do you anticipate will testify, and how many will offer declarations? I don't need to know exactly who, just to kind of get a sense of how much time we'll need for testimony.

MR. MILLER: Mr. Mayer can correct me, but I believe that we had three or so that were planning on testifying live.

MR. MAYER: Three to four sounds right.

MR. MILLER: Three to four of the character witnesses. I had discussed, but not resolved, with Mr. Carling about just submitting those that didn't testify live by declaration. I think he was still considering that. Other than that, we can put them on the screen and they can testify. I think it was our offer that they be able to testify by declaration, which would obviously have a great effect on the time needed for those witnesses.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Right. And I understand, then, that that issue is still being sorted out between the two of you, right?

MR. MILLER: It's on the table. We've discussed it. I don't know that we've gotten back to that one.

THE COURT: Okay. So, then, you all can talk about that during this upcoming break in the proceedings.

Okay. And then, with regard to other witnesses that you identified, Mr. Miller, which -- let me see. Where are they? They would be in your offer of proof. How many other witnesses, other than the good moral character witnesses, other than Doctor Eastman, do you intend to call?

MR. MILLER: Mr. Mayer, can you give us the scorecard?

MR. MAYER: About 20, except for the one she's excluding.

MR. MILLER: Non-character witnesses, we have approximately 20, and the schedules will undoubtedly change as we move into August. I don't know that we've choreographed all that perfectly yet.

I would say I would tend to take Doctor Eastman toward the beginning of that, but that may move around a little bit. Doctor Eastman will clearly be, you know, the longer, depending on how much I've done as part of the Bar case, but that testimony from Doctor Eastman will be considerable.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: Okay. So does this mean that the parties -- unfortunately, I don't even see what I did with my calendar, but does this mean that the parties are anticipating that you're going to make yourselves available not only the week of August the 22nd, but the week after that?

MR. MILLER: Well, we tackled that as part of the conversations to lead to the next scheduled session, the August 22nd through the 25th. I know that we did come up with dates that were compatible as a second week. We never got that far with your Honor. We just scheduled the August 22nd through the 25th dates.

I'd have to go back and refresh our recollections about what dates that we -- another four days that we were going to ask the Court if you wanted to schedule those as well. I believe it was --

THE COURT: What are those dates?

MR. MILLER: -- in early September.

THE COURT: I don't want the time to pass and then, by August, folks say, "I'm sorry. I have something else set for those dates," because we're not going to drag this out forever.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MILLER: I think that was our intent, honestly, your Honor, was let's pick as many dates as we can right now, and we've worked hard to select dates that were compatible with all the schedules here, and I could probably find it, and Mr. Carling may know, but I believe it was sometime in early September. And I agree, if we're going to do that -- and to me, it sounds like we need it -- we should do it know, before those dates don't become available. I'll take a quick look to see if I can find it.

THE COURT: Okay. I need for you all to figure out those dates, so I can -- wait. I can look at --

MR. CARLING: The week you had proposed was September 12th through the 15th.

MR. MILLER: Yes. Then I trust you on that, and that would mean that I had cleared it with our office. Mr. Carling and his office were available, and Doctor Eastman was available. So I think the result of our conversations was August 22 to 25, and September 12 through 15.

THE COURT: I'm really hesitant to set September 12th through the 15th, but I'm going to ask the parties to hold those open, because, if the parties move expeditiously, this really -- this case -- thank you very much -- really should be resolved by the 25th of August. So the parties are not available that following week, the 29th through the 1st of September?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. CARLING: I'm available, your Honor.

MR. MILLER: Yes. I mean, I would have gone through the process in good faith to identify when in that time period I was available. I can look up specific calendaring issues, but I'm pretty certain there's probably a trial in there.

THE COURT: Or the week of September 5th through the 8th?

MR. CARLING: I'm available that week.

MR. MILLER: Yes. I'm in trial downtown.

THE COURT: The week of September 5th?

MR. MILLER: Yes, and I can tell you when it starts. Yes, that was the problem. It starts on the 28th of August.

THE COURT: I see.

MR. MILLER: So I'm cutting it real close with the dates here and then the dates --

THE COURT: Is that likely to go? Do you have a settlement conference set in that?

MR. MILLER: I don't believe there's a settlement conference attached to this trial date.

THE COURT: Which department? Which department is that?

MR. MILLER: I believe it's 72. Let me check. It is 72, Judge Kraber (phonetic), maybe?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. MAYER: Kin. Who is it, Kin?

MR. MILLER: Kin? Okay.

THE COURT: I'm sorry. Which judge?

MR. MILLER: Kin. K-I-N?

MR. MAYER: K-I-N.

MR. MILLER: K-I-N. Judge Kin.

THE COURT: Okay. Well, I'm going to ask the parties to hold. Between now and the end of August, you could have a very successful settlement conference in that matter, which would mean that it sounds like the parties would then be ready to proceed that last week of August.

So I'm going to ask you to hold that week, just in case your case does settle, and if not, then -- well, I'm going to say, then, in addition to that week. I'm asking you to hold that week of the 12th, starting on September 12th, through the 15th, and that will be it. Okay?

And, of course, if that settles, Mr. Miller, I'll expect you to notify my courtroom and to contact -- copy Mr. Carling and Mr. Beckerman and Ms. Wang as well, informing them about the status of that case. Okay?

MR. MILLER: Of course.

THE COURT: All right. Thank you.

Okay. So, when we return on the 22nd -- well, first of all, I think -- 22nd of August. The Court's order remains in effect that requires the party to identify, at least five court days in advance, which witnesses you intend to call.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

So I would expect OCTC to comply with that, at least five court days in advance of the August 22nd date, and, of course, that order also provides that the counts, the exhibits, et cetera, to be identified -- that are anticipated to be used, but that would (indiscernible) to be identified as well. Okay?

Let's see. So that leaves our -- the refiling of what will be characterized as "Motion in limine number seven," the OCTC's opposition to that motion in limine to be filed, and I think -- okay. So we changed that to July the 10th, and I think that's about it. Yes. And the parties are to report to the Court regarding motion in limine number six, whether an agreement was reached, and, if not, I will go ahead and get my final order out by July 7th.

MR. MILLER: Is that -- Mr. Carling, is that date acceptable with you? You wanted to move the last July 7th date.

MR. CARLING: I can do that. We can confer about that, and that's fine.

MR. MILLER: Okay.

THE COURT: Okay. Does anyone have anything else? I want to make sure we wrap any other loose ends, so that we don't forget them when we return in August.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

MR. CARLING: Not from the State Bar.

THE CLERK: I have a question, Judge. On Exhibit 169, I know you objected -- I'm sorry, Mr. Miller objected. You overruled the objection, so is 169 admitted?

THE COURT: 169?

THE CLERK: Yes, State Bar's.

THE COURT: Elizabeth is inquiring about Exhibit 169.

MR. BECKERMAN: I understand it was admitted.

THE CLERK: I know you overruled the objection --

THE COURT: One second. Let me grab -- here it is.

THE CLERK: -- so I just wanted to make sure you admitted it.

THE COURT: I believe I did it. I received 169 into evidence.

THE CLERK: Okay. Thank you.

THE COURT: The other thing is that there was another exhibit. Let's see. 305. Seems to me there was another exhibit.

THE CLERK: You addressed Exhibit 305 --

THE COURT: Yes, and 99.

THE CLERK: -- and you addressed 99. Yes.

THE COURT: Yes, I addressed both of those, but

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

there's another exhibit. Okay. One second. Let me just take a quick look. Okay. So I think that's probably it, then. I don't know what the other one was.

Okay. Does anyone have anything else?

MR. CARLING: Not from the State Bar.

MR. MAYER: The only other unresolved issue, your Honor, would be the offer of proof that we just received from the Office of Trial Counsel yesterday, which concerns the harassment of election officials. I don't believe we've gotten a ruling on that.

THE COURT: No, you haven't gotten a ruling on that. You actually -- as I recall, that was just filed -- was it yesterday?

THE CLERK: I think it was yesterday.

THE COURT: Yes.

MR. BECKERMAN: Yes, your Honor, yesterday.

THE COURT: Let me see if I have it with me. I mean, are you seeking to exclude that evidence? Okay. Somebody needs to -- we're going to get out of here in five minutes. Hold off. I hear somebody's cell phone. I don't even think I have that up here with me.

THE CLERK: Mr. Carling gave me it yesterday, but it was hole-punched on the top.

THE COURT: Okay. Let me just see which one -- no, not this one. They're talking about filing regarding the offer of proof, OCTC's offer of proof re: harassment evidence.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE CLERK: Here it is. Sorry I gave you the wrong one.

THE COURT: Right.

So, Mr. Mayer, you're inquiring as to whether I'm going to make a ruling on the offer of proof?

MR. MAYER: Well, yes. We're looking for some guidance or instruction regarding the adequacy of their offer of proof. We didn't file a motion in limine to exclude the evidence, but we did request an offer of proof. So I think we're looking to the Court of some indication of whether it feels that the response is sufficient or adequate.

THE COURT: Okay. I will have to drill down into this a bit more. I have not had a chance to take a close look at it.

MR. MAYER: Thank you, your Honor.

THE COURT: Okay. Does anyone have anything else?

MR. CARLING: No.

THE COURT: Mr. Miller?

MR. MILLER: Nothing from Respondent, your Honor. Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay. Thank you.

MR. MILLER: Thank you.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE COURT: All right. Everyone enjoy your weekend and your 4th of July, and I will see you all -- and I guess Labor -- no, not Labor Day yet. I will see you all in August. Thank you.

MR. MILLER: Thank you, your Honor.

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you, your Honor.

MR. CARLING: Thank you.

MS. WANG: Thank you, your Honor.

MR. MILLER: Thanks for the extra time today, too.

THE CLERK: We're off the record, your Honor.

MR. BECKERMAN: Thank you, Madame Clerk.

(Proceedings concluded.)

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

CERTIFICATION OF TRANSCRIBER

I, Holly Steinhauer, do hereby certify that the foregoing 234-page transcript of proceedings, recorded by digital recording, represents a true and accurate transcript of the hearing in the matter of John Charles Eastman, Esq., held on June 30, 2023.

_____ _____

Date Transcriber

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/1/2023 5:54:19 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: 10/25 CO court order
Attachments: 10_25_2023 Order re Donald J_ Trump's Motion to Dismiss Filed September 29, 2023.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

This order from Colorado addresses political question, self-execution, and some other issues.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

DATE FILED: October 25, 2023 8:38 AM

DISTRICT COURT, CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER, STATE OF COLORADO 1437 Bannock Street Denver, CO 80202
Petitioners: NORMA ANDERSON, MICHELLE PRIOLA, CLAUDINE CMARADA, KRISTA KAFER, KATHI WRIGHT, and CHRISTOPHER CASTILIAN v. Respondents: JENA GRISWOLD, in her official capacity as Colorado Secretary of State, and DONALD J. TRUMP and Intervenors: COLORADO REPUBLICAN STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE and DONALD J. TRUMP	Δ COURT USE ONLY Δ Case No.: 2023CV32577 Division: 209

ORDER RE: DONALD J. TRUMP'S MOTION TO DISMISS FILED SEPTEMBER 29, 2023

This matter comes before the Court on Donald J. Trump's Motion to Dismiss, filed September 29, 2023. Having considered the parties' briefing, the relevant legal authorities cited, and being otherwise familiar with the record in this case, the Court FINDS and ORDERS as follows:

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I. LEGAL STANDARD

A complaint must state a plausible claim for relief to survive a C.R.C.P. 12(b)(5) motion to dismiss. Warne v. Hall, 373 P.3d 588, 591 (Colo. 2016). However, motions to dismiss are disfavored, and may be granted only when, assuming all the allegations of the complaint are true, and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff, the plaintiff would still not be entitled to any relief under any cognizable legal theory. Colorado Ethics Watch v. Senate Majority Fund, LLC, 269 P.3d 1248, 1253 (Colo. 2012); Denver Post Corp. v. Ritter, 255 P.3d 1083, 1089 (Colo. 2011). Although a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff must identify the grounds on which he is entitled to relief, and cannot simply provide "labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action." Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555 (2007). A complaint is insufficient if it provides only bald assertions without further factual enhancement. Id. at 557.

Whether a claim is stated must be determined solely from the complaint. Dunlap v. Colorado Springs Cablevision, Inc., 829 P.2d 1286, 1290 (Colo. 1992). A court may consider only the facts alleged in the pleadings, as well as "documents attached as exhibits or incorporated by reference, and matters proper for judicial notice." Denver Post, 255 P.3d at 1088.

II. ANALYSIS

In his Motion to Dismiss, Intervenor Trump makes the following arguments: (1) the question before the Court is a non-justiciable political question; (2) Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is not self-executing; (3) Congress has preempted states from judging presidential qualifications; (4) Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment does not apply to Intervenor Trump; (5) the Petition fails to state a claim that violence constituted an insurrection or President Trump engaged in an insurrection; and (6) the case should be moved to Washington, D.C. under Colorado's forum non conveniens statute.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

a. Non-Justiciable Political Question

"In general, the Judiciary has a responsibility to decide cases properly before it, even those it 'would gladly avoid.'" Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189, 194 (2012) (quoting Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 404 (1821)). A case "involves a political question . . . where there is 'a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it.'" Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 228 (1993) (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962)) In such a case, the United States Supreme Court has held that a court lacks the authority to decide the dispute before it. Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 195. This exception is narrow. Id. A court cannot avoid its responsibility to enforce a specific statutory right because the issues have political implications. Id. at 196.

In this case, Intervenor Trump argues that the U.S. Constitution reserves exclusively to the U.S. Congress the decision as to whether a candidate is unqualified under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1] He does not argue the second basis

[1] Intervenor Trump claims that Courts have dismissed "every Section Three challenge brought against President Trump—and every other federal candidate or officeholder—arising from the events of January 6, 2021." Intervenor Trump, however, cites nary a case. Presumably, this is because those cases have been dismissed for lack of federal standing. In this case, C.R.S. § 1-1-113 clearly gives Petitioners standing.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

under the political question doctrine—that a Court is incapable of resolving the question—nor could he. Instead, Intervenor Trump argues the U.S. Constitution reserves exclusively for the United States Congress the power under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment to determine whether a party may take office. In doing so, Intervenor Trump relies on cases that address the question of whether various Presidential candidates (Barack Obama, John McCain, and Ted Cruz) were natural born citizens. He does not cite a case holding that the question before this Court (whether a candidate is barred under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment) is barred under the political question doctrine.

i. Intervenor Trump's Cases

Intervenor Trump cites the Third Circuit in Berg v. Obama, 586 F.3d 234, 238 (3d Cir. 2009) for the proposition that the question of whether Barack Obama was a natural born citizen was a non-justiciable political question outside the province of the judiciary. The Court in Berg makes no such holding. Instead, when describing the history of the case, the Third Circuit states, "[w]e also denied that motion, reiterating Berg's apparent lack of standing and also stating that Berg's lawsuit seemed to present a non-justiciable political question." Id. This Court does not have this order in front of it, in which the Third Circuit apparently stated, "the lawsuit seemed to present a non-justiciable political question." Id. However, even if it did, it appears that whatever the Third Circuit did say regarding the political question doctrine was dicta.

In addition to Berg, Intervenor Trump cites a series of trial court opinions, and one California appellate opinion, some published, some unpublished, that largely hold or state in dicta that the plaintiffs' claims are likely also barred under the political question doctrine as a question committed to a coordinate political department. The Court addresses the cases Intervenor Trump cites below.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In Robinson v. Bowen, 567 F.Supp.2d 1144, 1145 (N.D. Cal. 2008), an elector pledged to a third-party candidate filed a motion for preliminary injunction seeking to remove John McCain from the ballot because he was allegedly not a natural born citizen. The Court denied the motion for preliminary injunction because the plaintiff was not likely to succeed on the merits. Id. at 1146. The Court then noted that Article II of the Constitution prescribes the number of presidential electors to which each state is entitled, and the Twelfth Amendment prescribes the manner in which the electors shall elect the President. Id. The Court examined 3 U.S.C. § 15 which directs that Congress "shall open, count, and record the electoral votes" and provides a mechanism for objections. Id. at 1147. Finally, it turned to the Twentieth Amendment which provides instructions on how to proceed if a president elect fails to qualify. Id. Having looked at these various constitutional provisions and statutes, the Robinson Court then concluded, without invoking the political question doctrine, that "[j]udicial review—if any—should occur only after the electoral and Congressional processes have run their course." Id. The course it referred to was a 3 U.S.C. § 15 objection to a candidate and the Twentieth Amendment procedures addressing a failure to qualify. The idea, however, of Court intervention after "Congressional processes have run their course" is directly contrary to a holding that this is a political question—where there is no judicial review permitted.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In Kerchner v. Obama, 669 F.Supp.2d 477, 479-80 (D. N.J. 2009), two citizens brought actions against various government officials, including the U.S. Congress, alleging President Obama was not a natural born citizen and seeking to compel Congress to hold hearings, conduct investigations, and take certain actions following said investigations. The Court held the plaintiffs did not have Article III standing. Id. at 483. In a footnote, the Court noted that even if there was standing, the case likely fell into "the category of generalized grievances that are most appropriately handled by the legislative branch." Id. at n. 5. It continued that "it appears that Plaintiffs have raised claims that are likewise barred under the 'political question doctrine' as a question demonstrably committed to a coordinate political department," citing to Article II, Section 1 of the U.S. Constitution and the Twelfth Amendment, Section 3. Id.

Keyes v. Bowen, 117 Cal.Rptr.3d 207 (Cal. Ct. App. 2010) is the only appellate court opinion cited that has addressed the issue. There, the appellate court held the Secretary of State had no duty to investigate presidential eligibility and extensively cited Robinson, supra, for the proposition that "presidential qualification issues are best resolved in Congress." Keyes, 117 Cal.Rptr.3d at 216.

Of the cases Intervenor Trump relies on, the Court in Grinols v. Electoral Coll., No. 2:12-CV-02997-MCE-DAD, 2013 WL 2294885 (E.D. Cal. May 23, 2013) (unpublished), aff'd, 622 F.App'x 624 (9th Cir. 2015) had the most extensive analysis. First, it noted that the "natural born citizen" requirement does not designate which branch should address whether the candidate is qualified. Id. at *6. It further noted Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution establishes that the Electoral College elects the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

President. Id. It then pointed out that "[t]he Twelfth Amendment empowers the President of the Senate to preside over the meeting between the House of Representatives and the Senate in which the President of the Senate counts the electoral votes." Id. According to the Court, "[t]he Twentieth Amendment empowers Congress to create a procedure in the event that neither the President-elect nor Vice President-elect qualifies to serve as President of the Unites States [sic]." Id. Finally, the Court pointed out that "the Twenty-Fifth Amendment provides for removal of the President should he be unfit to serve." Id. Based on those provisions, the Court held "the Constitution make[s] clear that the Constitution assigns to Congress, and not to federal courts, the responsibility of determining whether a person is qualified to serve as President of the United States." Id.

In Strunk v. New York State Bd. of Elections, No. 6500/11, 2012 WL 1205117, at *12 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Apr. 11, 2012) (unreported disposition), aff'd, 5 N.Y.S.3d 483 (N.Y. App. Div. 2015) the Court held the framework for the Electoral College and its voting procedures for President and Vice President is found in Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution. More specifically, the Court noted that 3 U.S.C. § 15 dictates "the counting of electoral votes and the process for objecting" to votes. Id. According to the Court, "[n]o objections were made by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, which would have resolved these objections if made." Id.

Finally, in Taitz v. Democrat Party of Mississippi, No. 3:12-CV-280-HTW-LRA, 2015 WL 11017373, at *16 (S.D. Miss. Mar. 31, 2015) (unpublished), the Court, relying on Keyes and Grinols, supra, held "this court can find no authority in the Constitution which would permit it to determine that a sitting president is unqualified for office or a president-elect in unqualified to take office. These prerogatives are firmly committed to the legislative branch of our government."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ii. Petitioners' Cases

Petitioners primarily cite Elliot v. Cruz, 137 A.3d 646 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 2016),[2] aff'd, 134 A.3d 51 (Pa. 2016), cert. denied, 580 U.S. 867 (2016). There, the Court reviewed Article II, Section 1 and the Twelfth Amendment of the United States Constitution which set forth the procedure by which a person is elected to the office of the President. Id. at 650. The Court in Elliot described Article II, Section 1 and the Twelfth Amendment as accomplishing the following:

> 1. vested in the legislatures of the several states, not Congress, the power to "appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled."
> 2. commanded the electors, once selected, to meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for two persons, and then to transmit their votes to the nation's seat of government.
> 3. commanded, upon receipt, the President of the Senate open the ballots and count the votes in the presence of the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives.
> 4. provide that only in the case of a tie, or the absence of a majority, does the Constitution allow Congress to choose the President and Vice President.

Id. (quoting U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 2).

After reviewing the various constitutional provisions that supposedly support the Court dismissing the case due to the political question doctrine, the Court in Elliot concluded that the Constitution does not vest the Electoral College with the power to [2] The Pennsylvania Commonwealth Court is an appellate court that also has original jurisdiction to hear election cases.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

determine eligibility of a presidential candidate. Id. at 650-51. The Court similarly concluded that Congress has no control over the process other than deciding the day on which electors "'give their votes.'" Id. at 651 (quoting U.S. CONST. amend. XII). The Court then compared the provisions regarding Presidential eligibility with those regarding the eligibility of Congress where the U.S. Constitution clearly vests in Congress the power to determine the eligibility of its own members. Id. The Court concluded that because the Constitution does not vest any entity of the federal government with the power to ensure that only persons who are constitutionally eligible become the President, that determination is reserved for the Courts. Id.

The only other case the Petitioners cite that squarely addresses this issue is Williams v. Cruz, OAL Dkt. No. STE 5016-16, pp. 4-5 (N.J. Off. of Admin. Law Apr. 12, 2016), a New Jersey administrative law decision where the judge examined the various Constitutional provisions and held:

> While Congress is the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its Own Members, including their citizenship . . . Congress is not afforded any similar role in connection with the issue of Presidential eligibility. There is no basis to conclude that the issue of eligibility of a person to serve as President has been textually committed to the Congress.

iii. Analysis

Intervenor Trump argues the weight of the law favors a holding that the political question doctrine precludes judicial review, and that Petitioner can only cite "two idiosyncratic state cases that never received appellate review."[3] The Petitioners, on the [3] The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed the decision in Elliot v. Cruz, 137 A.3d 646 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 2016).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

other hand, argue nothing in the Constitution commits to Congress and the Electoral College the exclusive power to determine presidential qualifications and that Intervenor Trump's cases are distinguishable because in none of those cases did the plaintiffs bring pre-election suits in state court under a state law authorizing ballot access challenges.

The Court agrees with Intervenor Trump that the weight of cases have held that challenges to an individual's qualifications to be President are barred by the political question doctrine. The Court, however, agrees with Petitioners that most of the cases Intervenor Trump cites involved post-election attempts to remove former President Obama from office and that there is at least some distinction between ballot access cases and removing a sitting President. Further, most of the cases concluding that the political question doctrine applies did so with very little analysis of what the constitutional provisions they rely on provide. For that reason, the Court looks to the specific provisions to determine if they meet the "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department" standard. Baker, 369 U.S. at 217.

ARTICLE II OF THE U.S. CONSTITUTION

U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 2 provides:

> Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

This clause vests the States authority to appoint electors. The Court cannot find anything in this clause supporting a holding that the Constitution directs Congress to determine whether a candidate for President or a President-elect is constitutionally ineligible.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 3 provides:

> The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice-President.

This clause directs that the Electors shall meet and certify a list of whom the Electors voted for and transmit it to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall the open the Certificates and count them. It also outlines what happens if there is a tie. The Court cannot find anything in this clause supporting a holding that the Constitution directs Congress to determine whether a candidate for President or a President-elect is constitutionally ineligible.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 4 provides: "The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States."

This clause says that Congress sets the date that the Electors meet to certify their votes. The Court cannot find anything in this clause supporting a holding that the Constitution directs Congress to determine whether a candidate for President or a President-elect is constitutionally ineligible.

U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 5 provides:

> No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

While this clause sets out certain constitutional qualifications, it says nothing regarding what branch of the government shall determine if the candidate meets those eligibility qualifications.

U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 6 provides:

> In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

This clause addresses what happens when a President is removed and does not address who determines whether a candidate for President or President-elect meets eligibility qualifications.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

THE TWELFTH AMENDMENT

> The Electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;–The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;–The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.–The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

U.S. CONST. amend. XII.

The Twelfth Amendment modifies Article II, Section 1, Clause 3 and makes it clear that the President and Vice President are chosen separately but together. If there is no majority or a tie for President, the House of Representatives chooses the President. In the interim, the newly elected Vice President will serve as President. While the Twelfth Amendment references the "constitutional disability of the President" and that "no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President," the Court cannot find anything in this clause supporting a holding that the Constitution directs Congress to determine whether a candidate for president or a President-elect is constitutionally ineligible.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

SECTION 3 OF THE TWENTIETH AMENDMENT

> If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

U.S. CONST. amend. XX, § 3.

This provision addresses what happens if the President-elect dies or fails to qualify. It also allows Congress to make law to provide for the case when neither the President-elect nor the Vice President-elect qualify. Robinson, 567 F.Supp.2d at 1147; Keyes, 117 Cal.Rptr.3d at 216; and Grinols, 2013 WL 2294885 at *6 cite the Twentieth Amendment for the proposition that it empowers Congress to create a procedure if neither the President-elect nor Vice President-elect qualifies to serve as President of the United States. See Peace & Freedom Party v. Bowen, 912 F.Supp.2d 905, 911 (E.D. Cal.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2012), aff'd sub nom. Lindsay v. Bowen, 750 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Section 3 [of the Twentieth Amendment] was intended to provide for a then-unprovided for contingency: the selection and succession of the presidency in the event that the president elect, vice president elect, or both could not assume office" (citing 75 Cong. Rec. 3831 (1932) (statement of Rep. Cable))). And Congress did just that when it passed the Presidential Succession Act of 1947, 3 U.S.C. § 19. What Congress has not done is provide for any process to determine whether a President qualifies and what entity is supposed to make that determination. Further, nothing in the text of the Amendment commits to Congress the exclusive authority to render judgment on a presidential candidate's fitness to be placed on the ballot. See Lindsay, 750 F.3d at 1065 ("nothing in the Twentieth Amendment states or implies that Congress has the exclusive authority to pass on the eligibility of candidates for president" (emphasis in original)). However, unlike the other Constitutional provisions relied on by the decisions Intervenor Trump relies on, section 3 of the Twentieth Amendment does include the word "qualify" and suggests that someone or something has decided whether a President qualifies to be President. It is for this reason that the Court has asked the Parties to provide the Court with testimony regarding the historical meaning and interpretation of this Amendment, if such evidence exists.

3 U.S.C. § 15

Finally, the decisions Intervenor Trump cites rely heavily on 3 U.S.C. § 15 for the proposition that there is an objection process when the electoral college votes are counted and that it is during this process that the objections to the qualifications of a

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

President should be made. Robinson, 567 F.Supp.2d at 1147 ("It is clear that mechanisms exist under the Twelfth Amendment and 3 U.S.C. § 15 for any challenge to any candidate to be ventilated when electoral votes are counted, and that the Twentieth Amendment provides guidance regarding how to proceed if a president elect shall have failed to qualify"); Keyes, 117 Cal.Rptr.3d at 216 (quoting Robinson, supra); Strunk, 2012 WL 1205117 at *12 ("the counting of electoral votes and the process for objecting for the 2009 Presidential election is found in 3 USC § 15. . . . This required the meeting of the joint session of Congress to count the 2008 electoral votes. . . . No objections were made by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, which would have resolved these objections if made. This is the exclusive means to resolve objections to the electors' selection of a President or a Vice President"); Taitz, 2015 WL 11017373 at *13 (noting that the Keyes Court cited the Twelfth Amendment and 3 U.S.C. § 15 when it "stated that the Constitution and laws of the United States delegate to Congress the authority to raise and decide objections to a presidential nominee's candidacy"); see also Oines v. Ritchie, Dkt. No. A12-1765 (Minn. Oct. 18, 2012) (citing Keyes in support of the conclusion that 3 U.S.C. § 15 provides the avenue for challenging constitutional qualifications of presidential candidates).

Congress, however, amended 3 U.S.C. § 15 in 2022. As amended, 3 U.S.C. § 15(d)(2)(B)(ii) provides: "The only grounds for objections shall be as follows: (I) The electors of the State were not lawfully certified under a certificate of ascertainment of appointment of electors according to section 5(a)(1). (II) The vote of one or more electors has not been regularly given."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

As such, it appears that Congress has disavowed any ability it once had to consider objections other than the two listed above—including any regarding the constitutional qualifications of the President-elect.

SECTION 3 OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 3.

This provision clearly gives Congress the ability to remove a constitutional disability should a person be disqualified under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, it says nothing regarding what government body would adjudicate or determine such disability in the first instance.[4] The Court notes, however, it would be strange for Congress to be the only entity that is empowered to determine the disability and then also the entity that is empowered to remove it.

[4] Intervenor Trump argues that "Section Three itself contains an exclusive grant of jurisdiction to Congress." The argument is that if this Court were to disqualify Intervenor Trump from being a candidate, it would strip Congress of the ability to remove the disability. The Court disagrees. If this Court were to disqualify Intervenor Trump, there would be nothing standing in the way of Congress immediately removing that disability. In fact, there is nothing standing in Congress's way of removing the disability prior to Secretary Griswold or this Court determining whether Intervenor Trump is disqualified in the first instance.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Court, having considered the above, declines to dismiss this case under the political question doctrine. A controversy involves a political question when, as is argued here, there is "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department." Baker, 369 U.S. at 217. As the foregoing demonstrates, there is no textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department. The text is simply silent as to the specific issue, and arguments by inference, implication, or convention fail to demonstrate the kind of strong "textually demonstrable commitment" necessary for the Court to find the matter nonjusticiable. See, e.g., U.S. CONST. art. I, § 5, cl. 1 ("Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own Members"); Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 548 (1969) (Art. I, § 5, cl. 1 is a "textually demonstrable commitment" to Congress to judge only the qualifications expressly set forth in art. I, § 2, cl. 2, and nothing more).

The Court will, however, revisit this ruling when it makes a final ruling following the hearing set to begin October 30, 2023 to the extent that there is any evidence or argument at trial that provides the Court with additional guidance on whether the issue of presidential eligibility has been delegated to the United States Congress. Baker, 369 U.S. at 198 ("In the instance of nonjusticiability, consideration of the cause is not wholly and immediately foreclosed; rather, the Court's inquiry necessarily proceeds to the point of deciding whether the duty asserted can be judicially identified and its breach judicially determined, and whether protection for the right asserted can be judicially molded.")

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

b. Whether the Fourteenth Amendment Is Self-Executing

Citing a law review article authored by Joshua Blackman and Seth Barrett Tillman, Intervenor Trump argues "Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is not self-executing and cannot be applied to support a cause of action seeking judicial relief absent Congressional enactment of a statute authorizing Plaintiffs to bring such a claim in court." Intervenor Trump argues that the Blackman and Tillman law review article substantially refutes the law review article authored by William Baude and Michael Stokes Paulsen which the Petitioners cite in their Response causing the authors "to substantially modify their own analysis" and for a well-respected constitutional scholar, Steven Calabresi, to reverse his position on the matter. The Court has reviewed the modifications of the Baude and Paulsen law review article and the modifications do not in any way reverse their positions. Further, the retraction from Calabresi had nothing to do with whether Section Three was self-executing but was rather based on whether Section Three applies to Presidents. This leaves the Court with two law reviews that are over 100 pages each with contradictory conclusions.

Intervenor Trump argues there is "[a]mple precedent" supporting Blackman and Tillman's conclusion that Section Three was not self-executing. But the only precedent cited is In re Griffin, 11 F.Cas. 7 (C.C. Va. 1869) written by Chief Justice Salmon Chase while riding circuit.

The Petitioners, on the other hand, argue that whether Section 3 is self-executing is irrelevant because Petitioners are proceeding under Colorado's Election Code which provides it a cause of action. The Court agrees. To the extent that the Court ultimately holds that C.R.S. § 1-4-1204 allows the Court to order Secretary Griswold to exclude a candidate under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court holds that states can, and have, applied Section 3 pursuant to state statutes without federal enforcement legislation. See, e.g., State v. Griffin, No. D-101-CV-2022-00473, 2022 WL 4295619, at *16 (N.M. Dist. Ct. Sept. 6, 2022) (adjudicating Section 3 challenge under state quo warranto law); Worthy v. Barrett, 63 N.C. 199, 200-01 (1869) (adjudicating Section 3 challenge as mandamus action), appeal dismissed sub nom. Worthy v. Comm'rs, 76 U.S. 611 (1869); In re Tate, 63 N.C. 308, 309 (1869) (adjudicating Section 3 challenge as mandamus action); State ex rel. Sandlin v. Watkins, 21 La.Ann. 631, 632 (La. 1869) (adjudicating Section 3 challenge under state quo warranto law); Rowan v. Greene, Dkt. No. 2222582-OSAH-SECSTATE-CE-57- Beaudrot (Ga. Off. Admin. Hr'gs May 6, 2022) (state administrative Section 3 challenge).[5]

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

[5] Intervenor Trump argues that none of the cited cases are relevant as such cases "relied upon state laws patterned after Section Three that applied to state officials." Not so. In these cases, state law provided the procedural avenue for challenging a candidate's fitness for office, but the substantive question remained qualification under the Fourteenth Amendment, not merely a state law patterned after Section Three. See Griffin, 2022 WL 4295619 at *16 ("The Court therefore concludes that . . . Mr. Griffin became disqualified under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment"); Worthy, 63 N.C. at 200 (procedural statute in question "provides that no person prohibited from holding office by section 3 of the Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as Article XIV, shall qualify under this act or hold office in this State" (internal quotation omitted)); Tate, 63 N.C. at 309 (applying the rule in Worthy to bar County Attorneys from office, to wit: "We are of the opinion that he is disqualified from holding office under the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States"); Sandlin, 21 La.Ann. at 631-33 (in quo warranto proceeding brought under "the intrusion act (No. 156, acts of 1868)," qualification of candidate was assessed under both the "eligibility act, No. 39, of the acts of the State Legislature of 1868, and the third Section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." Supreme Court of Louisiana held that the eligibility act was not applicable to the proceeding, and that "[t]he inquiry in this case is, has the defendant, under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and those of the act of Congress of twenty-fifth June, 1868 [re-admitting secessionist states to the Union, requiring compliance with Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment], the legal right to discharge the duties of the office of District Judge of the Eleventh Judicial District.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

c. Whether Federal Preemption Applies

Intervenor Trump argues that federal law has preempted the States from governing ballot access for presidential candidates.

Under the field preemption doctrine, "the States are precluded from regulating conduct in a field that Congress, acting within its proper authority, has determined must be regulated by its exclusive governance." Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 399 (2012).

> [Congressional] intent to displace state law altogether can be inferred from a framework of regulation "so pervasive . . . that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it" or where there is a "federal interest . . . so dominant that the federal system will be assumed to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject."

Id. (quoting Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947)). In support of this argument, Trump cites the Twelfth Amendment, the Twentieth Amendment, and 3 U.S.C. § 15 for the proposition that federal law occupies the field.

Based on the discussion above regarding the political question doctrine, it is unclear to the Court that there is any mechanism under federal law to determine whether a candidate for President or President-elect meets the eligibility requirements let alone a framework of regulation so pervasive that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it. The Court declines to dismiss this action based on the field preemption doctrine.

d. Whether Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment Applies to a President

This is an issue that will be addressed at the hearing set to begin October 30, 2023.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

e. Whether President Trump Engaged in an Insurrection

This is an issue that will be addressed at the hearing set to begin October 30, 2023.

f. Forum Selection Clause

Lastly, Intervenor Trump seeks dismissal of the action based on the forum. Colorado law sets out five requirements which all must be met to dismiss on forum non conveniens grounds. Pursuant to C.R.S. § 13- 20-1004(1), they are:

1. "The claimant or claimants are not residents of the state of Colorado." C.R.S. § 13-20-1004(1)(a). Here, all Petitioners are Colorado Residents.

2. "An alternative forum exists." C.R.S. § 13-20-1004(1)(b). Intervenor Trump has not identified a viable alternative forum. The three forums he suggests are: (1) Congress—but as discussed above, there is no mechanism by which a Colorado elector can object to Intervenor Trump's qualification to Congress; (2) Criminal Prosecution—Intervenor Trump provides no explanation about how the Petitioners can seek criminal prosecution against Intervenor Trump in Washington, D.C.; and (3) Federal Court in Washington, D.C. But, as Intervenor Trump acknowledges, the Petitioners do not have standing in Federal Court. No adequate alternative forum, therefore, has been identified.

3. "The injury or damage alleged to have been suffered occurred outside of the state of Colorado." C.R.S. § 13-20-1004(1)(c). The alleged injury, in this case, is having an ineligible candidate on the ballot. That injury will occur in Colorado.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

4. "A substantial portion of the witnesses and evidence is outside the state of Colorado." C.R.S. § 13-20-1004(1)(d). Here, Intervenor Trump concludes this is the case but has not put forth any specific witness that he'd like to attend that is unavailable at trial.

5. "There is a significant possibility that Colorado law will not apply to some or all of the claims." C.R.S. § 13-20-1004(1)(e). There is no doubt that Colorado election law will play a significant part in any decision this Court renders.

As Intervenor Trump acknowledges, except in the "most unusual circumstances," a resident plaintiff's choice of forum is honored. McDonnell-Douglas Corp. v. Lohn, 557 P.2d 373, 374 (Colo. 1976). In fact, Colorado courts have "extremely limited discretion under this doctrine to dismiss an action filed by a resident plaintiff." Cox v. Sage Hosp. Res., LLC, 413 P.3d 302, 304 (Colo. App. 2017). Here, the Petitioners all reside in Colorado and have exercised their right to object to Intervenor Trump's name being placed onto the ballot under C.R.S. § 1-1-113 and C.R.S. § 1-4-1204. While Trump argues that they are nominal plaintiffs, he fails to explain who the actual plaintiffs are in this matter.

In short, Intervenor Trump's motion under the forum non conveniens statute fails because he has not articulated why this is a "most unusual circumstance," nor has he offered an alternative forum or identified witnesses he cannot call because they won't come to Colorado. Rather, it appears that he is simply objecting to the C.R.S. § 1-1-113 process.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

III. CONCLUSION

For all the above reasons, the Court DENIES Intervenor Trump's Motion to Dismiss, filed September 29, 2023.

DATED: October 25, 2023.

BY THE COURT:

Sarah B. Wallace
District Court Judge

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 10/30/2023 9:02:28 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: Re: Butz v Zelmanski et al - motion to intervene filed yesterday

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Thanks!

From: Meingast, Heather (AG) <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Date: Monday, October 30, 2023 at 3:44 PM
To: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Subject: FW: Butz v Zelmanski et al - motion to intervene filed yesterday

---

From: Meingast, Heather (AG)
Sent: Friday, October 27, 2023 10:57 AM
To: Brady, Mike (MDOS) <BradyM@michigan.gov>; Brater, Jonathan (MDOS) <BraterJ@michigan.gov>; Fracassi, Adam (MDOS) <FracassiA@michigan.gov>; Bourbonais, Lori (MDOS) <bourbonaisl@michigan.gov>; McInerney, Jenny (MDOS) <McInerneyJ1@michigan.gov>; Schaar, Meghan (MDOS) <SchaarM1@michigan.gov>; Lillie, Erin (MDOS) <LillieE@michigan.gov>
Cc: Albro, Lisa (AG) <AlbroL@michigan.gov>; Grill, Erik (AG) <GrillE@michigan.gov>
Subject: Butz v Zelmanski et al - motion to intervene filed yesterday
Importance: High

Hi All,

We filed the motion to intervene in the lead FOIA case, Butz v Zelmanski, which is the City of Roseville defendants. The hearing on our motion is November 13 at 10:30 a.m. by Zoom. Will keep you posted.

Heather

Heather S. Meingast, Division Chief
Civil Rights & Elections Division
Michigan Department of Attorney General meingasth@michigan.gov
(517) 335-7659 (office)

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/8/2023 10:47:35 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: MN decision on 14th amendment disqualification
Attachments: Growe v. Simon Dismissal Order.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Hi Heather,

As you may have seen, the Minnesota Supreme Court today rejected an attempt to prohibit Trump from appearing on the Republican primary ballot. The order is attached. An opinion will follow.

DPP MCL 15.243(1)(m)

Please let us know if you'd like more information or to discuss.

Best,

Jonathan

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

FILED
November 8, 2023
OFFICE OF APPELLATE COURTS

STATE OF MINNESOTA

IN SUPREME COURT

A23-1354

Joan Growe, et al.,

Petitioners,

vs.

Steve Simon, Minnesota Secretary of State,

Respondent.

O R D E R

On September 12, 2023, petitioners filed a petition pursuant to Minnesota Statutes section 204B.44 (2022) asking, in part, for an order declaring that Donald J. Trump, who served as President of the United States and has filed federal paperwork as a candidate for President in the 2024 election, is disqualified from holding the office of President of the United States pursuant to Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution; and directing the Secretary of State to exclude Donald J. Trump from the ballot for the March 5, 2024, presidential nomination primary and from the ballot for the November 5, 2024, general election as a candidate for the office of President of the United States. Absentee voting for the presidential nomination primary will begin January 19, 2024. See Minn. Stat. § 204B.35, subd. 4 (2022); see also Minn. Stat. § 204B.45, subd. 2 (2022).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Before considering petitioners' request to pursue discovery and hold an evidentiary hearing, we determined first to address threshold and potentially dispositive legal issues of justiciability and the legal construction of Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. We directed petitioners, the Secretary of State, the Republican Party of Minnesota, and former President Trump to file briefs addressing these issues and held a hearing on November 2, 2023.

We conclude that petitioners have standing and that their claims are ripe as to the issue of whether former President Trump should be excluded from the 2024 Republican presidential nomination primary. We reach a different conclusion regarding petitioners' claim that it would be error for the Secretary of State to place former President Trump's name on the ballot for the 2024 general election ballot. That claim is neither ripe, nor is it "about to occur" as section 204B.44(a) requires.

With respect to the only ripe issue before us at this time, we conclude that under section 204B.44, there is no "error" to correct here as to the presidential primary election if former President Trump's name is included on the presidential primary ballot after the Chair of the Republican Party of Minnesota provides his name to the Secretary of State, notwithstanding petitioners' claim that former President Trump is disqualified from holding office under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Legislature enacted the presidential nomination primary process to allow major political parties to select delegates to the national conventions of those parties; at those conventions the selected delegates will cast votes along with delegates from all of the other states and territories and choose a presidential candidate who will subsequently appear on general election ballots. See Minn.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Stat. § 207A.11(d) (2022) (explaining that the presidential nomination primary "only applies to a major political party that selects delegates at the presidential nomination primary to send to a national convention"). This is "a process that allows political parties to obtain voter input in advance of a nomination decision made at a national convention." De La Fuente v. Simon, 940 N.W.2d 477, 492 (Minn. 2020). Thus, although the Secretary of State and other election officials administer the mechanics of the election, this is an internal party election to serve internal party purposes, and winning the presidential nomination primary does not place the person on the general election ballot as a candidate for President of the United States. As we explained in De La Fuente, in upholding the constitutionality of this statutory scheme for the presidential nomination primary, "[t]he road for any candidate's access to the ballot for Minnesota's presidential nomination primary runs only through the participating political parties, who alone determine which candidates will be on the party's ballot." 940 N.W.2d at 494–95. And there is no state statute that prohibits a major political party from placing on the presidential nomination primary ballot, or sending delegates to the national convention supporting, a candidate who is ineligible to hold office.

Because there is no error to correct here as to the presidential nomination primary, and petitioners' other claims regarding the general election are not ripe, the petition must be dismissed, but without prejudice as to petitioners bringing a petition raising their claims as to the general election.

Based upon all the files, records, and proceedings herein,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED THAT:

1. The petition is dismissed, but without prejudice as to the general election.

2. So as not to impair the orderly election process, this order is issued with an opinion to follow.

Dated: November 8, 2023

BY THE COURT:

Natalie E. Hudson

Natalie E. Hudson
Chief Justice

CHUTICH, PROCACCINI, JJ., took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/14/2023 8:03:00 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: Re: still reading

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Thanks!

From: Meingast, Heather (AG) <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Date: Tuesday, November 14, 2023 at 2:55 PM
To: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Subject: still reading

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 9/9/2022 5:52:14 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
CC: Robert Cotter [Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Christine Sun [christine@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Subject: Re: AZ voting machine/decertification lawsuit

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

That's great news, Heather. Thanks for sharing the order.

From: "Meingast, Heather (AG)" <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Date: Friday, September 9, 2022 at 1:25 PM
To: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Cc: Robert Cotter <Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org>, Christine Sun <christine@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Subject: RE: AZ voting machine/decertification lawsuit

Thanks, we also received a nice order on the TRO request in our case. DPP MCL 15.243(1)(m)

DPP MCL 15.243(1)(m)

Heather

From: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Sent: Friday, September 9, 2022 12:40 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Cc: Robert Cotter <Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org>; Christine Sun <christine@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Subject: Re: AZ voting machine/decertification lawsuit

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Quick update: We just learned that the Arizona Supreme Court dismissed the case yesterday. The text of the order is in the final two pages of the PDF.

From: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Date: Friday, September 9, 2022 at 11:59 AM
To: "Meingast, Heather (AG)" <MeingastH@michigan.gov>
Cc: Robert Cotter <Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org>, Christine Sun <christine@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Subject: AZ voting machine/decertification lawsuit

Good morning, Heather. I've attached the filings from the Arizona lawsuit I mentioned yesterday that seeks to decertify Arizona's election results based on claims that the voting machines were not properly certified and also seeks to compel retention of documents from the 2020 election. You'll see that Russell Newman, the Nokomis, FL-based attorney who is affiliated with Gen. Flynn's America Project, is involved with both the Arizona and Michigan Actions.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/14/2023 7:53:48 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
CC: Albro, Lisa (AG) [AlbroL@michigan.gov]
Subject: MI 14.3 decision

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Hi Heather (and Lisa),

I'm seeing that Judge Redford rejected the attempt to keep Trump off the ballot. Would you mind sending along the order when you have a chance?

Thanks!

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/9/2023 2:43:13 PM
To: Hammoud, Fadwa (AG) [HammoudF1@michigan.gov]; Aboona, Rebecca (AG) [AboonaR1@michigan.gov]; Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]; Banghart-Linn, Linus (AG) [Banghart-LinnL@michigan.gov]
CC: King-Piepenbrok, Pier (AG) [KingP1@michigan.gov]; Robert Cotter [Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Zack Goldberg [zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Subject: New Powell disciplinary letter--privileged Attachments: 2023-11-08 SBOT Letter-Sidney Powell SUDC-LDAD With Attachments.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Good morning. Following up on our previous discussion of Texas disciplinary proceedings concerning Sidney Powell, I'm sharing the attached letter that States United, Lawyers Defending American Democracy, and others sent to the State Bar of Texas yesterday, seeking to have Sidney Powell disciplined based on her guilty plea in Georgia.

We'd be happy to discuss the status of the ongoing Texas proceedings and any interest you might have in submitting a similar letter given recent developments.

Best,

Jonathan

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

States United DEMOCRACY CENTER

LAWYERS DEFENDING AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

VIA EMAIL

Seana Willing
Chief Disciplinary Counsel
State Bar of Texas
1414 Colorado Street
Austin, Texas 78701
swilling@texasbar.com

November 8, 2023

Re: Request for Disciplinary Action against Sidney Powell Pursuant to Texas Rule of Disciplinary Procedure 8.01

Dear Ms. Willing,

The States United Democracy Center is a nonpartisan organization advancing free, fair, and secure elections. Helping to ensure that democracy violators are held accountable, including those in the legal profession who betray their professional responsibilities to uphold the rule of law, is a critical component of our mission.

Lawyers Defending American Democracy (LDAD) is a nonpartisan organization, the purpose of which is to foster adherence to the rule of law. LDAD is devoted to ensuring that individual lawyers are held accountable for participating in assaults on fundamental principles of our American democracy.

We, together with the additional signatories below, write to urge the Office of Chief Disciplinary Counsel to initiate a disciplinary action seeking compulsory discipline against attorney Sidney Powell and to place the matter on the Board of Disciplinary Appeals' January 2024 docket. Attorneys licensed in Texas must "maintain the highest standards of ethical conduct." See Duncan v. Bd. of Disciplinary Appeals, 898 S.W.2d 759, 764 (Tex. 1995) (Cornyn, J., concurring); see also Tex. Disc. R. Prof. Cond., Pmble., 1. As set forth below, through acts undertaken in the aftermath of the 2020 presidential election, Ms. Powell fell far short of those standards.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I. Brief Background

On August 14, 2023, attorney Sidney Powell and 18 others were charged in Fulton County, Georgia with a conspiracy to overturn the 2020 presidential election.[1]

On October 19, 2023, Ms. Powell pled guilty to six misdemeanor counts of conspiracy to commit intentional interference with performance of election duties (O.C.G.A. 16-4-8- and 21-2-597) arising out of a plot to unlawfully obtain access to voting machines in Coffee County, Georgia.[2] Per the Indictment, Ms. Powell was a key figure in that conspiracy, engaging in illegal efforts to access voting equipment, in Georgia and elsewhere. Ms. Powell hired and directed the technology firm SullivanStrickler to unlawfully access Coffee County, Georgia's sensitive voting equipment and confidential voting technology.[3] At Ms. Powell's direction, SullivanStrickler and others involved in the conspiracy "stole data, including ballot images, voting equipment software, and personal voter information. The stolen data was then distributed to other members of the enterprise, including members in other states."[4]

Under the terms of the plea agreement, Powell is subject to six years of probation (12 months for each count), a fine of $6,000, and restitution of $2,700. She is further required to write a letter of apology for her actions and to testify truthfully against her co-defendants.[5]

II. Standard for Compulsory Discipline

The Texas Rules of Disciplinary Procedure provide that "when an attorney licensed to practice law in Texas has been placed on probation for an Intentional Crime with or without an adjudication of guilt, the Chief Disciplinary Counsel shall initiate a Disciplinary Action seeking compulsory discipline[.]" Tex. R. Disc. Pro. 8.01 (emphasis added). An Intentional Crime includes "any Serious Crime that requires proof of knowledge or intent as an essential element[.]" Tex. R. Disc. Pro. 1.06V(1). In relevant part, a Serious Crime includes "any misdemeanor involving theft, embezzlement, or fraudulent or reckless misappropriation of money or other property; or any attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation of another to commit any of the foregoing crimes."[6] Tex. R. Disc. Pro. 1.06GG.

---

[1] See Indictment, State of Georgia v. Donald J. Trump, et al, 23SC188947 (Aug. 14, 2023), available at https://int.nyt.com/data/documenttools/georgia-indictment-trump/daed97d37562a76f/full.pdf.

[2] A true and correct copy of the filed Accusation is attached hereto as Attachment 1. A true and correct copy of the filed Plea Statement is attached hereto as Attachment 2. See also Video of plea hearing, State of Georgia v. Sidney Katherine Powell, 23SC188947 (Oct.19, 2023), available at https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bHTz OGYVo.

[3] See Indictment, Acts 33, 91, and 144-149.

[4] See id. at p. 18 (Unlawful Breach of Election Equipment in Georgia and Elsewhere).

[5] See Attachment 2.

[6] That Ms. Powell's plea agreement includes a statement that her crimes did not involve "moral turpitude" has no bearing on the Office of Chief Disciplinary Counsel's duty to seek compulsory discipline under the applicable rules and, even if it did, that determination would rest with the Texas Bar.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Rule 8.05 provides that such attorneys subject to Rule 8.01 "shall be disbarred unless the Board of Disciplinary Appeals, under Rule 8.06, suspends his or her license to practice law." Tex. R. Disc. Pro. 8.05. The Board of Disciplinary Appeals has the discretion to determine whether to suspend or disbar an attorney who receives a fully probated sentence. See In re Caballero, 272 S.W.3d 595, 597 (Tex. 2008) (holding the Board did not abuse its discretion in disbarring attorney who received a fully probated sentence and affirming disbarment).

As set forth below, since Ms. Powell has pled guilty to Intentional Crimes, the Office of Chief Disciplinary Counsel's must commence an action for seeking her disbarment under the rules.[7]

III. Sidney Powell's October 19, 2023 Guilty Plea

On October 19, 2023, Ms. Powell pled guilty to six counts of Conspiracy to Commit Intentional Interference with Performance of Election Duties between December 1, 2020 and January 7, 2021.[8] Specifically, as set forth in the attached Accusation (see Ex. 1), Ms. Powell pled guilty to unlawfully conspiring to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay co-defendant Misty Hampton – then the elections director for Coffee County, Georgia – in the performance of her duties under Georgia's Election Code by contracting with, paying and causing the employees of the firm SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fulton County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia:

1. for the purpose of willfully tampering with electronic ballot markers and tabulating machines (Count 1);
2. for the purpose of causing certain members of the conspiracy, who were not officers charged by law with the care of ballots and who were not persons entrusted by any such officer with the care of ballots for purpose required by law, to possess official ballots outside of the polling place (Count 2);
3. for the purpose of using computer with knowledge that such use was without authority and with the intention of taking and appropriating information, data, and software, the property of Dominion Voting Systems Corporation (Count 3);
4. for the purpose of using computer with knowledge that such use was without authority and with the intention of removing voter data from said computer (Count 4);
5. for the purpose of using computer with the intention of examining personal voter data with knowledge that such examination was without authority (Count 5); and
6. for the purpose of using computer with knowledge that such use was without authority and with the intention of removing Dominion Voting Systems Corporation data from said computer (Count 6).

---

[7] The ongoing case against Ms. Powell by the Commission for Lawyer Discipline has no bearing on the Office of Chief Disciplinary Counsel's obligation to commence an action for compulsory discipline under the rules. See Tex. R. Disc. Pro. 8.01 ("Proceedings under this part are not exclusive[.]")

[8] See note 2, supra.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

See Ex. 1 (Accusation) (Emphases added). As shown above, each count has an intentionality element and at least four (Counts 2, 3, 4, and 6) involve theft of property, thereby subjecting Ms. Powell to compulsory discipline.

The fact that Ms. Powell entered her guilty plea under Georgia's first offender law has no impact on the compulsory discipline she must face.[9] The Georgia Supreme Court routinely upholds attorney discipline imposed following first-offender pleas under the law. See, e.g., In the Matter of Davis, 292 Ga. 897 (2013); In re Waldrop, 283 Ga. 80 (2008); In the Matter of Caroway, 279 Ga. 381 (2005); In the Matter of Lewis, 282 Ga. 649 (2007); and In the Matter of Calhoun, 268 Ga. 877 (1998). Likewise, although the Texas penal code does not have a first offender law applicable under these circumstances,[10] Texas does require attorneys to face compulsory discipline in similar situations. See Tex. R. Disc. Pro. 8.03 (providing for compulsory discipline for a probated sentence obtained through deferred adjudication). See also In the Matter of Alfred Isassi, BODA No. 57699 (May 8, 2017) (imposing compulsory discipline after attorney was released from all penalties and disabilities by discharge under Tex. Code Crim. Pro. Art. 42.12 § 20). Neither Rule 8.03 nor Isassi say anything about excluding first offenders.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we respectfully assert that the Chief Disciplinary Counsel must initiate a compulsory disciplinary action against Ms. Powell seeking her disbarment, pursuant to Rule 8.01 of the Texas Rules of Disciplinary Procedure. We further request that the matter be placed on the Board of Disciplinary Appeals' January 2024 docket.

Respectfully submitted,

STATES UNITED DEMOCRACY CENTER

1101 17th St. NW, Suite 250
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 999-9305
gillian@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Norman Eisen
Executive Chair, Board of Directors Former White House Special Counsel for Ethics and Government Reform*

Joanna Lydgate, Chief Executive Officer
Former Chief Deputy Attorney General of Massachusetts

LAWYERS DEFENDING AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

John T. Montgomery
Lawyers Defending American Democracy Board Member

[9] Ms. Powell's plea deal was obtained under Georgia's first offender law. Ga. Code § 42-8-60.
[10] Texas has a first offender program for juveniles. See Tex. Fam. Code § 52.031.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Governor Christine Todd Whitman, Co-Chair
Former Governor of New Jersey

Gillian Feiner, Senior Counsel
Meagan Harding, Counsel (TX Bar No. 24080179)
Christine P. Sun, Senior Vice President, Legal

Additional signatories*

Donald Ayer
Adjunct Professor, Georgetown Law School U.S. Attorney (E.D. Cal.) (1982-86)
Principal Deputy Solicitor General (1986-88) Deputy Attorney General (1989-90)

Governor Steve Bullock
Former Governor of Montana
Former Attorney General of Montana

Honorable Tom Coleman
Former Missouri Congressman

Honorable John J. Farmer Jr.
Former Attorney General of New Jersey
Former Assistant U.S. Attorney, District of New Jersey

Honorable Trey Grayson
Former Secretary of State of Kentucky

Dicky Grigg
Past President of TEX-ABOTA

Honorable Jim Hood
Former Attorney General of Mississippi

Honorable Jahna Lindemuth
Former Attorney General of Alaska

Honorable Patricia A. Madrid
Former Attorney General of New Mexico

Professor Richard W. Painter
S. Walter Richey Professor of Corporate Law, University of Minnesota Law School
Former Associate Counsel to the President

Honorable Sarah R. Saldaña
Former Director of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement
Former U.S. Attorney, Northern District of Texas

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Terry Tottenham
Past President, State Bar of Texas

*Titles and affiliations for identification purposes only

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ATTACHMENT 1

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

23SC188947 GC

ACCUSATION

mc Afee EJIS

Clerk No. 23SC190370

FULTON SUPERIOR COURT

THE STATE OF GEORGIA

V.

SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL
DA #: 23DA07679

Fulton County Superior Court
FILED KS
Date: 10/18/2023
Che Alexander, Clerk of Court

1 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597
2 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597
3 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597
4 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597
5 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597
6 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597

PERSONID: 8852937

FANI T. WILLIS, District Attorney

The Defendant waives copy of indictment, list of witnesses, formal arraignment and pleads _____ Guilty.

_____
Defendant

_____
Attorney for Defendant

_____
Assistant District Attorney

This ____ day of _____, _____

The Defendant waives copy of indictment, list of witnesses, formal arraignment and pleads _____ Guilty.

_____
Defendant

_____
Attorney for Defendant

_____
Assistant District Attorney

This ____ day of _____, _____

The Defendant waives copy of indictment, list of witnesses, formal arraignment and pleads _____ Guilty.

_____
Defendant

_____
Attorney for Defendant

_____
Assistant District Attorney

This ____ day of _____, _____

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

STATE OF GEORGIA, COUNTY OF FULTON

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF SAID COUNTY

On behalf of the People of the State of Georgia, the undersigned, Fani T. Willis, District Attorney, as prosecuting attorney for the County and State aforesaid, does charge and accuse SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL with the offense of CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597, for the said accused, in the County of Fulton and State of Georgia, on and between the 1st day of December 2020 and the 7th day of January 2021, unlawfully conspired to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay Misty Hampton AKA Emily Misty Hayes, another person, in the performance of a duty imposed by Chapter 2 of Title 21 of the Official Code of Georgia;

And SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL entered into a contract with SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, delivered a payment to SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, and caused employees of SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fulton County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia, for the purpose of willfully tampering with electronic ballot markers and tabulating machines, which were overt acts to effect the object of the conspiracy; -contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace and dignity thereof;

COUNT 2 of 6

The undersigned, as prosecuting attorney, does further charge and accuse SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL with the offense of CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597, for the said accused, in the County of Fulton and State of Georgia, on and between the 1st day of December 2020 and the 7th day of January 2021, unlawfully conspired to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay Misty Hampton AKA Emily Misty Hayes, another person, in the performance of a duty imposed by Chapter 2 of Title 21 of the Official Code of Georgia;

And SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL entered into a contract with SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, delivered a payment to SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, and caused employees of SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fultou County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia, for the purpose of causing certain members of the conspiracy, who were not officers charged by law with the care of ballots and who were not persons entrusted by any such officer with the care of ballots for a purpose required by law, to possess official ballots outside of the polling place, which were overt acts to effect the object of the conspiracy; -contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace and dignity thereof;

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

COUNT 3 of 6

The undersigned, as prosecuting attorney, does further charge and accuse SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL with the offense of CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597, for the said accused, in the County of Fulton and State of Georgia, on and between the 1st day of December 2020 and the 7th day of January 2021, unlawfully conspired to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay Misty Hampton AKA Emily Misty Hayes, another person, in the performance of a duty imposed by Chapter 2 of Title 21 of the Official Code of Georgia;

And SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL entered into a contract with SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, delivered a payment to SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, and caused employees of SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fulton County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia, for the purpose of using a computer with knowledge that such use was without authority and with the intention of taking and appropriating information, data, and software, the property of Dominion Voting Systems Corporation, which were overt acts to effect the object of the conspiracy; -contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace and dignity thereof;

COUNT 4 of 6

The undersigned, as prosecuting attorney, does further charge and accuse SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL with the offense of CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597, for the said accused, in the County of Fulton and State of Georgia, on and between the 1st day of December 2020 and the 7th day of January 2021, unlawfully conspired to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay Misty Hampton AKA Emily Misty Hayes, another person, in the performance of a duty imposed by Chapter 2 of Title 21 of the Official Code of Georgia;

And co-conspirator SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL entered into a contract with SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, delivered a payment to SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, and caused employees of SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fulton County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia, for the purpose of using a computer with knowledge that such use was without authority and with the intention of removing voter data from said computer, which were overt acts to effect the object of the conspiracy; -contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace and dignity thereof;

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

COUNT 5 of 6

The undersigned, as prosecuting attorney, does further charge and accuse SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL with the offense of CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597, for the said accused, in the County of Fulton and State of Georgia, on and between the 1st day of December 2020 and the 7th day of January 2021, unlawfully conspired to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay Misty Hampton AKA Emily Misty Hayes, another person, in the performance of a duty imposed by Chapter 2 of Title 21 of the Official Code of Georgia;

And co-conspirator SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL entered into a contract with SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, delivered a payment to SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, and caused employees of SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fulton County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia, for the purpose of using a computer with the intention of examining personal voter data with knowledge that such examination was without authority, which were overt acts to effect the object of the conspiracy; -contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace and dignity thereof;

COUNT 6 of 6

The undersigned, as prosecuting attorney, does further charge and accuse SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL with the offense of CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERFORMANCE OF ELECTION DUTIES O.C.G.A. §§ 16-4-8 & 21-2-597, for the said accused, in the County of Fulton and State of Georgia, on and between the 1st day of December 2020 and the 7th day of January 2021, unlawfully conspired to intentionally interfere with, hinder, and delay Misty Hampton AKA Emily Misty Hayes, another person, in the performance of a duty imposed by Chapter 2 of Title 21 of the Official Code of Georgia;

And co-conspirator SIDNEY KATHERINE POWELL entered into a contract with SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, delivered a payment to SullivanStrickler LLC in Fulton County, Georgia, and caused employees of SullivanStrickler LLC to travel from Fulton County, Georgia, to Coffee County, Georgia, for the purpose of using a computer with knowledge that such use was without authority and with the intention of removing Dominion Voting Systems Corporation data from said computer, which were overt acts to effect the object of the conspiracy; -contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace and dignity thereof;

FANI T. WILLIS, District Attorney

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Related Clerk No:

Complaint #:

Defendant	DA #	Booking	Race	Sex	Birthdate	OTN	Agency
POWELL, SIDNEY KATHERINE	23DA07679		White	Female	05/01/1955

WITNESS LIST

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

ATTACHMENT 2

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Fulton County Superior Court
EFILEDNY
Date: 10/19/2023 2:34 PM
Che Alexander, Clerk

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF FULTON COUNTY
STATE OF GEORGIA

STATE OF GEORGIA	*	INDICTMENT NO: 23SC190370
vs.	*
Sidney Katherine Powell	*	JUDGE SCOTT F. MCAFEE

PLEA OF GUILTY

1. What is your legal name? Sidney Katherine Powell
2. At this time are you under the influence of any alcohol, drugs or medication? No
3. How old are you? 68
4. How far did you go in school? B.A. J.D.
5. Are you able to read and write English? Yes
6. Have you ever received psychiatric treatment or been in a mental hospital? If so, when and where? No
7. Do you wish to plead guilty to the offense(s) in this case? Yes
8. Do you understand you have the right to plead either "guilty" or "not guilty" to the charges? Yes
9. Do you understand that by pleading "guilty" you:
   - ✓ (a) agree that you understand the nature of the charges.
   - ✓ (b) waive the right to trial by jury.
   - ✓ (c) waive the right to the presumption of innocence.
   - ✓ (d) waive the right to confront witnesses called to testify against you.
   - ✓ (e) waive the right to subpoena witnesses.
   - ✓ (f) waive the right to testify and to offer other evidence on your behalf.
   - ✓ (g) waive the right to assistance of counsel during trial.
   - ✓ (h) waive the right not to testify against yourself and that by pleading not guilty or remaining silent and not entering a plea you could obtain a jury trial.
10. Do you understand that you may obtain a jury trial should you elect to plead "not guilty" or remain silent? Yes
11. Do you acknowledge that you have entered this plea freely, voluntarily and with a full understanding of all the rights you are giving up? Yes
12. Do you acknowledge that no one has made any promises or threats to influence your decision to plead guilty? Yes
13. Do you understand the prosecutor is recommending the following sentence: Cts 1-6 - 12 mos probation on each consecutively $2K fine, $750 restitution Apology letter, Truthful testimony at trial and other proceedings, No communication with Co-as, Witnesses, media until all cases have been closed, full probation and provide documents
14. Do you understand that although this a negotiated plea, the Judge is not bound to accept the prosecutor's recommendation? Yes If the Judge does not accept the recommendation, you will have the right to withdraw your plea of guilty. (If the plea is non-negotiated, counsel should strike through this provision as it does not apply.)
15. Do you acknowledge you have been advised the maximum sentence you can receive is 6 years and the minimum sentence you can receive is 0 ?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

16. Do you acknowledge you have been advised if you are not a citizen of the United States a plea of guilty may impact your immigration status and could result in deportation? [redacted] Yes
17. Do you acknowledge you have been advised a plea of guilty could be used to aggravate the punishment you could receive in any subsequent criminal prosecution? Yes
18. Do you acknowledge you have had sufficient time to discuss this case with your attorney and you are satisfied with your attorney's services? Yes
19. Do you acknowledge if you plead guilty, there will be no trial and the Court will impose such sentence as it finds appropriate under the law? Yes
20. Do you acknowledge you understand if you wish to seek relief from this sentence through a Writ of Habeas Corpus you will have four (4) years from today's date to file your petition as to any felony sentence and one (1) year from today's date to file your petition as to any misdemeanor sentence? Yes
21. How do you plead to the charges: "Guilty" or "Not Guilty"? Guilty

Respectfully submitted this 19th day of October, 2023

Sidney Katherine Powell
Printed Name of Defendant

Signature of Defendant

CERTIFICATION OF COUNSEL

I, as attorney for the Defendant, hereby certify the following:

1. I have read and fully explained to the Defendant all of the charges contained in the Indictment/Accusation in this case.
2. I have explained and discussed with the Defendant the facts and elements of the case which the Prosecution must prove and the defense(s) that may be available to the charge(s).
3. I have explained to the Defendant the maximum penalty provided by law for the offense(s) charged in the Indictment/Accusation to which the Defendant offers a plea of guilty and the possible consequences of a guilty plea.
4. The defendant DOES/DOES NOT QUALIFY for First Offender Treatment and IS/IS NOT asking for disposition under the First Offender Statue. (Circle options that apply.)
5. The plea of guilty offered by the Defendant is, in my opinion, knowingly, freely and voluntarily made, and is consistent with my advice to the Defendant.
6. To the best of my knowledge and belief, the statements, representations and declarations made by the Defendant in the foregoing Plea of Guilty are in all respects true and accurate.
7. I have read and reviewed this plea sheet with the Defendant and answered any questions the Defendant may have concerning this plea sheet.
8. I do not know of any reason why the Court should not accept the Defendant's plea of guilty.

Respectfully submitted this 19th day of October, 2023.

Brian T. Rafferty
Printed Name of Attorney for Defendant

Signature of Attorney for Defendant

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 11/22/2023 9:30:37 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
CC: Zack Goldberg [zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Robert Cotter [Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org]

Subject: Canceled: Check-in Location: Microsoft Teams Meeting

Start: 11/27/2023 3:30:00 PM
End: 11/27/2023 4:00:00 PM
Show Time As: Free

Importance: High

Recurrence: (none)

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

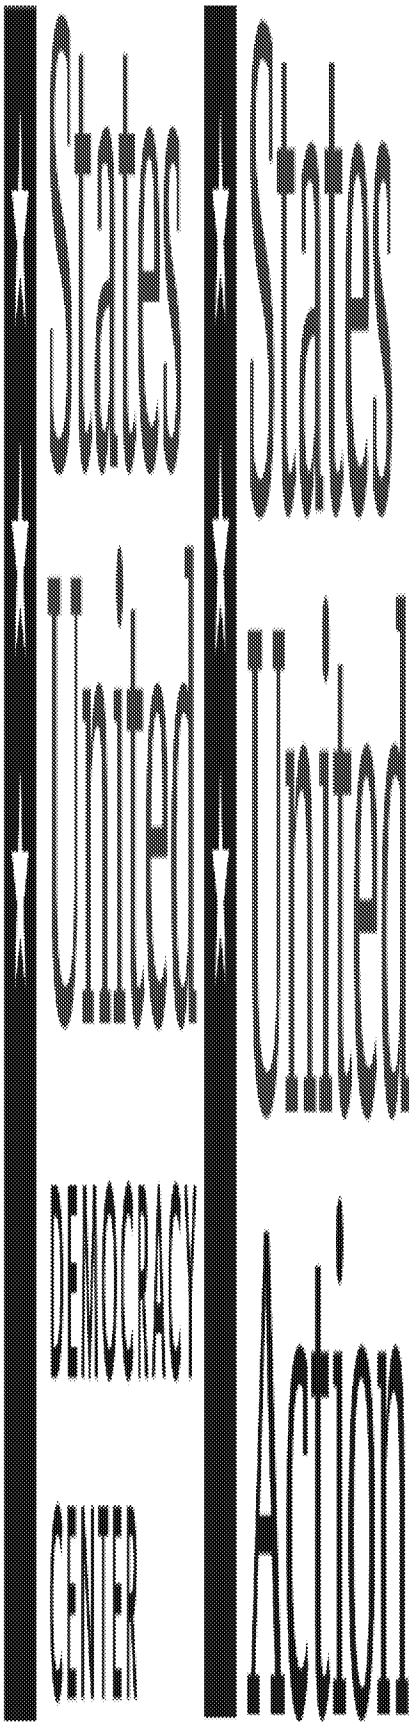
Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: States United Democracy Center [info@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 9/9/2022 9:00:03 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: The Uneven Rules of Voter Fraud Prosecution

The Uneven Rules of Voter Fraud Prosecution

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA



Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Only have a minute?

- A New Mexico judge ordered that Couy Griffin, an Otero County commissioner and founder of Cowboys for Trump who was convicted of illegally entering the Capitol during the Jan. 6 attack, be removed from office. The judge cited a clause in the 14th Amendment that bars anyone who has participated in an insurrection from holding public office.

- Rep. Jamie Raskin of Maryland said he expects the House January 6 Select Committee to release its final report by the end of the year. Raskin said the committee has a responsibility to "report to the American people about how to prevent coups, insurrections, political violence and attacks on our democratic process going forward."

- A majority of Americans say former President Trump's Make America Great Again movement is undermining democracy, according to a Reuters/Ipsos poll released this week. The poll was completed after President Biden urged Americans in a speech last week to "stop the assault on American democracy."

The Uneven Rules of Voter Fraud Prosecution

Our elections are free, fair, and secure. We know voter fraud is rare. Microscopic, in fact. One researcher identified only 31 cases of voter impersonation in the United States from 2000 to 2014—out of more than a billion votes cast.

But there's another reason to be skeptical of voter fraud claims: Prosecution of alleged voter fraud is extremely inconsistent, and the heaviest penalties often fall on poor Americans and communities of color.

As The New York Times noted this week in a detailed examination of voter fraud cases since 2017, prosecutions "are blue-moon events, and often netted people who didn't realize they were breaking the law."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In 2016, a Black woman in Texas named Crystal Mason cast a provisional ballot, believing she was eligible to vote. State officials determined she was not eligible because, at the time, she was on supervised release for a federal conviction.

Mason's ballot was never counted. Despite the absence of criminal intent or any harm, she was prosecuted for illegal voting and ultimately sentenced to five years in prison.

In July 2021, States United teamed up with a group of former state and federal prosecutors to file a friend-of-the-court brief in a Texas appeals court, arguing that Mason's case was "far outside the bounds of any reasonable exercise of prosecutorial power."

The brief was notable for the wide range of former prosecutors who signed it—11 of them in all, Republicans and Democrats, and many of them from Texas.

In May, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals told a lower court to take another look at Mason's conviction, raising the possibility that this miscarriage of justice might eventually be righted.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

As the Times's story makes clear, Mason's story is all too common. While it's important to take election security seriously—and we do—we must also keep perspective when partisan politicians and far-right pundits raise alarms about voter fraud. It's almost always about something else: sowing doubt about our free and fair elections.

State of the States

In Georgia, surveillance video published this week by CNN shows that a woman who posed as a fake elector for former President Trump also escorted two operatives into the Coffee County election office in January 2021, on the same day that a voting system there was breached. That breach is under investigation by the Georgia Bureau of Investigation and by Fulton County District Attorney Fani Willis, who is conducting a wide-ranging probe of efforts to overturn the 2020 election results in Georgia. Video reviewed by The Washington Post shows that Doug Logan, the former CEO of Cyber Ninjas, also visited the Coffee County election office twice in January 2021. Cyber Ninjas was later contracted by the Arizona Senate to run an unprofessional sham audit of the results in that state. Logan also faces a criminal probe in Michigan.

In Michigan, six plaintiffs, including a local clerk, filed a federal lawsuit seeking to decertify the results of the 2020 election—a step that has no basis in the law or the Constitution. President Biden won the state by more than 150,000 votes, and the result has been upheld repeatedly. As a spokesman for Secretary of State Jocelyn Benson told The Detroit News, the 2020 election in Michigan "was the most scrutinized election in state history," and "more than 250 audits, the state Senate Oversight Committee, and the state's Auditor General all affirmed the integrity and accuracy of the election." A previous suit that sought to overturn the Michigan results failed last year, and a judge called it "a historic and profound abuse of the judicial process."

In the News

PolitiFact: Fact-checking Joe Biden's speech about democracy before the 2022 midterms. By Louis Jacobson and Amy Sherman.

"... The States United Democracy Center, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit group, has been tracking legislation nationwide that would allow state legislatures to interfere with elections, by usurping control over election results, requiring partisan 'audits' of results or creating burdens for election officials such as requiring them to count all ballots by hand. A few states have considered bills that would give legislators the power to reject election results, but none has passed in 2022, although a few bills remain pending in Pennsylvania."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Heartland Signal: Democracy is on the ballot this fall. Let's thank those that brought the threat to light and led the early effort to turn the tide. Then let's get back to work. By Edwin Eisendrath.

"... Americans have not shrunk in fear. Instead, we enter this all-important election season ready for the fight. Speaking for myself, I begin the campaign season with gratitude. Here are some who have helped turn the tide, especially in the last two years. ... Americans joined together to find new ways to identify the nature of the attack on our democracy, to uncover its funding sources, to testify to the threat. States United Democracy Center and Pen America show the breadth of the effort."

The New York Times: Cameras, Plexiglass, Fireproofing: Election Officials Beef Up Security. By Neil Vigdor.

"As the nation hurtles closer to the midterm elections, those who will oversee them are taking a range of steps to beef up security for themselves, their employees, polling places and even drop boxes, tapping state and federal funding for a new set of defenses. The heightened vigilance comes as violent rhetoric from the right intensifies and as efforts to intimidate election officials by those who refuse to accept the results of the 2020 election become commonplace."

The Arizona Republic: Arizona State Bar investigates lawyer involved in 'fake electors' effort by state Republicans. By Ronald J. Hansen.

"The State Bar of Arizona is investigating multiple attorneys related to the 2020 election, with one inquiry requesting the emails of a lawyer who was prominently involved in assembling the 'fake electors' who falsely claimed then-President Donald Trump won the state."

Arizona Mirror: Brnovich joins 12 other GOP AGs in 'independent state legislature' case. By Jerod MacDonald-Evoy.

"Arizona Attorney General Mark Brnovich joined 12 other Republican attorneys general backing North Carolina's GOP-led legislature in a U.S. Supreme Court case that could drastically alter how federal elections are conducted, handing more power to state legislatures and blocking state courts from intervening."

Reuters: Top state court judges defend their election oversight at U.S. Supreme Court. By Nate Raymond.

"A group representing the top judges in all 50 states is urging the U.S. Supreme Court not to shield actions taken by state legislatures affecting federal elections—such as reconfiguring electoral districts and imposing voting restrictions—from the scrutiny of state courts.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Clip of the Week

Michigan Secretary of State Jocelyn Benson joined CBS's "Face the Nation" to talk about how state officials are making sure we have a "healthy, robust, transparent democracy where everyone can have confidence that their vote is counted and their voice is heard." She drew a distinction between honest questions about the process and efforts to undermine our elections:

We're Hiring!

The States United team is growing. We're building out key positions as we work to protect the integrity of our elections and serve as a resource to state leaders. You can check out our open positions and apply here.

Follow States United on Twitter and Facebook to stay up-to-date!

The States United newsletter will be on hiatus next week.
It will return Friday, Sept. 23.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

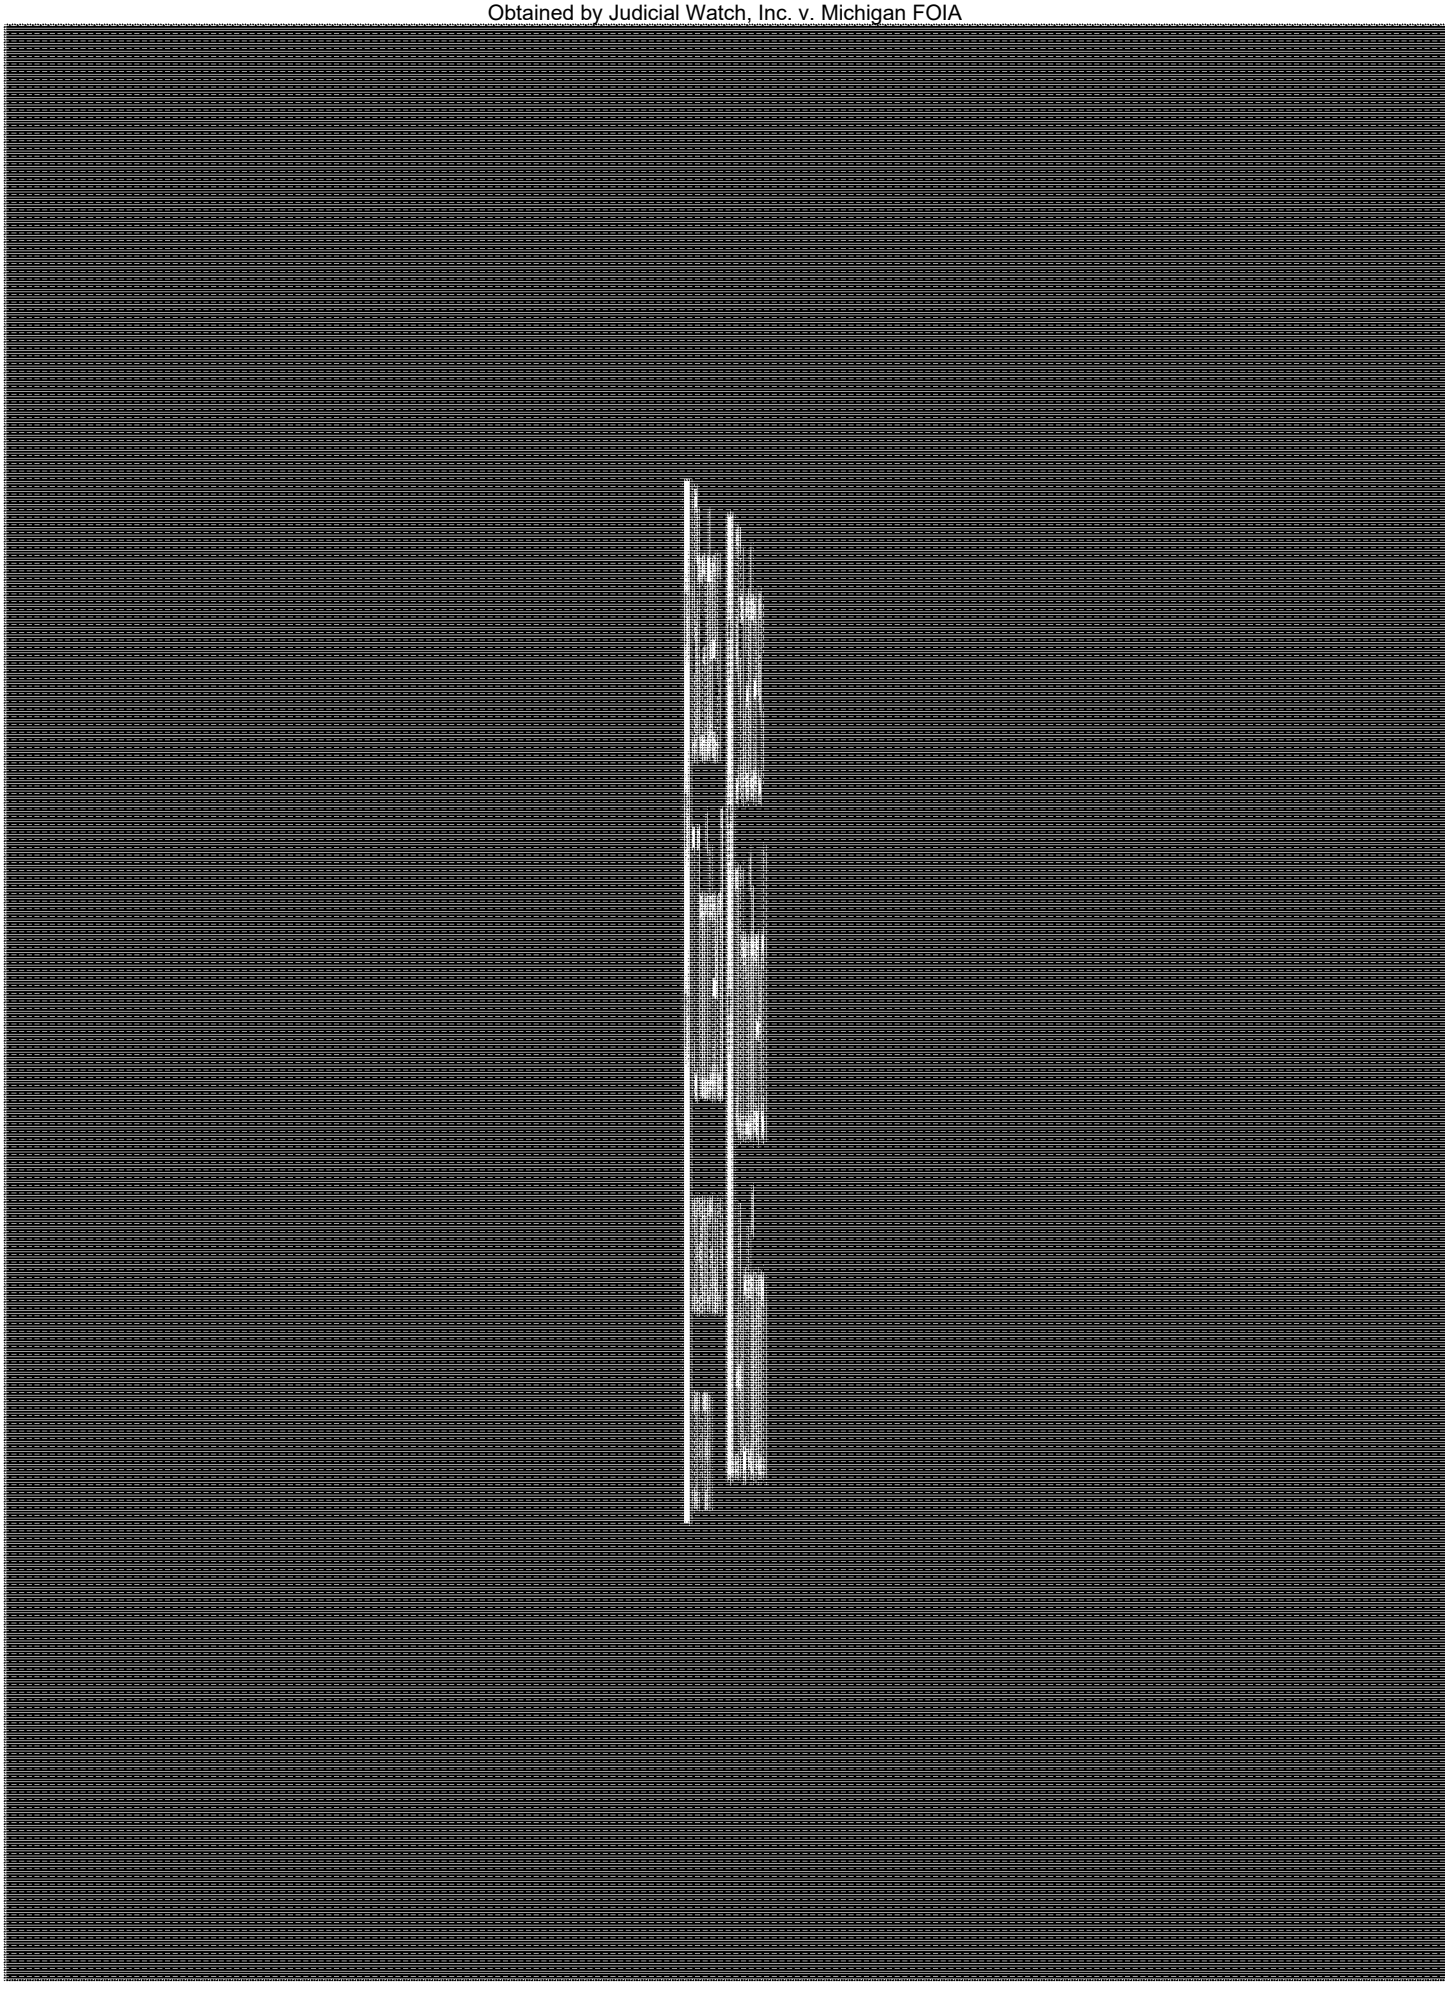
About the States United Democracy Center

The States United Democracy Center is a nonpartisan organization advancing free, fair, and secure elections. We focus on connecting state officials, law enforcement leaders, and pro-democracy partners across America with the tools and expertise they need to safeguard our democracy. We are more than a think tank—we are an action tank. And together, we are committed to making sure every vote is counted, every voice is heard, and every election is safe. To learn more, visit www.statesuniteddemocracy.org.

About States United Action

States United Action is a nonpartisan section 501(c)(4) nonprofit organization with a mission to protect our elections and our democracy. States United Action advocates for policies that protect election integrity, hold democracy violators accountable, and prevent political violence that threatens to undermine the will of the American people, and amplifies the voices of state leaders and law enforcement leaders who share these values. To learn more, visit www.statesuniteddemocracy.org/states-united-action.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA



Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

This email was sent to meingasth@michigan.gov

why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

States United Democracy Center · 1420 K Street NW · Ste 800 · Washington, DC 20005-3377 · USA

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/1/2023 5:54:42 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: Automatic reply: 14.3 case status--privileged

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

I am traveling on business through Thursday and will be delayed in responding to your message. If this is urgent, please contact another member of the States United team.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/1/2023 5:40:11 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: 14.3 tracker
Attachments: 14A Litigation tracker (Nov.30).docx

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Heather,

Please find attached the 14.3 Litigation Tracker for this week with updates highlighted. Items of note are below.

Colorado:

In Anderson v. Griswold:

- Oral argument in the Colorado Supreme Court will be held on December 6. A live feed should be available here: https://www.courts.state.co.us/Courts/live/

Michigan

In LaBrant v. Benson:

- The Michigan Court of Appeals granted a motion for immediate consideration. Trump's motion to intervene was granted.
- The court agreed to an expedited schedule; briefs are due on November 30 and December 6, and replies are due December 8 with no extensions. A decision will be made without oral argument.

New Hampshire

- In Castro v. Scanlan, the First Circuit affirmed the district court's dismissal based on standing grounds. The court held that Castro failed to show that he was a "direct and current competitor" of Trump for the 2024 New Hampshire primary at the time his complaint was filed, and accordingly, he failed to show a concrete and particularized injury-in-fact required to establish standing.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Teszlewicz, Barbara (AG) [teszlewiczb@michigan.gov] on behalf of Grossi, Christina (AG) [GrossiC@michigan.gov]
Sent: 10/6/2022 5:52:02 PM
To: Brady, Mike (MDOS) [BradyM@michigan.gov]; Bagley, Nick [BagleyN1@michigan.gov]; Dax Goldstein [dax@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Sargent, Aubrey (AG) [SargentA1@michigan.gov]; Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]; Hagaman-Clark, Danielle (AG) [HagamanClarkD@michigan.gov]; 'katie@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [katie@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; 'caroline@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [caroline@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; 'kk@isdglobal.org' [kk@isdglobal.org]; 'jdc@isdglobal.org' [jdc@isdglobal.org]; 'janae@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [janae@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; 'lizzie@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [lizzie@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; 'jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; 'ij@isdglobal.org' [ij@isdglobal.org]; 'jr@isdglobal.org' [jr@isdglobal.org]; 'jd@isdglobal.org' [jd@isdglobal.org]; 'jh@isdglobal.org' [jh@isdglobal.org]; 'kerrin@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [kerrin@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; McCann, Amber (AG) [McCannA@michigan.gov]; 'greg@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [greg@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; 'sharon@statesuniteddemocracy.org' [sharon@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
CC: Sitts, Jennifer (MDOS) [SittsJ@michigan.gov]; Teegardin, Rachel [TeegardinR1@michigan.gov]; Hill, Darryl (MDOS) [HillD16@michigan.gov]; Rollow, Jake (MDOS) [RollowJ@michigan.gov]; Brater, Jonathan (MDOS) [BraterJ@michigan.gov]; Smiley, Melissa (MDOS) [SmileyM1@michigan.gov]; Weare, Jessica [WeareJ@michigan.gov]

Subject: Weekly Call re: Wk Prod MCL 15.243(1)(h)
Location: Microsoft Teams Meeting

Start: 7/28/2022 4:00:00 PM
End: 7/28/2022 4:30:00 PM
Show Time As: Tentative

Recurrence: Weekly
every Thursday from 12:00 PM to 12:30 PM
Required Attendees: Brady, Mike (MDOS); Bagley, Nick; Dax Goldstein; Sargent, Aubrey (AG); Meingast, Heather (AG); Hagaman-Clark, Danielle (AG); 'katie@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; 'caroline@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; 'kk@isdglobal.org'; 'jdc@isdglobal.org'; 'janae@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; 'lizzie@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; 'jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; 'ij@isdglobal.org'; 'jr@isdglobal.org'; 'jd@isdglobal.org'; 'jh@isdglobal.org'; 'kerrin@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; McCann, Amber (AG); 'greg@statesuniteddemocracy.org'; sharon@statesuniteddemocracy.org
Optional Attendees: Sitts, Jennifer (MDOS); Teegardin, Rachel; Hill, Darryl (MDOS); Rollow, Jake (MDOS); Brater, Jonathan (MDOS); Smiley, Melissa (MDOS); Weare, Jessica

10/6: Changing calls to weekly instead of bi-weekly

10/5: added sharon@statesuniteddemocracy.org

9/27: added greg@statesuniteddemocracy.org

9/8: added kerrin@statesuniteddemocracy.org

8/22: added

- ij@isdglobal.org
- jr@isdglobal.org
- jd@isdglobal.org
- jh@isdglobal.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Microsoft Teams meeting

Join on your computer or mobile app
Click here to join the meeting

Or join by entering a meeting ID
Meeting ID: Security MCL 15.243(1)(u)
Passcode:

Or call in (audio only)
Security MCL 15.243(1)(u) United States, Pontiac
Phone Conference ID: Security MCL 15.243(1)(u)
Find a local number | Reset PIN

Learn More | Meeting options

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/5/2023 10:00:56 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: New MI-relevant January 6 filing
Attachments: 2023.12.05 404(b) Notice.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Hi Heather,

A/C Priv MCL 15.243(1)(g)

Happy to discuss any questions you might have.

Best,

Jonathan

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA	*
	*
v.	*	CRIMINAL NO. 23-cr-257 (TSC)
	*
DONALD J. TRUMP,	*
	*
Defendant.	*
	*

GOVERNMENT'S NOTICE PURSUANT TO FEDERAL RULE OF EVIDENCE 404(b)

The Government will provide the defendant and the Court extensive advance notice of the intrinsic evidence it plans to introduce at trial, including through its exhibit and witness lists, motions in limine, and a detailed trial brief setting forth the Government's planned trial presentation. In an abundance of caution, the Government below notices evidence that, although intrinsic to the charged crimes, pre- or post-dates the charged criminal conspiracies. If the Court were to find that any part of the noticed evidence below is extrinsic, the evidence is also admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b), because the Government will offer it not to show the defendant's criminal propensity, but to establish his motive, intent, preparation, knowledge, absence of mistake, and common plan.

A. Historical Evidence of the Defendant's Consistent Plan of Baselessly Claiming Election Fraud

As set forth in the indictment, the defendant's criminal conspiracies relied on his knowingly false claims of election fraud. See, e.g., ECF No. 1 at ¶ 2, 4. At trial, the Government will introduce a number of public statements by the defendant in advance of the charged conspiracies, claiming that there would be fraud in the 2020 presidential election. These statements sowed mistrust in the results of the presidential election and laid the foundation for the defendant's criminal efforts. In addition to this intrinsic evidence of false statements about the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2020 election, the Government will offer evidence reflecting the defendant's historical record of making such claims. For example, as early as November 2012, the defendant issued a public tweet making baseless claims that voting machines had switched votes from then-candidate Romney to then-candidate Obama. During the 2016 presidential campaign, the defendant claimed repeatedly, with no basis, that there was widespread voter fraud—including through public statements and tweets (for instance, on October 17, 2016, tweeting, "Of course there is large scale fraud happening on and before election day. Why do Republican leaders deny what is going on? So naive!"). The defendant's false claims about the 2012 and 2016 elections are admissible because they demonstrate the defendant's common plan of falsely blaming fraud for election results he does not like, as well as his motive, intent, and plan to obstruct the certification of the 2020 election results and illegitimately retain power.

B. Historical Evidence of the Defendant's Common Plan to Refuse to Commit to a Peaceful Transition of Power

To ensure the destabilizing impact of his widespread election fraud claims, in the run-up to the 2020 election, the defendant repeatedly refused to commit to a peaceful transition of presidential power if he lost the election. The Government will offer proof of this refusal as intrinsic evidence of the defendant's criminal conspiracies because it shows his plan to remain in power at any cost—even in the face of potential violence. For instance, at a September 23, 2020, news conference the defendant was asked whether, "win, lose or draw in this election," in light of "rioting in many cities across this country—red and—your so called red and blue states," he would "commit to making sure there is a peaceful transferal of power after the election." The defendant responded, "Well, we're going to have to see what happens. You know that. I've been complaining very strongly about the ballots. And the ballots are a disaster. And, and--". A reporter interrupted the defendant and repeated, "I understand that, but people are rioting; do you commit to making sure there is a peaceful transferal of power?" The defendant responded, "I know. I know. We want to have—get rid of the ballots and you'll have a very trans—we'll have a very peaceful—there won't be a transfer, frankly; there'll be a continuation. The ballots are out of control. You know it."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Similarly, the Government will offer evidence that the defendant pursued the same strategy four years earlier, in 2016. In the presidential debate on October 19, 2016, the defendant was asked whether he would accept the results of that election, to which he responded that he would "look at it at the time." The debate moderator followed up, "There is a tradition in this country—in fact, one of the prides of this country—is the peaceful transition of power and that no matter how hard-fought a campaign is, that at the end of the campaign that the loser concedes to the winner . . . and that the country comes together in part for the good of the country. Are you saying you're not prepared now to commit to that principle?" The defendant responded, "What I'm saying is that I will tell you at the time. I'll keep you in suspense. OK?" The defendant's consistent refusal to commit to a peaceful transition of power, dating back to the 2016 presidential campaign, is admissible evidence of his plan to undermine the integrity of the presidential transition process when faced with the possibility of an election result that he would not like, as well as his motive, intent, and plan to interfere with the implementation of an election result with which he was not satisfied.

C. Evidence of the Defendant and Co-Conspirators' Knowledge of the Unfavorable Election Results and Motive and Intent to Subvert Them

The indictment lists multiple examples of the defendant's efforts, during the charged conspiracies, to pressure state officials to change election results or appoint invalid electors in spite of the election results. See, e.g., ECF No. 1 at ¶¶ 15, 24, 31, 35. The Government also plans to introduce evidence of an effort undertaken by an agent (and unindicted co-conspirator) of the defendant who worked for his campaign ("the Campaign Employee") to, immediately following the election, obstruct the vote count. On November 4, 2020, the Campaign Employee exchanged a series of text messages with an attorney supporting the Campaign's election day operations at the TCF Center in Detroit, where votes were being counted; in the messages, the Campaign Employee encouraged rioting and other methods of obstruction when he learned that the vote count was trending in favor of the defendant's opponent. [redacted] The Government will also show that around the time of these messages, an election official at the TCF Center observed that as Biden began to take the lead, a large number of untrained individuals flooded the TCF Center and began making illegitimate and aggressive challenges to the vote count. Thereafter, Trump made repeated false claims regarding election activities at the TCF Center, when in truth his agent was seeking to cause a riot to disrupt the count. This evidence is admissible to demonstrate that the defendant, his co-conspirators, and agents had knowledge that the defendant had lost the election, as well as their intent and motive to obstruct and overturn the legitimate results.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

D. Pre- and Post-Conspiracy Evidence That the Defendant and Co-Conspirators Suppressed Proof Their Fraud Claims Were False and Retaliated Against Officials Who Undermined Their Criminal Plans

The indictment provides evidence that the defendant repeatedly sidelined advisors and officials who told him or the public the truth about the election results, and who pushed back on his false claims. See, e.g., ECF No. 1 at ¶¶ 11d, 13, 92. The Government will introduce additional evidence that this was the plan of the defendant and his co-conspirators, and that even after the charged conspiracies, they continued their efforts to stifle any dissent to their false claims of election fraud.

One such example is the effort by the defendant and Co-Conspirator 1, beginning during the charged conspiracies and stretching into the summer of 2021, to retaliate against the former Chief Counsel to the Republican National Committee (RNC) for publicly refuting the defendant and Co-Conspirator 1's lies about election fraud. [redacted]

The Government will also introduce post-conspiracy evidence of continued retaliation against the Chief Counsel for publicly speaking the truth about the falsity of the defendant's claims—including the defendant, [redacted]

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Finally, in the summer of 2021, Co-Conspirator 1 took to Twitter to publicly attack the Chief Counsel over the same issue.

The defendant and his co-conspirators' and agents' aggression in stifling dissent against election fraud claims before, during, and after the charged conspiracies is admissible to demonstrate the defendant and his co-conspirators' knowledge that their fraud claims were false, to establish their plan for depicting their election lies as true, and to show their intent to silence anyone who refuted their false claims.

E. Pre- and Post-Conspiracy Evidence of the Defendant's Public Attacks on Individuals, Encouragement of Violence, and Knowledge of the Foreseeable Consequences

As the Government has set forth at length in briefing related to the Court's Rule 57.7 Order, see, e.g., ECF Nos. 57 and 64, the defendant has an established pattern of using public statements and social media posts to subject his perceived adversaries to threats and harassment. See ECF Nos. 57, 64, 120. The indictment includes examples of the defendant's targeting, including against his Vice President. See ECF No. 1 at ¶ 97. At trial, the Government will introduce evidence of this conduct—including the defendant's public endorsement and encouragement of violence—and further will elicit testimony from witnesses about the threats and harassment they received after the defendant targeted them in relation to the 2020 election.

The Government plans to introduce evidence from the period in advance of the charged conspiracies that demonstrates the defendant's encouragement of violence. For instance, in response to a question during the September 29, 2020, presidential debate asking him to denounce the extremist group the Proud Boys, the defendant instead spoke publicly to them and told them to "stand back and stand by." Members of the group embraced the defendant's words as an endorsement and printed merchandise with them as a rallying cry. As discussed below, after the Proud Boys and other extremist groups participated in obstructing the congressional certification on January 6, the defendant made clear that they were acting consistent with his intent and direction in doing so.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Long after the charged conduct, the defendant continued to falsely attack two Georgia election workers despite being on notice that his claims about them in 2020 were false and had subjected them to vile, racist, and violent threats and harassment. As set forth in the indictment, during the charged conspiracy, the defendant and his co-conspirators spread knowing lies about the election workers and inspired death threats against them. See ECF No. 1 at ¶¶ 26, 29, 31a. In late December 2022, the House Select Committee to Investigate the January 6th Attack on the U.S. Capitol published transcripts of its interviews with the election workers, in which the women provided graphic testimony about the threats and harassment they endured after the defendant and his agents falsely accused them. In apparent response, the defendant then doubled down and recommenced his attacks on the election workers in posts on Truth Social. He even zeroed in on one of the election workers, falsely writing that she was an election fraudster, a liar, and one of the "treacher[ous] . . . monsters" who stole the country, and that she would be in legal trouble.

The Government will introduce such evidence to further establish the defendant and his co-conspirators' plan of silencing, and intent to silence, those who spoke out against the defendant's false election fraud claims; the defendant's knowledge that his public attacks on officials—like those on his Vice President as described in the indictment—could foreseeably lead to threats, harassment, and violence; and the defendant's repeated choice to attack individuals with full knowledge of this effect. It also constitutes after-the-fact corroboration of the defendant's intent, because even after it was incontrovertibly clear that the defendant's public false claims targeting individuals caused them harassment and threats, the defendant persisted—meaning that the jury may properly infer that he intended that result. Finally, evidence of the defendant's encouragement of violence and the consequences of his public attacks is admissible to allow the jury to consider the credibility and motives of witnesses who may be the continuing victims of the defendant's attacks.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

F. Post-Conspiracy Evidence of the Defendant's Steadfast Support and Endorsement of Rioters

As described in the Government's opposition to the defendant's motion to strike language from the indictment, ECF No. 140, the Government plans to introduce evidence at trial showing that in the years since the January 6 attack on the Capitol, the defendant has openly and proudly supported individuals who criminally participated in obstructing the congressional certification that day, including by suggesting that he will pardon them if re-elected, even as he has conceded that he had the ability to influence their actions during the attack.

Of particular note are the specific January 6 offenders whom the defendant has supported—namely, individuals convicted of some of the most serious crimes charged in relation to January 6, such as seditious conspiracy and violent assaults on police officers. During a September 17, 2023, appearance on Meet the Press, for instance, the defendant said regarding Proud Boys leader Enrique Tarrio—who was convicted of seditious conspiracy—"I want to tell you, he and other people have been treated horribly." The defendant then criticized the kinds of lengthy sentences received only by defendants who, like Tarrio, committed the most serious crimes on January 6. Similarly, the defendant has chosen to publicly and vocally support the "January 6 Choir," a group of defendants held at the District of Columbia jail, many of whose criminal history and/or crimes on January 6 were so violent that their pretrial release would pose a danger to the public. The defendant nonetheless has financially supported and celebrated these offenders—many of whom assaulted law enforcement on January 6—by promoting and playing their recording of the National Anthem at political rallies and calling them "hostages."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Evidence of the defendant's post-conspiracy embrace of particularly violent and notorious rioters is admissible to establish the defendant's motive and intent on January 6—that he sent supporters, including groups like the Proud Boys, whom he knew were angry, and whom he now calls "patriots," to the Capitol to achieve the criminal objective of obstructing the congressional certification. In addition, his statements in this time period agreeing that he then held, and still holds, enormous influence over his supporters' actions is evidence of his knowledge and intent to obstruct the certification, as he chose not to exercise that influence to mitigate the violence on January 6. Perhaps most importantly, the defendant's embrace of January 6 rioters is evidence of his intent during the charged conspiracies, because it shows that these individuals acted as he directed them to act; indeed, this evidence shows that the rioters' disruption of the certification proceeding is exactly what the defendant intended on January 6. And finally, evidence of the defendant's statements regarding possible pardons for January 6 offenders is admissible to help the jury assess the credibility and motives of trial witnesses, because through such comments, the defendant is publicly signaling that the law does not apply to those who act at his urging regardless of the legality of their actions.

Respectfully submitted,

Jack Smith
Special Counsel

/s/Molly Gaston
Molly Gaston
Thomas P. Windom
Senior Assistant Special Counsels
950 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Room B-206
Washington, D.C. 20530

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/11/2023 2:21:31 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]; Zack Goldberg [zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Robert Cotter [Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org]

Subject: Check-in
Location: Microsoft Teams Meeting

Start: 12/11/2023 3:30:00 PM
End: 12/11/2023 4:00:00 PM
Show Time As: Tentative

Recurrence: (none)

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Microsoft Teams meeting

Join on your computer, mobile app or room device
Click here to join the meeting

Meeting ID: Security MCL 15.243(1)(u)
Passcode:
Download Teams | Join on the web

Or call in (audio only)
Security MCL 15.243(1)(u) United States, New York City
Phone Conference ID: Security MCL 15.243(1)(u)
Find a local number | Reset PIN

Learn More | Meeting options

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/11/2023 3:26:38 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: 14.3 litigation tracker
Attachments: 14A Litigation tracker (Dec. 7)[66].docx

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Hi Heather,

Please find attached last week's 14.3 Litigation Tracker (coming to you late thanks to my first bout of Covid). Items of note are below.

Colorado:

Anderson v. Griswold:

- The Colorado Supreme Court heard oral argument on December 6. Several justices questioned the trial court's conclusion that the president is not an "officer of the United States." But they seemed to be skeptical of CREW's arguments as well, particularly on the question of the Secretary's authority to exclude a candidate from the ballot and whether prudential concerns weigh in favor of finding the matter nonjusticiable.

Michigan

LaBrant v. Benson:

- The appeal before the Michigan Court of Appeals will be fully briefed and submitted on Friday, December 8. No oral argument will be held.
- The Michigan Supreme Court declined to hear the case before it is considered by the Court of Appeals.

Oregon

Nelson v. Griffin-Valade:

- On December 6, Free Speech for People filed a petition for a writ of mandamus on behalf of Oregon voters in the Oregon Supreme Court. The petition asks the court to issue a writ requiring the Secretary of State to exclude Trump from the primary and general ballots in Oregon in 2024.

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/11/2023 3:37:53 PM
To: Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]
Subject: NV letter
Attachments: 689766361-RNC-letter-to-Nevada-Secretary-of-State[41].pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Consovoy McCarthy PLLC
1600 Wilson Boulevard, Suite 700
Arlington, VA 22209
703.243.9423
www.consovoymccarthy.com

December 4, 2023

Francisco V. Aguilar
Nevada Secretary of State
101 N Carson Street, Suite 3
Carson City, NV 89701

Dear Secretary Aguilar:

As you are aware, the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) requires States to maintain an accurate and current voter registration roll for elections for federal office. Based on our analysis, Nevada is in violation of Section 8 of the NVRA. By comparing publicly available voter registration records with the U.S. Census Bureau's 2021 citizen voting age population data, we have determined that three counties have more registered active voters than adult citizens over the age of 18. We have identified five other counties that have voter registration rates that exceed 90 percent of adult citizens over the age of 18, a figure that far eclipses the voter registration rate nationwide in recent elections. This evidence shows that your office and officials in these counties are not conducting appropriate list maintenance to ensure that the voter registration roll is accurate and current, as required by federal law.

Congress enacted the NVRA "to protect the integrity of the electoral process." 52 U.S.C. §20501(b)(3). Specifically, it enacted Section 8 "to ensure that accurate and current voter registration rolls are maintained." Id. §20501(b)(4). Retaining voter rolls bloated with ineligible voters harms the electoral process, heightens the risk of electoral fraud, and undermines public confidence in elections. After all, "[c]onfidence in the integrity of our electoral processes is essential to the functioning of our participatory democracy." Purcell v. Gonzalez, 549 U.S. 1, 4 (2006) (per curiam). Section 8 of the NVRA obligates States to "conduct a general program that makes a reasonable effort to remove the names of ineligible voters from the official lists of eligible voters" due to death or change of residence. 52 U.S.C. §20507(a)(4). And as the U.S. Supreme Court has recently confirmed, "federal law makes this removal mandatory." Husted v. A. Philip Randolph Institute, 138 S. Ct. 1833, 1842 (2018).

This letter provides statutory notice that the Republican National Committee, Nevada Republican Party, and Scott Johnston, acting as political parties and a registered Nevada voter with substantial interests in secure elections, will bring a lawsuit against you and, if appropriate, against the counties named in this letter, if you fail to take specific actions to correct these violations of Section 8 within the 90-day timeframe specified in federal law. See Green v. Bell, No. 321-cv-00493, 2023 WL 2572210, at *3 (W.D.N.C. Mar. 20, 2023). Furthermore, while we hope to avoid litigation, we still formally request that the Nevada Secretary of State and the eight counties named in this letter (if they maintain separate records) act to preserve documents as required by Section 8(i) of the NVRA. 52 U.S.C. §20507(i)(1)-(2).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

As the Secretary of State, you are responsible for coordinating the required statewide list maintenance under the NVRA. The NVRA requires each State to "designate a State officer or employee as the chief State election official to be responsible for coordination of State responsibilities under" the law. Id. §20509. Nevada law designates the Secretary of State as the State's chief election officer charged with overseeing and maintaining voter registration. See Nev. Rev. Stat. §293.675. This letter explains how we concluded that Nevada and the eight named counties are violating Section 8 of the NVRA, and the curative steps needed to avoid litigation.

I. The NVRA protects election integrity by requiring States to make reasonable efforts to maintain accurate and current lists of registered active voters.

Nevada's voter registration list maintenance program must be "uniform, non-discriminatory, and in compliance with the Voting Rights Act." 52 U.S.C. §20507(b)(1). Section 8 requires that States "remove the names of ineligible voters from the official lists of eligible voters by reason of (A) the death of the registrant; or (B) a change in the residence of the registrant" to outside of his or her current voting jurisdiction. Id. §20507(4)(A)-(B).

Additionally, the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) mandates that States adopt computerized statewide voter registration lists and maintain them "on a regular basis" in accordance with the NVRA. Id. §21083(a)(2)(A). States must "ensure that voter registration records in the State are accurate and are updated regularly," a process which must include making a "reasonable effort to remove registrants who are ineligible to vote from the official list of eligible voters." Id. §21083(a)(4). HAVA's list maintenance mandates include coordination with "State agency records on death" and "State agency records on felony status" to facilitate the removal of individuals who are deceased or rendered ineligible under State law due to felony conviction. Id. §21083(a)(2)(A)(ii)(I)-(II).

As the chief election official for Nevada, the responsibility rests with you to coordinate and oversee the list maintenance activities of local and county election officials. See, e.g., Scott v. Schedler, 771 F.3d 831, 839 (5th Cir. 2014) ("[T]he NVRA's centralization of responsibility counsels against … buck passing."); United States v. Missouri, 535 F.3d 844, 850 (8th Cir. 2008) (explaining that a State or chief election official "may not delegate the responsibility to conduct a general program to a local official and thereby avoid responsibility if such a program is not reasonably conducted"); see also, e.g., Nev. Rev. Stat. §293.675 (setting forth requirements for the Secretary of State to conduct regular voting list maintenance activities).

II. Three Nevada counties have more registered active voters than voting-eligible citizens, and five others have suspiciously high rates of voter registration.

Based on data gathered from the U.S. Census Bureau's 2021 citizen voting age population data and the most up-to-date count of registered active voters available from the Nevada Secretary of State, Nevada is failing to meet its list maintenance obligations. Comparing the registered active voter count to the 2021 Census data reveals that these three counties have greater than 100 percent voter registration: Douglas (105%), Lyon (106%), and Storey (114%).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

In other words, there are more registered voters than eligible voters. This impossible statistic shows that voter registration records are not being maintained. Meanwhile, five other counties across the State have voter registration rates of 90 percent or greater: Carson City (92%), Churchill (90%), Clark (92%), Eureka (91%), and Washoe (92%).

These voter registration rates are abnormally or, in the case of counties with greater than 100 percent registration, impossibly high. This constitutes strong evidence that Nevada's voter rolls are not being properly maintained. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, only 69.1% of the citizen voting-age population was registered nationwide in the November 2022 election. See U.S. Census Bureau, Voting and Registration in the Election of November 2020, Table 4a, Reported Voting and Registration of the Total Voting-Age Population, for States: November 2022, perma.cc/XQ3R-E4FT. Similarly, only 72.7% of the citizen voting-age population was registered nationwide in the November 2020 election. See U.S. Census Bureau, Voting and Registration in the Election of November 2020, Table 4a, Reported Voting and Registration, for States: November 2020, perma.cc/7BUT-ZLDA. The U.S. Census Bureau further reported that Nevada's statewide voter registration rates for the 2022 and 2020 elections were 65.1% and 66.2% of the citizen voting-age population, respectively. Id. Thus, these eight counties are significant outliers, touting voter registration rates 17 to 45 percentage points higher than the national figures from 2022 and 2020, and 23 to 49 percentage points above the State figures for the same period. Discrepancies on this scale cannot be attributed to above-average voter participation and instead point to deficient list maintenance.

Nevada's failure to provide accurate voter rolls violates federal law, jeopardizes the integrity of the upcoming 2024 federal election, and signals to voters that elections in Nevada are not being properly safeguarded.

III. Avoiding litigation

The NVRA includes a private right of action, empowering any "person who is aggrieved by a violation" of the statute to bring a civil action in federal district court for declaratory or injunctive relief. 52 U.S.C. §20510(b)(1)-(2); see Green, 2023 WL at *1-*7. If the violations we have identified are not corrected within 90 days of receipt of this letter, we will have to file a lawsuit. See 52 U.S.C. §20510(b)(2).

We hope to avoid litigation and would welcome immediate efforts by your office to bring Nevada into compliance with Section 8. We ask that you evaluate your current list maintenance procedures and protocols to identify the cause of the compliance failures discussed in this letter. We also ask that you modify your current list maintenance program to ensure that it is comprehensive, nondiscriminatory, and in compliance with federal law. Your list maintenance program must identify and remove these categories of individuals from the official lists of eligible voters:

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. All persons who are ineligible to vote by reason of a change in residence;
2. Deceased individuals;
3. Persons who are incarcerated;
4. All other ineligible voters.

We also ask that you, and should they want to respond separately, each named county, respond in writing within 45 days of the date of this letter. This response should fully describe the efforts, policies, and programs you are taking, or plan to undertake before the 2024 general election to bring Nevada into compliance with Section 8. This response should also note when you plan to begin and complete each specified measure and the results of any programs or activities you have already undertaken. We also ask you to advise us what policies are presently in place, or will be put in place, to ensure effective and routine coordination of list maintenance activities with the federal, state, and local entities outlined below. Finally, we seek a description of the specific steps you intend to take to ensure routine and effective list maintenance on a continuing basis beyond the 2024 election. To avoid litigation, we may seek certain reasonable assurances that you will affirmatively undertake these efforts, including the execution of a settlement agreement.

Should you refuse to comply with Section 8 and thus require legal action, you should know that the NVRA authorizes courts to award "reasonable attorney fees, including litigation expenses, and costs" to the prevailing party. 52 U.S.C. §20510(c). Therefore, if litigation ensues, you risk bearing the financial burden of the full cost of the litigation.

IV. Preservation of records

We also ask that you act to preserve certain records as required under the NVRA, should they be needed in the future or for possible litigation. 52 U.S.C. §20507(i). These documents and records include, but are not limited to:

1. A copy of the most recent voter registration database for the State of Nevada and for each named county, including pertinent information on each voter (name, date of birth, home address, voter activity, and active or inactive status);
2. Internal communications and emails of the Nevada Secretary of State's office, applicable county boards of elections, and any divisions, bureaus, offices, third party agents, and contractors relating to voter list maintenance;
3. All emails or other communications between the Nevada Secretary of State and county elections officials concerning their list maintenance activities, their duties to maintain accurate and current lists, and any consequences arising from a failure to do so;
4. All email or other communications between the Nevada Secretary of State and any State or federal offices and agencies, in which the Nevada Secretary of State seeks or obtains information about registered voters who have moved, been convicted and imprisoned, died, or are otherwise ineligible, for use in list maintenance activities; and

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

5. All email or other communications between the Nevada Secretary of State and any other State, as well as email and communications with the Electronic Registration Information Center, the American Association of Motor Vehicle Authorities, and the National Association for Public Health Statistics and Information Systems, regarding obtaining information about voters who are deceased or who have moved for use in list maintenance activities.

We look forward to working with you in a productive fashion to ensure the accuracy and currency of Nevada's voter rolls and to protect the integrity of its voting process. While we hope to avoid litigation, if we do not receive the requested response, and if Nevada fails to take the necessary curative steps to resolve the issues identified in this letter, you will be subject to a lawsuit seeking declaratory and injunctive relief.

We look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

/s/ Thomas R. McCarthy

Gilbert C. Dickey
Tiffany H. Bates
Conor D. Woodfin
CONSOVOY MCCARTHY PLLC
gilbert@consovoymccarthy.com tiffany@consovoymccarthy.com conor@consovoymccarthy.com

Thomas R. McCarthy
CONSOVOY MCCARTHY PLLC
1600 Wilson Boulevard
Suite 700
Arlington, VA 22209
(703) 243-9423
tom@consovoymccarthy.com

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/20/2023 1:32:11 AM
To: Hammoud, Fadwa (AG) [HammoudF1@michigan.gov]; Banghart-Linn, Linus (AG) [Banghart-LinnL@michigan.gov]; Aboona, Rebecca (AG) [AboonaR1@michigan.gov]; Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]; King-Piepenbrok, Pier (AG) [KingP1@michigan.gov]
Subject: Colorado Trump Decision--Privileged
Attachments: Anderson v. Griswold Opinion (Co. Supreme Court) 12.19.pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

All:

You may have seen that the Colorado Supreme Court just held that Trump is disqualified from the office of the President under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. The decision is attached here.

The court stayed the decision until January 4, 2024 contemplating review in the US Supreme Court:

"Therefore, to maintain the status quo pending any review by the U.S. Supreme Court, we stay our ruling until January 4, 2024 (the day before the Secretary's deadline to certify the content of the presidential primary ballot). If review is sought in the Supreme Court before the stay expires on January 4, 2024, then the stay shall remain in place, and the Secretary will continue to be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot, until the receipt of any order or mandate from the Supreme Court. "

We'll send a summary of the decision tomorrow.

Best,

Jonathan

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Opinions of the Colorado Supreme Court are available to the public and can be accessed through the Judicial Branch's homepage at http://www.courts.state.co.us. Opinions are also posted on the Colorado Bar Association's homepage at http://www.cobar.org.

ADVANCE SHEET HEADNOTE
December 19, 2023

2023 CO 63

No. 23SA300, Anderson v. Griswold—Election Law—Fourteenth Amendment—First Amendment—Political Questions—Hearsay.

In this appeal from a district court proceeding under the Colorado Election Code, the supreme court considers whether former President Donald J. Trump may appear on the Colorado Republican presidential primary ballot in 2024. A majority of the court holds that President Trump is disqualified from holding the office of President under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Because he is disqualified, it would be a wrongful act under the Election Code for the Colorado Secretary of State to list him as a candidate on the presidential primary ballot. The court stays its ruling until January 4, 2024, subject to any further appellate proceedings.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Supreme Court of the State of Colorado
2 East 14th Avenue • Denver, Colorado 80203

2023 CO 63

Supreme Court Case No. 23SA300
Appeal Pursuant to § 1-1-113(3), C.R.S. (2023)
District Court, City and County of Denver, Case No. 23CV32577
Honorable Sarah B. Wallace, Judge

Petitioners-Appellants/Cross-Appellees:

Norma Anderson, Michelle Priola, Claudine Cmarada, Krista Kafer, Kathi Wright, and Christopher Castilian,

v.

Respondent-Appellee:

Jena Griswold, in her official capacity as Colorado Secretary of State, and

Intervenor-Appellee:

Colorado Republican State Central Committee, an unincorporated association,

Intervenor-Appellee/Cross-Appellant:

Donald J. Trump.

Order Affirmed in Part and Reversed in Part en banc
December 19, 2023

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Attorneys for Petitioners-Appellants/Cross-Appellees:
KBN Law, LLC
Mario Nicolais
Lakewood, Colorado

Tierney Lawrence Stiles LLC
Martha M. Tierney
Denver, Colorado

Olson Grimsley Kawanabe Hinchcliff & Murray LLC
Eric Olson
Sean Grimsley
Jason Murray
Denver, Colorado

Donald Sherman
Nikhel Sus
Jonathan Maier
Washington, District of Columbia

Attorneys for Respondent-Appellee:
Philip J. Weiser, Attorney General
Michael Kotlarczyk, Senior Assistant Attorney General
Jennifer L. Sullivan, Deputy Attorney General
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Intervenor-Appellee Colorado Republican State Central Committee:
Melito Law LLC
Michael Melito
Denver, Colorado

Podoll & Podoll, P.C.
Robert A. Kitsmiller
Greenwood Village, Colorado

Attorneys for Intervenor-Appellee/Cross-Appellant Donald J. Trump:
Gessler Blue LLC
Scott E. Gessler
Geoffrey N. Blue
Greenwood Village, Colorado

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Floyd Abrams, Bruce Ackerman, Maryam Ahranjani, Lee C. Bollinger, Erwin Chemerinsky, Alan Chen, Kent Greenfield, Martha Minow, and Geoffrey R. Stone:
Keker Van Nest & Peters LLP
Steven A. Hirsch
San Francisco, California

Rathod Mohamedbhai LLC
Edward C. Hopkins Jr.
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Professors Carol Anderson and Ian Farrell:
Ballard Spahr LLP
Matthew A. Morr
Denver, Colorado

Ballard Spahr LLP
Burt M. Rublin
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Colorado Common Cause and Mary Estill Buchanan:
Rosenblatt, Gosch & Reinken, PLLC
William R. Reinken
Greenwood Village, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Constitutional Accountability Center:
Ernst Legal Group, LLC
Dan Ernst
Denver, Colorado

Amicus Curiae Treniss Jewell Evans III, pro se
Forney, Texas

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Free Speech for People:
Martinez Law Colorado, LLC
Anna N. Martinez
Denver, Colorado

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Martinez Law, LLC
Esteban A. Martinez
Longmont, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Mark A. Graber:
The Paul Wilkinson Law Firm LLC
Nelson Boyle
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Kansas Republican Party, Delaware Republican Party, Michigan Republican Party, North Dakota Republican Party, Oklahoma Republican Party, West Virginia Republican Party, Wisconsin Republican Party, Wyoming Republican Party, Delaware Republican Party, Georgia Republican Party, Nebraska Republican Party, Maine Republican Party, Idaho Republican Party, and Rhode Island Republican Party:
McGowne Law Offices, P.A.
Christopher J. McGowne
Hays, Kansas

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Kurt T. Lash:
Illingworth Law, LLC
David W. Illingworth II
Woodland Park, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Derek T. Muller:
Covenant Law PLLC
Ian Speir
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Republican National Committee, National Republican Senatorial Committee, and National Republican Congressional Committee:
Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck, LLP
Christopher O. Murray
Julian R. Ellis, Jr.
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae States of Indiana, West Virginia, Alabama, Alaska, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming:
Office of the Attorney General
James A. Barta, Solicitor General
Indianapolis, Indiana

Office of the Attorney General
Michael R. Williams, Principal Deputy Solicitor General
Charleston, West Virginia

Nussbaum Gleason
Andrew Nussbaum
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Seth Barrett Tillman:
The Reisch Law Firm, LLC
R. Scott Reisch
Jessica L. Hays
Denver, Colorado

Josh Blackman LLC
Josh Blackman
Houston, Texas

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Wyoming Secretary of State Chuck Gray, Missouri Secretary of State Jay Ashcroft, and Ohio Secretary of State Frank LaRose:
West Group Law & Policy
Suzanne M. Taheri
Denver, Colorado

PER CURIAM.
CHIEF JUSTICE BOATRIGHT dissented.
JUSTICE SAMOUR dissented.
JUSTICE BERKENKOTTER dissented.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

PER CURIAM.[1]

¶1 More than three months ago, a group of Colorado electors eligible to vote in the Republican presidential primary—both registered Republican and unaffiliated voters ("the Electors")—filed a lengthy petition in the District Court for the City and County of Denver ("Denver District Court" or "the district court"), asking the court to rule that former President Donald J. Trump ("President Trump") may not appear on the Colorado Republican presidential primary ballot.

¶2 Invoking provisions of Colorado's Uniform Election Code of 1992, §§ 1-1-101 to 1-13-804, C.R.S. (2023) (the "Election Code"), the Electors requested that the district court prohibit Jena Griswold, in her official capacity as Colorado's Secretary of State ("the Secretary"), from placing President Trump's name on the presidential primary ballot. They claimed that Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution ("Section Three") disqualified President Trump from seeking the presidency. More specifically, they asserted that he was ineligible under Section Three because he engaged in insurrection on January 6, 2021, after swearing an oath as President to support the U.S. Constitution.

---

[1] Consistent with past practice in election-related cases with accelerated timelines, we issue this opinion per curiam. E.g., Kuhn v. Williams, 2018 CO 30M, 418 P.3d 478; In re Colo. Gen. Assemb., 332 P.3d 108 (Colo. 2011); In re Reapportionment of Colo. Gen. Assemb., 647 P.2d 191 (Colo. 1982).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶3 After permitting President Trump and the Colorado Republican State Central Committee ("CRSCC"; collectively, "Intervenors") to intervene in the action below, the district court conducted a five-day trial. The court found by clear and convincing evidence that President Trump engaged in insurrection as those terms are used in Section Three. Anderson v. Griswold, No. 23CV32577, ¶¶ 241, 298 (Dist. Ct., City & Cnty. of Denver, Nov. 17, 2023). But, the district court concluded, Section Three does not apply to the President. Id. at ¶ 313. Therefore, the court denied the petition to keep President Trump off the presidential primary ballot. Id. at Part VI. Conclusion.

¶4 The Electors and President Trump sought this court's review of various rulings by the district court. We affirm in part and reverse in part. We hold as follows:

- The Election Code allows the Electors to challenge President Trump's status as a qualified candidate based on Section Three. Indeed, the Election Code provides the Electors their only viable means of litigating whether President Trump is disqualified from holding office under Section Three.
- Congress does not need to pass implementing legislation for Section Three's disqualification provision to attach, and Section Three is, in that sense, self-executing.
- Judicial review of President Trump's eligibility for office under Section Three is not precluded by the political question doctrine.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

- Section Three encompasses the office of the Presidency and someone who has taken an oath as President. On this point, the district court committed reversible error.
- The district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting portions of Congress's January 6 Report into evidence at trial.
- The district court did not err in concluding that the events at the U.S. Capitol on January 6, 2021, constituted an "insurrection."
- The district court did not err in concluding that President Trump "engaged in" that insurrection through his personal actions.
- President Trump's speech inciting the crowd that breached the U.S. Capitol on January 6, 2021, was not protected by the First Amendment.

¶5 The sum of these parts is this: President Trump is disqualified from holding the office of President under Section Three; because he is disqualified, it would be a wrongful act under the Election Code for the Secretary to list him as a candidate on the presidential primary ballot.

¶6 We do not reach these conclusions lightly. We are mindful of the magnitude and weight of the questions now before us. We are likewise mindful of our solemn duty to apply the law, without fear or favor, and without being swayed by public reaction to the decisions that the law mandates we reach.

¶7 We are also cognizant that we travel in uncharted territory, and that this case presents several issues of first impression. But for our resolution of the Electors' challenge under the Election Code, the Secretary would be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Therefore, to maintain the status quo pending any review by the U.S. Supreme Court, we stay our ruling until January 4, 2024 (the day before the Secretary's deadline to certify the content of the presidential primary ballot). If review is sought in the Supreme Court before the stay expires on January 4, 2024, then the stay shall remain in place, and the Secretary will continue to be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot, until the receipt of any order or mandate from the Supreme Court.

I. Background

¶8 On November 8, 2016, President Trump was elected as the forty-fifth President of the United States. He served in that role for four years.

¶9 On November 7, 2020, Joseph R. Biden, Jr., was elected as the forty-sixth President of the United States. President Trump refused to accept the results, but President Biden now occupies the office of the President.

¶10 On December 14, 2020, the Electoral College officially confirmed the results: 306 electoral votes for President Biden; 232 for President Trump. President Trump continued to challenge the outcome, both in the courts and in the media.

¶11 On January 6, 2021, pursuant to the Twelfth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XII, and the Electoral Count Act, 3 U.S.C. § 15, Congress convened a joint session to certify the Electoral College votes. President Trump held a rally that morning at the Ellipse in Washington, D.C. at which he, along with several others, spoke to the attendees. In his speech, which began around noon, President Trump persisted in rejecting the election results, telling his supporters that "[w]e won in a landslide" and "we will never concede." He urged his supporters to "confront this egregious assault on our democracy"; "walk down to the Capitol . . . [and] show strength"; and that if they did not "fight like hell, [they would] not . . . have a country anymore." Before his speech ended, portions of the crowd began moving toward the Capitol. Below, we discuss additional facts regarding the events of January 6, as relevant to the legal issues before us.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶12 Just before 4 a.m. the next morning, January 7, 2021, Vice President Michael R. Pence certified the electoral votes, officially confirming President Biden as President-elect of the United States.

¶13 President Trump now seeks the Colorado Republican Party's 2024 presidential nomination.

II. Procedural History

¶14 On September 6, 2023, the Electors initiated these proceedings against the Secretary in Denver District Court under sections 1-4-1204(4), 1-1-113(1), 13-51-105, C.R.S. (2023), and C.R.C.P. 57(a). In their Verified Petition, the Electors challenged the Secretary's authority to list President Trump "as a candidate on the 2024 Republican presidential primary election ballot and any future election ballot, based on his disqualification from public office under Section [Three]."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶15 President Trump intervened and almost immediately filed a Notice of Removal to federal court, asserting federal question jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1441(a), 1446. In light of the removal, the Denver District Court closed the case on September 8. On September 12, the federal district court remanded the case back to state court, concluding that it lacked jurisdiction because the Electors had no Article III standing and the Secretary had neither joined nor consented to the removal.

¶16 Once the Electors filed proof with the Denver District Court that all parties had been served, the court reopened the case on September 14. At a status conference four days later, on September 18, the Secretary emphasized that she must certify the candidates for the 2024 presidential primary ballot by January 5. See § 1-4-1204(1). The court set the matter for a five-day trial, beginning on October 30. On September 22, with the parties' input, the court issued expedited case management deadlines for a host of matters, including the disclosure of expert reports, witness lists and exhibits, as well as for briefing and argument on several motions. The court also granted CRSCC's motion to intervene on October 5.

¶17 On October 11, the Secretary's office received (1) President Trump's signed and notarized statement of intent to run as a candidate for a major political party in the presidential primary; (2) the approval form for him to do so, signed by the chair of the Colorado Republican Party, asserting that President Trump was "bona fide and affiliated with the [Republican] party"; and (3) the requisite filing fee. See § 1-4-1204(1)(c).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶18 On October 20, the district court issued an Omnibus Order addressing many outstanding motions. Regarding President Trump's motions, the court reached three conclusions that are relevant now: (1) the Electors' petition involved constitutional questions, but remained "a challenge against an election official based on her alleged duties under the Election Code," and "such a claim [was] proper under [section] 1-1-113 as a matter of procedure"; (2) "[section] 1-4-1204 expressly incorporates [section] 1-1-113, and [section] 1-1-113 does not limit challenges to acts that have already occurred, but rather provides for relief when the Secretary is 'about to' take an improper or wrongful act"—thus, because the Electors had alleged such an act, the matter was ripe for decision; and (3) it could not conclude, as a matter of law, that the Fourteenth Amendment excludes a candidate from the presidential primary ballot or that the Secretary has the authority to determine candidate qualifications, so those issues would be determined at the trial.

¶19 Regarding CRSCC's motions, the court, in relevant part, concluded that the state does not violate a political party's First Amendment associational rights by excluding constitutionally ineligible candidates from the presidential primary ballot, but also rejected CRSCC's argument to the extent it purported to raise an independent constitutional claim beyond the proper scope of a section 1-1-113 proceeding.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶20 On October 23, President Trump filed a petition for review in this court, asking us to exercise original jurisdiction to halt the scheduled trial. Four days later, we denied the petition without passing judgment on the merits of any of President Trump's contentions.

¶21 On October 25, the district court denied President Trump's Fourteenth-Amendment-based motion to dismiss. As relevant now, the court concluded that (1) it would not dismiss the case under the political question doctrine, but it reserved the right to revisit the doctrine "to the extent that there is any evidence or argument at trial that provides the Court with additional guidance on whether the issue of presidential eligibility has been delegated to the United States Congress"; (2) whether Section Three is self-executing is irrelevant because section 1-4-1204 allows the Secretary to exclude constitutionally disqualified candidates, and states "can, and have, applied Section [Three] pursuant to state statutes without federal enforcement legislation"; and (3) it would reserve for trial the issues of whether Section Three applies to a President and whether President Trump had engaged in insurrection.

¶22 The trial began, as scheduled, on October 30. The evidentiary portion lasted five days, with closing arguments almost two weeks later, on November 15.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

During those two weeks, the Electors, the Secretary, President Trump, and CRSCC submitted proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court issued its written final order on November 17, finding, by clear and convincing evidence, that the events of January 6 constituted an insurrection and President Trump engaged in that insurrection. The court further concluded, however, that Section Three does not apply to a President because, as the terms are used in Section Three, the Presidency is not an "office . . . under the United States" nor is the President "an officer of the United States" who had "previously taken an oath . . . to support the Constitution of the United States." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3; see Anderson, ¶¶ 299–315. Accordingly, the Secretary could not exclude President Trump's name from the presidential primary ballot. Anderson, Part VI. Conclusion.

¶23 On November 20, both the Electors and President Trump sought this court's review of the district court's rulings under section 1-1-113(3). We accepted jurisdiction of the parties' cross-petitions. Following extensive briefing from the parties and over a dozen amici, we held oral argument on December 6 and now issue this ruling.

III. Analysis

¶24 We begin with an overview of Section Three. We then address threshold questions regarding (1) whether the Election Code provides a basis for review of the Electors' claim, (2) whether Section Three requires implementing legislation

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

before its disqualification provision attaches, and (3) whether Section Three poses a nonjusticiable political question. After concluding that these threshold issues do not prevent us from reaching the merits, we consider whether Section Three applies to a President. Concluding that it does, we address the admissibility of Congress's January 6 Report (the "Report") before reviewing, and ultimately upholding, the district court's findings of fact and conclusions of law in support of its determination that President Trump engaged in insurrection. Lastly, we consider and reject President Trump's argument that his speech on January 6 was protected by the First Amendment.[2]

A. Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment and Principles of Constitutional Interpretation

¶25 The end of the Civil War brought what one author has termed a "second founding" of the United States of America. See Eric Foner, The Second Founding: How the Civil War and Reconstruction Remade the Constitution (2019). Reconstruction ushered in the Fourteenth Amendment, which includes Section Three, a provision

[2] President Trump also listed a challenge to the traditional evidentiary standard of proof for issues arising under the Election Code as a potential question on appeal, claiming that "[w]hen particularly important individual interests such as a constitutional right [is] at issue, the proper standard of proof requires more than a preponderance of the evidence." As noted above, the district court held that the Electors proved their challenge by clear and convincing evidence. And because President Trump chose not to brief this issue, he has abandoned it. See People v. Eckley, 775 P.2d 566, 570 (Colo. 1989).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

addressing what to do with those individuals who held positions of political power before the war, fought on the side of the Confederacy, and then sought to return to those positions. See National Archives, 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution: Civil Rights (1868), https://www.archives.gov/milestone-documents/14th-amendment#:~:text=Passed%20by%20Congress%20June%2013,Rights%20to%20formerly%20enslaved%20people [https://perma.cc/5EZU-ABV3] (explaining that the Fourteenth Amendment was passed by Congress on June 13, 1866, and officially ratified on July 9, 1868); see also Gerard N. Magliocca, Amnesty and Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, 36 Const. Comment. 87, 91–92 (2021).

¶26 Section Three provides:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3.

¶27 In interpreting a constitutional provision, our goal is to prevent the evasion of the provision's legitimate operation and to effectuate the drafters' intent. People v. Smith, 2023 CO 40, ¶ 20, 531 P.3d 1051, 1055. To do so, we begin with

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section Three's plain language, giving its terms their ordinary and popular meanings. Id. "To discern such meanings, we may consult dictionary definitions." Id.

¶28 If the language is clear and unambiguous, then we enforce it as written, and we need not turn to other tools of construction. Id. at ¶ 21, 531 P.3d at 1055. However, if the provision's language is reasonably susceptible of multiple interpretations, then it is ambiguous, and we may consider "the textual, structural, and historical evidence put forward by the parties," Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189, 201 (2012), and we will construe the provision "in light of the objective sought to be achieved and the mischief to be avoided," Smith, ¶ 20, 531 P.3d at 1055 (quoting Colo. Ethics Watch v. Senate Majority Fund, LLC, 2012 CO 12, ¶ 20, 269 P.3d 1248, 1254).

¶29 These principles of constitutional interpretation apply to all sections of this opinion in which we address the meaning of any constitutional provision.

B. The State Court Has the Authority to Adjudicate a Challenge to Presidential Candidate Qualifications Under the Election Code

¶30 The Electors' claim is grounded in sections 1-4-1204 and 1-1-113 of the Election Code. They argue that it would be a breach of duty or other wrongful act under the Election Code for the Secretary to place President Trump on the presidential primary ballot because he is not a "qualified candidate" based on

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section Three's disqualification. § 1-4-1203(2)(a), C.R.S. (2023). The Electors therefore seek an order pursuant to section 1-1-113 directing the Secretary not to list President Trump on the presidential primary ballot for the election to be held on March 5, 2024 (or any future ballot).

¶31 President Trump and CRSCC contend that Colorado courts lack jurisdiction over the Electors' claim and that the Electors cannot state a proper section 1-1-113 claim, in part because the Electors' claim is a "constitutional claim" that cannot be raised in a section 1-1-113 action under this court's decisions in Frazier v. Williams, 2017 CO 85, 401 P.3d 541, and Kuhn v. Williams, 2018 CO 30M, 418 P.3d 478 (per curiam). CRSCC also argues that the Secretary lacks authority to interfere with a political party's decision-making process or to interfere with the party's First Amendment right of association to select its own candidates. Lastly, President Trump argues that the expedited procedures under section 1-1-113 are insufficient to evaluate the Electors' claim.

¶32 Before considering each of these arguments in turn, we first explain the standard of review for statutory interpretation and then provide an overview of the Election Code provisions at issue. Turning to Intervenors' contentions, we first conclude that the district court had jurisdiction to adjudicate the Electors' claim under section 1-1-113. But, recognizing that the ability to exercise jurisdiction here does not mean the Electors can state a proper claim under section 1-1-113, we explore whether states have the constitutional power to assess presidential qualifications. We conclude that they do, provided their legislatures have established such authority by statute. Analyzing the relevant provisions of the Election Code, we then conclude that the General Assembly has given Colorado courts the authority to assess presidential qualifications and, therefore, that the Electors have stated a proper claim under sections 1-4-1204 and 1-1-113. We next address Intervenors' related arguments and conclude that limiting the presidential primary ballot to constitutionally qualified candidates does not interfere with CRSCC's associational rights under the First Amendment. Finally, we conclude that section 1-1-113 provides sufficient due process for evaluating whether a candidate satisfies the constitutional qualifications for the office he or she seeks.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. Standard of Review

¶33 We review the district court's interpretation of the relevant statutes de novo. Griswold v. Ferrigno Warren, 2020 CO 34, ¶ 16, 462 P.3d 1081, 1084. In doing so, "[o]ur primary objective is to effectuate the intent of the General Assembly by looking to the plain meaning of the language used, considered within the context of the statute as a whole." Mook v. Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs, 2020 CO 12, ¶ 24, 457 P.3d 568, 574 (alteration in original) (quoting Bly v. Story, 241 P.3d 529, 533 (Colo. 2010)). When a term is undefined, "we construe a statutory term in accordance with its ordinary or natural meaning." Id. (quoting Cowen v. People, 2018 CO 96, ¶ 14,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

431 P.3d 215, 218). If the language is clear, we apply it as written. Ferrigno Warren, ¶ 16, 462 P.3d at 1084.

¶34 If, however, the language is reasonably susceptible of multiple interpretations, we may turn to other tools of construction to guide our interpretation. Cowen, ¶ 12, 431 P.3d at 218. These may include consideration of the purpose of the statute, the circumstances under which the statute was enacted, the legislative history, and the consequences of a particular construction. § 2-4-203(1), C.R.S. (2023). We also avoid constructions that would yield illogical or absurd results. Educhildren LLC v. Cnty. of Douglas Bd. of Equalization, 2023 CO 29, ¶ 27, 531 P.3d 986, 993.

2. Presidential Primaries Under the Election Code

¶35 Before addressing the merits, we provide a brief overview of the Election Code's provisions relating to presidential primary elections. Article VII, Section 11 of the Colorado Constitution commands the General Assembly to "pass laws to secure the purity of elections, and guard against abuses of the elective franchise." Pursuant to this constitutional mandate, the Secretary's duties under the Election Code include supervising the conduct of primary and general elections in the state and enforcing the provisions of the Election Code. § 1-1-107(1)(a)–(b), (5), C.R.S. (2023).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶36 Part 12 of article 4 of the Election Code governs presidential primary elections. See generally §§ 1-4-1201 to -1207, C.R.S. (2023).[3] Section 1-4-1201, C.R.S. (2023), explains that "it is the intent of the People of the State of Colorado that the provisions of this part 12 conform to the requirements of federal law and national political party rules governing presidential primary elections." This reference indicates that the legislature envisioned part 12 as operating in harmony with

---

[3] Before 1990, Colorado's political parties used caucuses to nominate their presidential candidates. That year, Colorado voters adopted a referred measure establishing presidential primary elections. See generally Ch. 42, sec. 1–2, §§ 1-4-1101 to -1104, 1990 Colo. Sess. Laws 311, 311–13. The legislature later amended these statutes as part of a 1992 repeal and reenactment of the Election Code. See Ch. 118, sec. 7, §§ 1-4-1201 to -1207, 1992 Colo. Sess. Laws 624, 696–99. These amendments added the precursor to current section 1-4-1204(4): they permitted "challenges concerning the right of any candidate's name to appear on the ballot of the presidential primary election" but directed the Secretary (not a court) to hear and assess the validity of such challenges. Ch. 118, sec. 7, § 1-4-1203(4), 1992 Colo. Sess. Laws at 697–98.

Colorado eliminated presidential primary elections in 2003. Ch. 24, sec. 6, 2003 Colo. Sess. Laws 495, 496. In 2016, however, voters restored such elections through Proposition 107, a citizen-initiated measure. Proposition 107, Ballot Initiative No. 140, https://www.coloradosos.gov/pubs/elections/Initiatives/titleBoard/filings/2015-2016/140Final.pdf [https://perma.cc/7TX8-J59L]. Proposition 107 largely preserved the pre-2003 version of section 1-4-1204(4) that vested the Secretary with the power to hear challenges to the listing of presidential primary candidates. Id. at 61. In a 2017 clean-up bill, the General Assembly adopted several amendments to the citizen-initiated measure "to facilitate the effective implementation of the state's election laws." S.B. 17-305, 71st Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Colo. 2017). Relevant here, the legislature directed challenges under section 1-4-1204(4) away from the Secretary and instead to the district court through section 1-1-113 proceedings. Id. at 4–5. Section 1-4-1204(4) has remained otherwise unchanged since its reenactment.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

federal law, including requirements governing presidential primary elections. As such, it is instructive when interpreting other provisions of part 12.

¶37 The Election Code limits participation in the presidential primary to "qualified" candidates. § 1-4-1203(2)(a) ("[E]ach political party that has a qualified candidate . . . is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election."[4] (emphasis added)); see also §§ 1-4-1101(1), -1205, C.R.S. (2023) (allowing a write-in candidate to participate in the presidential primary election if he or she submits an affidavit stating he or she is "qualified to assume" the duties of the office if elected). As a practical matter, the mechanism through which a presidential primary hopeful attests that he or she is a "qualified candidate" is the "statement of intent" (or "affidavit of intent") filed with the Secretary.[5] See § 1-4-1204(1)(c) (requiring candidates to submit to the Secretary a notarized "statement of intent"); § 1-4-1205 (requiring a write-in candidate to file a notarized

---

[4] In full, the quoted language reads: "[E]ach political party that has a qualified candidate entitled to participate in the presidential primary election pursuant to this section is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election." § 1-4-1203(2)(a). The phrase "pursuant to this section" sheds no light on the meaning of "qualified candidate." Section 1-4-1203 simply establishes the mechanics of presidential primaries, such as the date of the primary, elector party affiliation rules, and the content of primary ballots. § 1-4-1203(1), (2)(a), (4). Thus, "pursuant to this section" modifies the "presidential primary election" in which qualified candidates are entitled to participate: an election conducted in accordance with section 1-4-1203.

[5] In this context, the legislature appears to have used "statement" and "affidavit" interchangeably.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"statement of intent" in order for votes to be counted for that candidate and stating that "such affidavit" must be accompanied by the requisite filing fee).

¶38 The Secretary's statement-of-intent form for a major party presidential primary candidate requires the candidate to affirm via checkboxes that he or she meets the qualifications set forth in Article II of the U.S. Constitution for the office of President; specifically, that the candidate is at least thirty-five years old, has been a resident of the United States for at least fourteen years, and is a natural-born U.S. citizen. Colo. Sec'y of State, Major Party Candidate Statement of Intent for Presidential Primary, https://www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/elections/Candidates/files/MajorPartyCandidateStatementOfIntentForPresidentialPrimary.pdf [https://perma.cc/YA3X-3K9T] ("Intent Form"); see also U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5. The form further requires the candidate to sign an affirmation that states, "I intend to run for the office stated above and solemnly affirm that I meet all qualifications for the office prescribed by law."[6] Intent Form, supra (emphasis added). No party has challenged the Secretary's authority to require candidates to provide this information on the statement-of-intent form.

---

[6] The Affidavit of Intent for write-in candidates for the presidential primary has the same requirements. Affidavit of Intent for Presidential Primary Write-In Designation, Colo. Sec'y of State (last updated June 20, 2023), https://www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/elections/Candidates/files/PresidentialPrimaryWrite-In.pdf [https://perma.cc/V83P-HLAD].

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶39 Section 1-4-1204(1) requires the Secretary to "certify the names and party affiliations of the candidates to be placed on any presidential primary election ballots" not later than sixty days before the presidential primary election. For the 2024 election cycle, that deadline is January 5, 2024.

¶40 Section 1-4-1204(1) further states:

> The only candidates whose names shall be placed on ballots for the election shall be those candidates who:
>
> . . . .
>
> (b) Are seeking the nomination for president of a political party as a bona fide candidate for president of the United States pursuant to political party rules and are affiliated with a major political party that received at least twenty percent of the votes cast by eligible electors in Colorado at the last presidential election; and
>
> (c) Have submitted to the secretary not later than eighty-five days before the date of the presidential primary election, a notarized candidate's statement of intent together with either a nonrefundable filing fee of five hundred dollars or a petition signed by at least five thousand eligible electors . . . .

For the 2024 election cycle, the deadline to submit these items was December 11, 2023.

¶41 Section 1-4-1204(4) allows for "challenge[s] to the listing of any candidate on the presidential primary election ballot." Any such challenge must be brought "no later than five days after the filing deadline for candidates" and "must provide notice . . . of the alleged impropriety that gives rise to the complaint." Id. The district court must hold a hearing no later than five days after the challenge is filed to "assess the validity of all alleged improprieties." Id. The statute does not limit the length or content of the hearing; it does, however, require the district court to issue findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing concludes. Id. "The party filing the challenge has the burden to sustain the challenge by a preponderance of the evidence." Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶42 Challenges under section 1-4-1204(4) must be brought through the special statutory procedure found in section 1-1-113 for adjudicating controversies that arise under the Election Code. § 1-4-1204(4) (providing that any challenge to the listing of a candidate on the presidential primary ballot "must be made in writing and filed with the district court in accordance with section 1-1-113(1)" and "any order entered by the district court may be reviewed [by the supreme court] in accordance with section 1-1-113(3)").

¶43 Section 1-1-113 has deep roots in Colorado election law. It originated in an 1894 amendment to Colorado's Australian Ballot Law, first adopted by the Eighth General Assembly in 1891. Ch. 7, sec. 5, § 26, 1894 Colo. Sess. Laws 59, 65. Much like its present-day counterpart, the original provision established procedures for adjudicating controversies between election officials and any candidate, political party officers or representatives, or persons making nominations.[7] Id.

---

[7] Over time, the legislature amended the law to strengthen the courts' power to resolve election disputes. For example, in 1910, the General Assembly passed

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶44 The current version of section 1-1-113 establishes (with exceptions not relevant here) "the exclusive method for the adjudication of controversies arising from a breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act that occurs prior to the day of an election." § 1-1-113(4) (emphasis added). It provides:

> When any controversy arises between any official charged with any duty or function under this code and any candidate, or any officers or representatives of a political party, or any persons who have made nominations or when any eligible elector files a verified petition in a district court of competent jurisdiction alleging that a person charged with a duty under this code has committed or is about to commit a breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act, after notice to the official which includes an opportunity to be heard, upon a finding of good cause, the district court shall issue an order requiring substantial compliance with the provisions of this code. The order shall require the person charged to forthwith perform the duty or to desist from the wrongful act primary election legislation (not then applicable to presidential elections) authorizing district courts to accept verified petitions alleging, among other things, "that the name of any person has been or is about to be wrongfully placed upon" primary ballots and to order the Secretary (among other election officials) to correct such errors. Ch. 4, § 25, 1910 Colo. Sess. Laws. 15, 33. The 1910 law also gave this court the power to review the district court's decision. Id. at 34; see also People v. Republican State Cent. Comm., 226 P. 656, 657 (Colo. 1924) (confirming that if a proper entity "has violated a duty with which it is charged under the act, the court has power to direct it to correct the wrong").

---

In 1963, the General Assembly repealed and reenacted Colorado's Election Code. See generally Ch. 118, 1963 Colo. Sess. Laws 360. The 1963 code allowed for "any elector" to show "by verified petition . . . that any neglect of duty or wrongful act by any person charged with a duty under this act has occurred or is about to occur," mirroring the language in today's section 1-1-113. Ch. 118, § 203, 1963 Colo. Sess. Laws at 457. The legislature's next reenactment of the code in 1992 codified this procedure at section 1-1-113. Ch. 118, sec. 1, § 1-1-113, 1992 Colo. Sess. Laws 624, 635.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> or to forthwith show cause why the order should not be obeyed. The burden of proof is on the petitioner.

§ 1-1-113(1) (emphases added).

¶45 Section 1-1-113 proceedings also provide for expedited, albeit discretionary, appellate review in this court. § 1-1-113(3). Either party may seek review from this court within three days after the district court proceedings conclude. Id. If this court declines jurisdiction of the case, the district court's decision is final and is not subject to further appellate review. Id.

¶46 Although Colorado's expedited statutory procedure for litigating election disputes may be unfamiliar nationally, our courts, particularly the Denver District Court (the proper venue when the Secretary is the named respondent), are accustomed to section 1-1-113 litigation. Such cases arise during virtually every election cycle, and this court has exercised jurisdiction many times to review these disputes. E.g., Kuhn, ¶ 1, 418 P.3d at 480; Frazier, ¶ 1, 401 P.3d at 542; Carson v. Reiner, 2016 CO 38, ¶ 1, 370 P.3d 1137, 1138; Hanlen v. Gessler, 2014 CO 24, ¶ 3, 333 P.3d 41, 42. Moreover, it is not uncommon for section 1-1-113 cases to require courts to take evidence and grapple with complex legal issues. E.g., Ferrigno Warren, ¶¶ 9–13, 462 P.3d at 1083–84 (describing a district court hearing, held one month after the petitioner filed her verified petition and after the parties filed briefing, to determine whether "substantial compliance" was the appropriate standard for a minimum signature requirement, how to apply that standard, and whether, based on a four-factor test, a prospective U.S. Senate candidate satisfied that standard); Kuhn, ¶¶ 4, 15–18, 418 P.3d at 480–82 (describing a district court hearing to assess evidence and testimony concerning the residency of seven circulators of a petition to reelect a congressional representative); Meyer v. Lamm, 846 P.2d 862, 867 (Colo. 1993) (requiring an evidentiary hearing in district court that involved, among other things, the content of ballots cast for a write-in candidate). Even early cases recognized that the original 1894 provision "contemplate[d] the taking of evidence where the issues require[d] it." Leighton v. Bates, 50 P. 856, 858 (Colo. 1897).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

3. The District Court Had Jurisdiction to Adjudicate the Electors' Claim Under the Election Code

¶47 President Trump argues that the district court lacked jurisdiction over the Electors' section 1-1-113 action because the Secretary has no duty under the Election Code to investigate a candidate's qualifications. A district court has jurisdiction pursuant to section 1-1-113(1) when: (1) an eligible elector; (2) files a verified petition in a district court of competent jurisdiction; (3) alleging that a person charged with a duty under the Election Code; (4) has committed, or is about to commit, a breach of duty or other wrongful act.

¶48 The district court plainly had jurisdiction under section 1-1-113 to hear the Electors' claim. First, the Electors are "eligible elector[s]" within the meaning of the Election Code because, as Republican and unaffiliated voters, they are

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"person[s] who meet[] the specific requirements for voting at a specific election"; namely, the Republican presidential primary election. § 1-1-104(16), C.R.S. (2023); see also § 1-4-1203(2)(b) (providing that unaffiliated voters may vote in presidential primary elections); § 1-7-201(1), C.R.S. (2023) (identifying eligible electors for the purpose of primary elections). Second, the Electors timely filed their verified petition under sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4) in the proper district court. Third, their petition was filed against the Secretary, an election official charged with duties under the Election Code. See § 1-1-107 (prescribing the powers and duties of the Secretary); § 1-4-1204(1) ("[T]he secretary of state shall certify the names and party affiliations of the candidates to be placed on any presidential primary election ballots."). And fourth, the petition alleged that the Secretary was about to commit a breach of duty or other wrongful act under the Election Code by placing President Trump on the presidential primary ballot because he is not constitutionally qualified to hold office.

¶49 Though it does not affect the district court's jurisdiction, President Trump's assertion that the Secretary does not have a duty under the Election Code to determine a candidate's constitutional qualification raises the question of whether the Electors presented a proper claim. To answer that question, we must first determine whether, generally, states have the authority to determine presidential qualifications.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

4. States Have the Authority to Assess Presidential Candidates' Qualifications

¶50 "Common sense, as well as constitutional law, compels the conclusion that government must play an active role in structuring elections . . . ." Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428, 433 (1992). The Constitution delegates to states the authority to prescribe the "Times, Places and Manner" of holding congressional elections, U.S. Const. art. I, § 4, cl. 1, and states retain the power to regulate their own elections, Burdick, 504 U.S. at 433. States exercise these powers through "comprehensive and sometimes complex election codes," regulating the registration and qualifications of voters, the selection and eligibility of candidates, and the voting process itself. Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 788 (1983) ("Celebrezze"); see also, e.g., § 1-4-501(1), C.R.S. (2023) (setting qualifications for state office candidates). These powers are uncontroversial and well-explored in U.S. Supreme Court case law.

¶51 But does the U.S. Constitution authorize states to assess the constitutional qualifications of presidential candidates? We conclude that it does.

¶52 Under Article II, Section 1, each state is authorized to appoint presidential electors "in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 2. So long as a state's exercise of its appointment power does not run afoul of another constitutional constraint, that power is plenary. Chiafalo v. Washington, 140 S. Ct. 2316, 2324 (2020); McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U.S. 1, 25 (1892).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶53 But voters no longer choose between slates of electors on Election Day. Chiafalo, 140 S. Ct. at 2321. Instead, they vote for presidential candidates who serve as proxies for their pledged electors. Id. Accordingly, states exercise their plenary appointment power not only to regulate the electors themselves, but also to regulate candidate access to presidential ballots. Absent a separate constitutional constraint, then, states may exercise their plenary appointment power to limit presidential ballot access to those candidates who are constitutionally qualified to hold the office of President. And nothing in the U.S. Constitution expressly precludes states from limiting access to the presidential ballot to such candidates. See Lindsay v. Bowen, 750 F.3d 1061, 1065 (9th Cir. 2014).

¶54 No party in this case has challenged the Secretary's authority to require a presidential primary candidate to confirm on the required statement-of-intent form that he or she meets the Article II requirements of age, residency, and citizenship, and to further attest that he or she "meet[s] all qualifications for the office prescribed by law." Moreover, several courts have expressly upheld states' ability to exclude constitutionally ineligible candidates from their presidential ballots. See id. (upholding California's refusal to place a twenty-seven-year-old candidate on the presidential ballot); Hassan v. Colorado, 495 F. App'x 947, 948–49 (10th Cir. 2012) (affirming the Secretary's decision to exclude a naturalized citizen from the presidential ballot); Socialist Workers Party of Ill. v. Ogilvie, 357 F. Supp.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

109, 113 (N.D. Ill. 1972) (per curiam) (affirming Illinois's exclusion of a thirty-one-year-old candidate from the presidential ballot).

¶55 As then-Judge Gorsuch recognized in Hassan, it is "a state's legitimate interest in protecting the integrity and practical functioning of the political process" that "permits it to exclude from the ballot candidates who are constitutionally prohibited from assuming office." 495 F. App'x at 948.

¶56 The question then becomes whether Colorado has exercised this power through the Election Code. We conclude that it has. Section 1-4-1204(4) is Colorado's vehicle for advancing these state interests. When eligible electors challenge the Secretary's listing on the presidential primary ballot of a candidate who is not constitutionally qualified to assume office, section 1-4-1204(4), as exercised through a proceeding under section 1-1-113, offers an exclusive remedy under the Election Code. See § 1-1-113(4).

5. The Electors Have Stated a Proper Claim That Is Not Precluded by Frazier and Kuhn

¶57 President Trump argues that the Electors' claim cannot be properly litigated in a section 1-1-113 action because the Secretary has no duty under the Election Code to investigate a candidate's qualifications and because this court's precedent bars the litigation of constitutional claims in a section 1-1-113 action. Although we agree that the Secretary has no duty to independently investigate the qualifications of a presidential primary candidate, we conclude that the Electors may nevertheless challenge a candidate's qualifications under section 1-4-1204(4), and that the Electors' claim here is not a "constitutional claim" precluded by our decisions in Frazier and Kuhn.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶58 In presidential primary elections, the Secretary's duty is to "certify the names and party affiliations of the candidates to be placed on any presidential primary election ballots." § 1-4-1204(1). The conditions that must be satisfied before she can exercise this duty are limited to timely receiving (1) confirmation that the prospective candidate is a "bona fide candidate" under the party's rules, (2) a notarized statement of intent from the candidate, and (3) the requisite filing fee or a petition signed by at least 5,000 eligible electors affiliated with the candidate's political party who reside in Colorado. § 1-4-1204(1)(b)–(c).

¶59 Where a candidate does not submit (or cannot comply with) the required attestations on the statement of intent form, the Secretary cannot list the candidate on the ballot. See Hassan v. Colorado, 870 F. Supp. 2d 1192, 1195 (D. Colo. 2012), aff'd 495 F. App'x at 948. But if the contents of a signed and notarized statement of intent appear facially complete (i.e., the candidate has filled out the Secretary's form confirming that he or she meets the Article II requirements of age, residency, and citizenship, and further attesting that he or she "meet[s] all qualifications for the office prescribed by law"), the Secretary has no duty to further investigate the accuracy or validity of the information the prospective candidate has supplied.[8] To that extent, we agree with President Trump that the Secretary has no duty to determine, beyond what is apparent on the face of the required documents, whether a presidential candidate is qualified.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶60 The fact that the Secretary has complied with her section 1-4-1204(1) duties does not, however, foreclose a challenge under section 1-4-1204(4). As discussed above, section 1-4-1204(4) permits "[a]ny challenge to the listing of any candidate on the presidential primary election ballot," using section 1-1-113(1) as a procedural vehicle. Section 1-1-113(1), in turn, creates a cause of action for electors alleging a breach of duty or other wrongful act under the code. See Frazier, ¶ 3, 401 P.3d at 542 (construing "wrongful act" in section 1-1-113 as limited to a wrongful act under the Election Code). Section 1-1-113 then requires the district court—not the election official—to adjudicate an eligible elector's challenge to a candidate's eligibility. Carson, ¶ 8, 370 P.3d at 1139 (observing that the Election Code reflects an intent for challenges to the qualifications of a candidate to be resolved by the courts); Hanlen, ¶ 40, 333 P.3d at 50 ("[T]he election code requires a court, not an election official, to determine the issue of [candidate] eligibility.").

---

[8] In contrast, with respect to elections for state office, section 1-4-501(1), C.R.S. (2023), provides that "[t]he designated election official shall not certify the name of any designee or candidate . . . who the designated election official determines is not qualified to hold the office that he or she seeks based on residency requirements." (Emphasis added.) This provision for state office expressly charges the Secretary with a duty to investigate whether a candidate "meets any requirements of the office relating to registration, residence, or property ownership," among others. Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶61 As we have explained, the Secretary has complied with her limited duty to accept President Trump's properly completed paperwork. But the Electors have alleged an impending "wrongful act," which is "more expansive than a 'breach' or 'neglect of duty.'" Frazier, ¶ 16, 401 P.3d at 545 (quoting § 1-1-113(1)). Indeed, section 1-1-113 "clearly comprehends challenges to a broad range of wrongful acts committed by officials charged with duties under the code," Carson, ¶ 17, 370 P.3d at 1141, including any act that is "inconsistent with the Election Code," Frazier, ¶ 16, 401 P.3d at 545.

¶62 We conclude that certifying an unqualified candidate to the presidential primary ballot constitutes a "wrongful act" that runs afoul of section 1-4-1203(2)(a) and undermines the purposes of the Election Code. Nothing in section 1-4-1204(4) limits challenges under that provision to those based on a breach of the Secretary's duties under section 1-4-1204. And section 1-4-1203(2)(a) clearly limits participation in the presidential primary to political parties fielding "qualified" candidates. Although section 1-4-1203(2)(a) does not define "qualified," nearby provisions regarding write-in candidates indicate that "qualified" refers to a candidate's qualifications for office. As with bona fide major party candidates under section 1-4-1204(1), write-in candidates for the presidential primary must file a "notarized candidate statement of intent." § 1-4-1205. Under the Election Code, such statements for all write-in candidates (regardless of the type of election) must indicate that the candidate "desires the office and is qualified to assume its duties if elected." § 1-4-1101(1) (emphasis added). The Election Code's explicit requirement that a write-in candidate be "qualified" to assume the duties of their intended office logically implies that major party candidates under 1-4-1204(1)(b) must be "qualified" in the same manner.[9]

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶63 Reading the Election Code as a whole, then, we conclude that "qualified" in section 1-4-1203(2)(a) must mean, at minimum, that a candidate is qualified under the U.S. Constitution to assume the duties of the office of President. It has to, as section 1-4-1203(2)(a) supplies the only textual basis in the Election Code for the Secretary's authority to require a presidential primary candidate to attest to his or her qualifications for office in the candidate statement (or affidavit) of intent. Moreover, to read "qualified" not to encompass federal constitutional qualifications would undermine the purpose of the Election Code—"to secure the

---

[9] This interpretation is further supported by the Election Code's treatment of uncontested primaries. The Election Code allows the Secretary to cancel a primary when every political party has no more than one affiliated candidate, whether that candidate is certified to the presidential primary ballot pursuant to section 1-4-1204(1) or is a write-in candidate entering under section 1-4-1205. § 1-4-1203(5). Because the General Assembly plainly treats such candidates as equivalent for purposes of 1-4-1203(5), we conclude that the legislature also viewed the "qualified" requirement in both provisions as equivalent.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

purity of elections"—while compromising the Secretary's ability to advance that purpose. Colo. Const. art. VII, § 11; § 1-1-107(1), (5).

¶64 We therefore reject such an interpretation as contrary to the purpose of the Election Code. Instead, we conclude that, under the Election Code, "qualified" candidates for the presidential primary are those who, at a minimum, are qualified to hold office under the provisions of the U.S. Constitution.

¶65 We recognize that the Supreme Court has twice declined to address whether Section Three—which disqualifies an oath-breaking insurrectionist from holding office—amounts to a qualification for office. Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 520 n.41 (1969) (describing Section Three and similar disqualification provisions in the federal constitution but declining to address whether such provisions constitute "qualification[s]" for office because "both sides agree[d] that [the candidate] was not ineligible under" Section Three or any other, similar provision); U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 787 n.2 (1995) (seeing "no need to resolve" the same question regarding Section Three in a case concerning the propriety of additional qualifications for office). But lower courts, when presented squarely with the question, have all but concluded that Section Three is the functional equivalent of a qualification for office. See, e.g., Greene v. Raffensperger, 599 F. Supp. 3d 1283, 1316 (N.D. Ga. 2022) ("Section [Three] is an existing constitutional disqualification adopted in 1868—similar to but distinct from the Article I, Section 2 requirements that congressional candidates be at least 25 years of age, have been citizens of the United States for 7 years, and reside in the states in which they seek to be elected."); State v. Griffin, No. D-101-CV-2022-00473, 2022 WL 4295619, at *24 (N.M. Dist. Ct. Sept. 6, 2022) ("Section Three imposes a qualification for public office, much like an age or residency requirement . . . .").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶66 We perceive no logical distinction between a disqualification from office and a qualification to assume office, at least for the purposes of the section 1-1-113 claim here. Either way, it would be a wrongful act for the Secretary to list a candidate on the presidential primary ballot who is not "qualified" to assume the duties of the office. Moreover, because Section Three is a "part of the text of the Constitution," assessing a candidate's compliance with it for purposes of determining their eligibility for office does not improperly "add qualifications to those that appear in the Constitution." U.S. Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 787 n.2. Doing so merely renders the list of constitutional qualifications more complete.

¶67 Nor are we persuaded by President Trump's assertion that Section Three does not bar him from running for or being elected to office because Section Three bars individuals only from holding office. Hassan specifically rejected any such distinction. 495 Fed. App'x at 948. There, the candidate argued that even if Article II "properly holds him ineligible to assume the office of president," Colorado could not "deny him a place on the ballot." Id. The Hassan panel concluded otherwise. Id. In any event, the provisions in the Election Code governing presidential primary elections do not recognize such a distinction. Rather, as discussed above, those provisions require all presidential primary candidates to be constitutionally "qualified" before their names are added to the presidential primary ballot pursuant to section 1-4-1204(1).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶68 Were we to adopt President Trump's view, Colorado could not exclude from the ballot even candidates who plainly do not satisfy the age, residency, and citizenship requirements of the Presidential Qualifications Clause of Article II. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5 (setting forth the qualifications to be "eligible to the Office of President" (emphasis added)). It would mean that the state would be powerless to exclude a twenty-eight-year-old, a non-resident of the United States, or even a foreign national from the presidential primary ballot in Colorado. Yet, as noted, several courts have upheld states' exclusion from ballots of presidential candidates who fail to meet the qualifications for office under Article II. See Lindsay, 750 F.3d at 1065; Hassan, 495 F. App'x at 948; Ogilvie, 357 F. Supp. at 113.

¶69 Lastly, we reject President Trump and CRSCC's argument that state courts may not hear the Electors' claim because this court's precedent bars the litigation of constitutional claims in a section 1-1-113 action. See Frazier, ¶ 3, 401 P.3d at 542;

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Kuhn, ¶ 55, 418 P.3d at 489. The Electors have not asserted a constitutional claim, so Frazier and Kuhn do not control here.

¶70 Both Frazier and Kuhn addressed whether a petitioner could shoehorn a claim challenging the constitutionality of the Election Code into a section 1-1-113 proceeding. Frazier, ¶ 6, 401 P.3d at 543; Kuhn, ¶ 55, 418 P.3d at 489. In Frazier, we concluded that section 1-1-113 is not a proper vehicle to resolve claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because they do not arise under the Election Code and because the sole remedy available under section 1-1-113 is a court order directing compliance with the Election Code. Frazier, ¶¶ 17–18, 401 P.3d at 545. Similarly, in Kuhn, we held that to the extent the candidate sought to challenge the constitutionality of the petition circulator residency requirement under the Election Code, the court lacked jurisdiction to address such arguments in a section 1-1-113 proceeding. ¶ 55, 418 P.3d at 489.

¶71 Here, however, the Electors do not challenge the constitutionality of the Election Code. Nor do they allege a violation of the Constitution. Instead, they allege a "wrongful act" under section 1-1-113. That the Electors' claim has constitutional implications or requires interpretation of a constitutional provision does not make it a separate "constitutional claim" of the sort prohibited by Frazier and Kuhn. And neither President Trump nor CRSCC suggests that a section 1-1-113 claim cannot have constitutional implications. Indeed, as the Secretary notes in her brief, there is nothing "particularly unusual about a section 1-1-113 proceeding raising constitutional issues."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶72 As discussed above, the Electors' claim is that the Secretary will commit a wrongful act under the Election Code if she lists a candidate on the presidential primary ballot who is not qualified for office. While this claim requires resolving constitutional questions, it remains a challenge brought by eligible electors against an election official regarding an alleged wrongful act under the Election Code. Section 1-1-113 is the "exclusive" vehicle for litigating such challenges prior to an election; the Electors have no other viable option. § 1-1-113(4).

6. Limiting Presidential Primary Ballot Access to Constitutionally Qualified Candidates Does Not Interfere with CRSCC's First Amendment Rights

¶73 CRSCC argues that section 1-4-1204(1)(b) vests it with the sole authority to determine who the Republican nominees will be on a ballot—a reflection, CRSCC contends, of its constitutional right to freely associate and exercise its political decisions. See U.S. Const. amend. I; see also Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 357 (1997) ("The First Amendment protects the right of citizens to associate and to form political parties for the advancement of common political goals and ideas."). Taken to its logical end, CRSCC's position is that it has a First Amendment right to deem any person to be a "bona fide candidate" pursuant to their party rules, § 1-4-1204(1)(b), and subsequently mandate that individual's placement on the presidential ballot, without regard to that candidate's age, residency, citizenship, see U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5, or even whether the candidate has already served two terms as President, see id. at amend. XXII ("No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice . . . ."). We disagree with this position.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶74 As a threshold matter, we acknowledge that the district court dismissed CRSCC's argument on this issue, ruling that it raised a separate constitutional claim improperly litigated in a section 1-1-113 action. Anderson, ¶ 12. We agree that a claim challenging the constitutionality of the Election Code cannot be reviewed under section 1-1-113. See Kuhn, ¶ 55, 418 P.3d at 489; Frazier, ¶ 3, 401 P.3d at 542. But to the extent that CRSCC argues in its Answer Brief that the Secretary lacks authority to interfere with CRSCC's associational rights, we respond briefly to those concerns.

¶75 We distinguish between (1) CRSCC's right to decide the candidates with whom it affiliates and recognizes as bona fide, and (2) CRSCC's ability to place candidates on the presidential primary ballot. CRSCC's "claim that it has a right to select its own candidate is uncontroversial, so far as it goes." Timmons, 520 U.S. at 359. Partisan political organizations enjoy freedom of association protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, Tashjian v. Republican Party of Conn., 479 U.S. 208, 214 (1986), and "[a]s a result, political parties' government, structure, and activities enjoy constitutional protection," Timmons, 520 U.S. at 358. In other words, CRSCC is well within its rights to choose with whom it affiliates and to decide which candidates it recognizes as bona fide. "It does not follow, though, that a party is absolutely entitled to have its nominee appear on the ballot as that party's candidate." Id. at 359 (noting that a "particular candidate might be ineligible for office," for example).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶76 As a practical matter, any state election law governing the selection and eligibility of candidates affects, to some degree, the fundamental right to associate with others for political ends. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. at 788. Even so, "there must be a substantial regulation of elections if they are to be fair and honest and if some sort of order, rather than chaos, is to accompany the democratic processes." Burdick, 504 U.S. at 433 (quoting Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 730 (1974)).

¶77 Accordingly, to determine if a state election law impermissibly burdens a party's associational rights, courts must weigh the "'character and magnitude'" of the burden imposed by the rule "against the interests the State contends justify that burden," and then consider whether the state's interests make the burden necessary. Timmons, 520 U.S. at 358 (quoting Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434). Limiting ballot access "to those who have complied with state election law requirements is the prototypical example of a regulation that, while it affects the right to vote, is eminently reasonable." Burdick, 504 U.S. at 440 n.10.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶78 Here, the Election Code limits presidential primary ballot access to only qualified candidates. Such a restriction is an "eminently reasonable" regulation that does not severely burden CRSCC's associational rights. To hold otherwise would permit political parties to disregard the requirements of the law and the Constitution whenever they decide, as a matter of "political expression" or "political choice," that those requirements do not apply. That cannot be. The Constitution—not any political party rule—is the supreme law of the land. U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

7. Section 1-1-113 Proceedings Provide Adequate Due Process for Litigants

¶79 Lastly, President Trump asserts that section 1-1-113 is not a valid way to litigate complex constitutional legal and factual issues. He complains of unfairness inherent in the expedited procedures that section 1-1-113 demands. But President Trump's argument disregards how the Electors' claim proceeded here.

¶80 Initially, we note that to the extent President Trump purports to challenge the constitutionality of section 1-1-113 under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process clause as a defense to the Electors' claim, he raises precisely the type of independent constitutional claim he recognizes is barred by Kuhn. See Kuhn, ¶ 55, 418 P.3d at 489. As discussed above, constitutional challenges to provisions of the Election Code fall outside the scope of a proper section 1-1-113 challenge because these expedited statutory proceedings entertain only one type of claim—election officials' violations of the Election Code—and one type of injunctive relief—an order compelling substantial compliance with the Election Code. See Kuhn, ¶ 55, 418 P.3d at 489; § 1-1-113(1); accord Frazier, ¶¶ 17–18, 401 P.3d at 545.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶81 Furthermore, because section 1-1-113 proceedings are designed to address election-related disputes, they move quickly out of necessity. Frazier, ¶ 11, 401 P.3d at 544 ("Given the tight deadlines for conducting elections, section 1-1-113 is a summary proceeding designed to quickly resolve challenges brought by electors, candidates, and other designated plaintiffs against state election officials prior to election day."). Lawyers who practice in this area are well-aware of this. Looming elections trigger a cascade of deadlines under both state and federal law that cannot accommodate protracted litigation schedules, particularly when the dispute concerns a candidate's access to the ballot. And a state's interest in "protecting the integrity of the election process and avoiding voter confusion," Lindsay, 750 F.3d at 1063 (citing Timmons, 520 U.S. at 364–65), allows a state to expedite the process by which a candidate's qualifications, once challenged, are subsequently determined. That the form of section 1-1-113 proceedings reflects their function—to expeditiously resolve pre-election disputes over an election official's wrongful act—does not mean these proceedings lack due process.

¶82 Nor does the need for expedited proceedings in election disputes preclude a district court from using traditional means of case management in a section

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1-1-113 proceeding to construct a schedule that accommodates legally or factually complex issues. See Ferrigno Warren, ¶¶ 8–13, 462 P.3d at 1083 (explaining that the district court ordered briefing and held a hearing one month after the candidate filed a section 1-1-113 petition). President Trump contends that the expedited nature of section 1-1-113 proceedings do not provide time for the kinds of procedures he believes the complexities of this case require—for example, filing C.R.C.P. 12 motions testing the legal sufficiency of the Electors' claims before the litigation proceeds, allowing for extended discovery and disclosure procedures, and providing the opportunity to depose expert witnesses. But he has never specifically articulated how the district court's approach lacked due process. He certainly does not contend that he was prejudiced because the district court moved too slowly or failed to resolve the case in a week. He made no specific offer of proof regarding other discovery he would have conducted or other evidence he would have tendered. Moreover, his arguments throughout this case have focused predominantly on questions of law and not on disputed issues of material fact.

¶83 In addition, the district court took many steps to address the complexities of the case. For example, the first hearing in this case was a status conference on September 18—four days after the case was reopened after being remanded from federal court. In recognition of the complexity of the case, the district court—with the parties' input—adopted a civil-case-management approach to the litigation that afforded the parties the opportunity to be heard on a wide range of substantive issues.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶84 The district court's case-management approach worked. After permitting multiple intervenors to participate, the district court allowed sufficient time for extensive prehearing motions in which all parties vigorously engaged. It then issued three substantive rulings on these motions, including an omnibus ruling addressing four of Intervenors' motions, all in advance of the trial. The trial took place over five days and included opening and closing statements, the direct- and cross-examination of fifteen witnesses, and the presentation of ninety-six exhibits. Moreover, the legal and factual complexity of this case did not prevent the district court from issuing a comprehensive, 102-page order within the forty-eight-hour window section 1-4-1204(4) requires.

¶85 In short, the district court admirably—and swiftly—discharged its duty to adjudicate this complex section 1-1-113 action, substantially complying with statutory deadlines while demonstrating the flexibility inherent in such a proceeding to address the various issues raised by Intervenors. And nothing about the district court's process suggests that President Trump was deprived of notice or opportunity to fully respond to the claim against him or to mount a vigorous defense. If any case suggests that it is not impossible to "fully litigate a complex constitutional issue within days or weeks," this is it. Frazier, ¶ 18 n.3, 401 P.3d at 545 n.3.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶86 For these reasons, we conclude that the Election Code allows Colorado's courts, through challenges brought under sections 1-4-1204(4) and 1-1-113, to assess the constitutional qualifications of a candidate—and to order the Secretary to exclude from the ballot candidates who are not qualified. These provisions advance Colorado's "legitimate interest in protecting the integrity and practical functioning of the political process" by allowing the Secretary to "exclude from the ballot [presidential] candidates who are constitutionally prohibited from assuming office." Hassan, 495 F. App'x at 948. Moreover, these provisions neither infringe on a political party's associational rights nor compromise the validity of a court's rulings on complex factual and legal issues. Rather, they provide a robust vehicle through which to protect the purity of Colorado's elections.[10] See Colo. Const. art. VII, § 11.

---

[10] We note that Colorado's Election Code differs from other states' election laws. Michigan's election law, for example, does not include the term "qualified candidate," does not establish a role for Michigan courts in assessing the qualifications of a presidential primary candidate, and strictly limits the Michigan Secretary of State's responsibilities in the context of presidential primary elections. See Mich. Comp. Laws §§ 168.613, 168.620a (governing presidential primary elections in Michigan). The Michigan code also excludes presidential and vice presidential candidates from the requirement to submit the "affidavit of identity" that other candidates must submit to indicate that they "meet[] the constitutional and statutory qualifications for the office sought." See Davis v. Wayne Cnty. Election

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶87 Because the Electors have properly invoked Colorado's section 1-1-113 process to challenge the listing of President Trump on the presidential primary ballot as a wrongful act, we proceed to the other threshold questions raised by Intervenors.

C. The Disqualification Provision of Section Three Attaches Without Congressional Action

¶88 The Electors' challenge to the Secretary's ability to certify President Trump as a qualified candidate presumes that Section Three is "self-executing" in the sense that it is enforceable as a constitutional disqualification without implementing legislation from Congress. Because Congress has not authorized state courts to enforce Section Three, Intervenors argue that this court may not consider President Trump's alleged disqualification under Section Three in this section 1-1-113 proceeding.[11] We disagree.

Comm'n, No. 368615, 2023 WL 8656163, at *14 (Mich. Ct. App. Dec. 14, 2023) (unpublished order) (quoting Mich. Comp. Laws § 168.558(1)–(2)). Given these statutory constraints, it is unsurprising that the Michigan Court of Appeals recently concluded that the Michigan Secretary of State had no discretion to refrain from placing President Trump on the presidential primary ballot once his party identified him as a candidate. Id. at *16.

[11] Intervenors and their supporting amici occasionally assert that the Electors' claim is brought pursuant to Section Three and that the Section is not self-executing in the sense that it does not create an independent private right of action. But as mentioned above, the Electors do not bring any claim directly under Section Three. Their claim is brought under Colorado's Election Code, and resolution of that claim requires an examination of President Trump's qualifications in light of

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶89 The only mention of congressional power in Section Three is that "Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove" the disqualification of a former officer who had "engaged in insurrection." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. Section Three does not determine who decides whether the disqualification has attached in the first place.

¶90 Intervenors, however, look to Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that "[t]he Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article," to argue that congressional authorization is necessary for any enforcement of Section Three. Id. at § 5. This argument does not withstand scrutiny.

¶91 The Supreme Court has said that the Fourteenth Amendment "is undoubtedly self-executing without any ancillary legislation, so far as its terms are applicable to any existing state of circumstances." The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 20 (1883). To be sure, in the Civil Rights Cases, the Court was directly focused on the Thirteenth Amendment, so this statement could be described as dicta. But an examination of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments

---

Section Three. The question of "self-execution" that we confront here is not whether Section Three creates a cause of action or a remedy, but whether the disqualification from office defined in Section Three can be evaluated by a state court when presented with a proper vehicle (like section 1-1-113), without prior congressional authorization.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

("Reconstruction Amendments") and interpretation of them supports the accuracy and broader significance of the statement.

¶92 Section Three is one of four substantive sections of the Fourteenth Amendment:

- Section One: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . . ."
- Section Two: "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State . . . ."
- Section Three: "No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office . . . under the United States . . . who, having previously taken an oath . . . to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same . . . ."
- Section Four: "The validity of the public debt of the United States . . . shall not be questioned."

U.S. Const. amend. XIV, §§ 1–4 (emphases added). Section Five is then an enforcement provision that applies to each of these substantive provisions. Id. at § 5. And yet, the Supreme Court has held that Section One is self-executing. E.g., City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 524 (1997) ("As enacted, the Fourteenth Amendment confers substantive rights against the States which, like the provisions of the Bill of Rights, are self-executing."), superseded by statute, Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, 114 Stat. 803, on other grounds as recognized in Ramirez v. Collier, 595 U.S. 411, 424 (2022). Thus, while Congress may enact enforcement legislation pursuant to Section Five, congressional action is not required to give effect to the constitutional provision. See Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 651 (1966) (holding that Section Five gives Congress authority to "determin[e] whether and what legislation is needed to secure the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment," but not disputing that the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶93 Section Two, moreover, was enacted to eliminate the constitutional compromise by which an enslaved person was counted as only three-fifths of a person for purposes of legislative apportionment. William Baude & Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Sweep and Force of Section Three, 172 U. Pa. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2024) (manuscript at 51–52), https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751. The self-executing nature of that section has never been called into question, and in the reapportionment following passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress simply treated the change as having occurred. See The Apportionment Act of 1872, 17 Stat. 28 (42nd Congress) (apportioning Representatives to the various states based on Section Two's command without mentioning, or purporting to enforce, the Fourteenth Amendment). Similarly, Congress never passed enabling legislation to effectuate Section Four.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶94 The same is true for the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery and involuntary servitude. Section One provides the substantive provision: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude . . . shall exist within the United States . . . ." U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1 (emphasis added). Section Two provides the enforcement provision: "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Id. at § 2. Discussing this Amendment, the Supreme Court recognized that "legislation may be necessary and proper to meet all the various cases and circumstances to be affected by it," but that "[b]y its own unaided force it abolished slavery" and was "undoubtedly self-executing without any ancillary legislation." The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. at 20.

¶95 Like the other Reconstruction Amendments, the Fifteenth Amendment, which established universal male suffrage, contains a substantive provision—"[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged . . . on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude"—followed by an enforcement provision—"[t]he Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." U.S. Const. amend. XV, §§ 1–2 (emphasis added). As with Section One of both the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, the Supreme Court has explicitly confirmed that the Fifteenth Amendment is self-executing. E.g., South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 325 (1966) (holding that Section One of the Fifteenth Amendment "has always been treated as self-executing and has repeatedly been construed, without further legislative specification, to invalidate state voting qualifications or procedures which are discriminatory on their face or in practice").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶96 There is no textual evidence that Congress intended Section Three to be any different.[12] Furthermore, we agree with the Electors that interpreting any of the Reconstruction Amendments, given their identical structure, as not self-executing would lead to absurd results. If these Amendments required legislation to make them operative, then Congress could nullify them by simply not passing enacting legislation. The result of such inaction would mean that slavery remains legal; Black citizens would be counted as less than full citizens for reapportionment; non-white male voters could be disenfranchised; and any individual who engaged in insurrection against the government would nonetheless be able to serve in the [12] It would also be anomalous to say this disqualification for office-holding requires enabling legislation when the other qualifications for office-holding do not. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 ("No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."); id. at § 3, cl. 3 ("No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."); id. at art. II, § 1, cl. 5 ("No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.").

---

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

government, regardless of whether two-thirds of Congress had lifted the disqualification. Surely that was not the drafters' intent.

¶97 Intervenors argue that certain historical evidence requires a different conclusion as to Section Three. We generally turn to historical and other extrinsic evidence only when the text is ambiguous, which it is not here. Nonetheless, we will consider these historical claims in the interest of providing a thorough review.

¶98 Intervenors first highlight a statement Representative Thaddeus Stevens made during the Congressional framing debates: "[Section Three] will not execute itself, but as soon as it becomes a law, Congress at the next session will legislate to carry it out both in reference to the presidential and all other elections as we have the right to do." Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2544 (1866); see also Kurt T. Lash, The Meaning and Ambiguity of Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment 42 (Oct. 3, 2023) (unpublished manuscript), https://ssrn.com/abstract=4591838. But as one of the amici points out, this statement referenced a deleted portion of Section Three that disenfranchised all former Confederates until 1870. In any event, given the complex patchwork of perspectives and intentions expressed when drafting these constitutional provisions, we refuse to cherry-pick individual statements from extensive debates to ground our analysis. See generally Baude & Paulsen, supra (manuscript at 39–53).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶99 Intervenors next direct us to the non-binding opinion written by Chief Justice Salmon Chase while he was riding circuit: In re Griffin, 11 F. Cas. 7 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815) ("Griffin's Case").[13] There, Caesar Griffin challenged his criminal conviction as null and void because under Section Three, the judge who had entered his conviction was disqualified from holding judicial office, having formerly sworn a relevant oath as a state legislator and then engaged in insurrection by continuing to serve as a legislator in Virginia's Confederate government. Id. at 22–23. It was undisputed that the judge fell within Section Three's scope, but the question Chief Justice Chase sought to answer was whether Section Three "operat[ed] directly, without any intermediate proceeding whatever, upon all persons within the category of prohibition, and as depriving them at once, and absolutely, of all official authority and power." Id. at 23.

¶100 In interpreting the scope of the provision, Chief Justice Chase observed that, after the end of the Civil War but before the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, many southern states had established, with the approval of the federal government, provisional governments to keep society functioning. Id. at 25; see [13] Between 1789 and 1911, U.S. Supreme Court justices traveled across the country and, together with district court judges, sat on circuit courts to decide cases. See generally Joshua Glick, On the Road: The Supreme Court and the History of Circuit Riding, 24 Cardozo L. Rev. 1753 (2003). Decisions written by the justices while they were riding circuit were not decisions of the Supreme Court.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

also Baude & Paulsen, supra (manuscript at 36). And, within these provisional governments, many offices were filled with citizens who would fall within Section Three's scope. Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 25. Chief Justice Chase observed that giving Section Three a literal construction, as Griffin advocated, would "annul all official acts performed by these officers. No sentence, no judgment, no decree, . . . no official act [would be] of the least validity." Id. He reasoned that it would be "impossible to measure the evils which such a construction would add to the calamities which have already fallen upon the people of these states." Id.

¶101 And so, Chief Justice Chase turned to what he termed the "argument from inconveniences" and the interpretive canon that, when faced with two or more reasonable interpretations, the interpretation "is to be preferred which best harmonizes the amendment with the general terms and spirit of the act amended." Id. He then explained that, while it was not "improbable that one of the objects of this section was to provide for the security of the nation and of individuals, by the exclusion of a class of citizens from office," it could also "hardly be doubted that the main purpose was to inflict upon the leading and most influential characters who had been engaged in the Rebellion, exclusion from office as a punishment for the offense." Id. at 25–26. To find the provision self-executing under the circumstances, he argued, would be contrary to due process because it would, "at once without trial, deprive[] a whole class of persons of offices held by them." Id. at 26.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶102 Chief Justice Chase therefore concluded that the object of the Amendment—"to exclude from certain offices a certain class of persons"—was impossible to do "by a simple declaration, whether in the constitution or in an act of congress . . . . For, in the very nature of things, it must be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition, before any sentence of exclusion can be made to operate." Id. To accomplish "this ascertainment and ensure effective results, proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcements of decisions . . . are indispensable; and . . . can only be provided for by congress." Id. Thus, Chief Justice Chase concluded that Section Three was not self-executing. Id.

¶103 Griffin's Case concludes that congressional action is needed before Section Three disqualification attaches, but this one case does not persuade us of that point. Intervenors and amici assert that Griffin's Case "remains good law and has been repeatedly relied on." Because the case is not binding on us, the fact that it has not been reversed is of no particular significance. And the cases that cite it do so either with no analysis—e.g., State v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599 (1875), and Rothermel v. Meyerle, 136 Pa. 250 (1890)—or for the inapposite proposition that Section Three does not create a self-executing cause of action—e.g., Cale v. City of Covington, 586 F.2d 311, 316 (4th Cir. 1978), and Hansen v. Finchem, CV 2022-004321 (Sup. Ct.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

of Ariz., Maricopa Cnty. Apr. 22, 2022), aff'd on other grounds, 2022 WL 1468157 (May 9, 2022). Moreover, Griffin's Case has been the subject of persuasive criticism. See, e.g., Magliocca, Amnesty and Section Three, supra, at 105–08 (critiquing the case because the other provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment were understood as self-executing and the notion that Section Three was not self-executing was inconsistent with congressional behavior at the time); Baude & Paulsen, supra (manuscript at 37–49) (criticizing Chief Justice Chase's interpretation as wrong and constituting a strained interpretation based on policy and circumstances rather than established canons of construction).

¶104 Although we do not find Griffin's Case compelling, we agree with Chief Justice Chase that "it must be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition." 11 F. Cas. at 26. While the disqualification of Section Three attaches automatically, the determination that such an attachment has occurred must be made before the disqualification holds meaning. And Congress has the power under Section Five to establish a process for making that determination. But the fact that Congress may establish such a process does not mean that disqualification pursuant to Section Three can be determined only through a process established by Congress. Here, the Colorado legislature has established a process—a court proceeding pursuant to section 1-1-113—to make the determination whether a candidate is qualified to be placed on the presidential primary ballot. And, for the reasons we have already explained, that process is sufficient to permit a judicial determination of whether Section Three disqualification has attached to a particular individual.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶105 We are similarly unpersuaded by Intervenors' assertions that Congress created the only currently available mechanism for determining whether a person is disqualified pursuant to Section Three with the 1994 passage of 18 U.S.C. § 2383. That statute makes it a crime to "assist[] or engage[] in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States." True, with that enactment, Congress criminalized the same conduct that is disqualifying under Section Three. All that means, however, is that a person charged and convicted under 18 U.S.C. § 2383 would also be disqualified under Section Three. It cannot be read to mean that only those charged and convicted of violating that law are constitutionally disqualified from holding future office without assuming a great deal of meaning not present in the text of the law.

¶106 In summary, based on Section Three's plain language; Supreme Court decisions declaring its neighboring, parallel Reconstruction Amendments self-executing; and the absurd results that would flow from Intervenors' reading, we conclude that Section Three is self-executing in the sense that its disqualification provision attaches without congressional action. Intervenors' contrary arguments do not persuade us otherwise.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶107 That said, our conclusion that implementing legislation from Congress is unnecessary for us to proceed under section 1-1-113 does not resolve the question of whether doing so would violate the separation of powers among the three branches of government. We turn to this justiciability question next.

D. Section Three Is Justiciable

¶108 President Trump next asserts that presidential disqualification under Section Three presents a nonjusticiable political question. Again, we disagree.

¶109 "In general, the Judiciary has a responsibility to decide cases properly before it, even those it 'would gladly avoid.'" Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 194 (quoting Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 404 (1821)). The political question doctrine is a narrow exception to this rule, and a court may not avoid its responsibility to decide a case merely because it may have "political implications." Id. at 195–96 (quoting Immigr. & Naturalization Serv. v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 943 (1983)).

¶110 A controversy involves a nonjusticiable political question when, as relevant here, "there is 'a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it.'" Id. at 195 (quoting Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 228 (1993)); see also Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 210, 217 (1962) (noting that "[t]he nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers" and identifying the above-described instances, and four others not relevant here, as examples of political questions). The requisite textual commitment must be "[p]rominent on the surface of any case." Baker, 369 U.S. at 217.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶111 Here, President Trump argues that this case is nonjusticiable because, in his view, the Constitution and federal law commit the question of the qualifications of a presidential candidate to Congress. The Electors point out that President Trump did not argue before us that the questions presented in this appeal are also nonjusticiable based on a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards, and therefore, he arguably waived any such argument. We nevertheless address that issue, again in the interest of providing a thorough review.

1. No Textually Demonstrable Constitutional Commitment to Congress of Section Three Disqualification

¶112 Contrary to President Trump's assertions, we perceive no constitutional provision that reflects a textually demonstrable commitment to Congress of the authority to assess presidential candidate qualifications. Conversely, the Constitution commits certain authority concerning presidential elections to the states and in no way precludes the states from exercising authority to assess the qualifications of presidential candidates.

¶113 As discussed in Part B.4 above, Article II, Section 1, Clause 2 of the Constitution empowers state legislatures to direct how presidential electors are appointed, and the Supreme Court has recognized that this provision affords the states "far-reaching authority over presidential electors, absent some other constitutional constraint." Chiafalo, 140 S. Ct. at 2324. In furtherance of this delegation of authority, "the States have evolved comprehensive, and in many respects complex, election codes regulating in most substantial ways, with respect to both federal and state elections," the "selection and qualification of candidates," among other things. Storer, 415 U.S. at 730. The Election Code is an example of such a "comprehensive" code to regulate state and federal elections. And the fact that Article II, Section 1, Clause 4 authorizes Congress to determine the time for choosing the electors and the date on which they vote does not undermine the substantial authority provided to the states to regulate state and federal elections.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶114 In our view, Section Three's text is fully consistent with our conclusion that the Constitution has not committed the matter of presidential candidate qualifications to Congress. As we have noted, although Section Three requires a "vote of two-thirds of each House" to remove the disqualification set forth in Section Three, it says nothing about who or which branch should determine disqualification in the first place. See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. Moreover, if Congress were authorized to decide by a simple majority that a candidate is qualified under Section Three, as President Trump asserts, then this would nullify Section Three's supermajority requirement.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶115 President Trump's reliance on Article II, Section 1, Clause 5 of the Constitution and on the Twelfth, Fourteenth, and Twentieth Amendments is misplaced. We address each of these provisions, in turn.

¶116 Article II, Section 1, Clause 5 provides that no person shall be eligible to serve as President unless that person is "a natural born Citizen" who is at least thirty-five years of age and who has resided in the United States for at least fourteen years. This provision, however, says nothing about who or which branch should determine whether a candidate satisfies the qualification criteria either in the first instance or when a candidate's qualifications are challenged. See id.

¶117 The Twelfth Amendment charges the Electoral College with the task of selecting a candidate for President and then transmitting the electors' votes to the "seat of the government of the United States," and it provides the procedure by which the electoral votes are to be counted. U.S. Const. amend. XII. Nothing in the Twelfth Amendment, however, vests the Electoral College with the power to determine the eligibility of a presidential candidate. See Elliott v. Cruz, 137 A.3d 646, 650–51 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 2016), aff'd, 134 A.3d 51 (Pa. 2016) (mem.). Nor does the Twelfth Amendment give Congress "control over the process by which the President and Vice President are normally chosen, other than the very limited one of determining the day on which the electors were to 'give their votes.'" Id. at 651 (citing U.S. Const. amend. XII). And although the Twelfth Amendment provides for the scenario in which no President is selected by March 4 and specifies that no person constitutionally ineligible to serve as President shall be eligible to serve as Vice President, the Amendment does not assign to Congress (nor to any other branch) the task of determining whether a candidate is qualified in the first place.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶118 Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment authorizes Congress to pass legislation to enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, but as discussed above, the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing, and congressional action under Section Five is not required to animate Section Three's disqualification of insurrectionist oath-breakers. Nor does Section Five delegate to Congress the authority to determine the qualifications of presidential candidates to hold office. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 5.

¶119 Finally, the Twentieth Amendment, in relevant part, empowers Congress to enact procedures to address the scenario in which neither the President nor the Vice President qualifies for office before the time fixed for the beginning of their terms. U.S. Const. amend. XX, § 3. By its express language, however, this Amendment applies post-election. Id. (referring to the "President elect" and "Vice President elect"). Moreover, the Amendment says nothing about who determines in the first instance whether the President and Vice President are qualified to hold office.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶120 For these reasons, we perceive no textually demonstrable constitutional commitment to Congress of the authority to assess presidential candidate qualifications, and neither President Trump nor his amici identify any constitutional provision making such a commitment. In reaching this conclusion, we are unpersuaded by the cases on which President Trump and his amici rely, which are predicated on inferences they assert can be drawn from one or more of the foregoing constitutional provisions or on the fact that the cases had political implications. See, e.g., Taitz v. Democrat Party of Miss., No. 3:12-CV-280-HTW-LRA, 2015 WL 11017373, at *12–16 (S.D. Miss. Mar. 31, 2015); Grinols v. Electoral Coll., No. 2:12-cv-02997-MCE-DAD, 2013 WL 2294885, at *5–7 (E.D. Cal. May 23, 2013), aff'd, 622 F. App'x 624 (9th Cir. 2015); Kerchner v. Obama, 669 F. Supp. 2d 477, 483 n.5 (D.N.J. 2009), aff'd, 612 F.3d 204 (3d Cir. 2010); Robinson v. Bowen, 567 F. Supp. 2d 1144, 1146–47 (N.D. Cal. 2008); Keyes v. Bowen, 117 Cal. Rptr. 3d 207, 216 (Cal. Ct. App. 2010); Strunk v. N.Y. State Bd. of Elections, No. 6500/11, 2012 WL 1205117, at *11–12 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Apr. 11, 2012), aff'd in part, dismissed in part, 5 N.Y.S.3d 483 (N.Y. App. Div. 2015). As noted above, such inferences are insufficient to establish the requisite clear textual commitment to a coordinate branch of government, see Baker, 369 U.S. at 217, and we may not avoid our duty to decide a case merely because it may have political implications, Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 195–96.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶121 Moreover, we may not conflate "actions that are textually committed" to a coordinate political branch with "actions that are textually authorized." Stillman v. Dep't of Defense, 209 F. Supp. 2d 185, 202 (D.D.C. 2002), rev'd on other grounds sub nom., Stillman v. C.I.A., 319 F.3d 546 (D.C. Cir. 2003). The Supreme Court has prohibited courts from adjudicating only the former. Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 195. Absent an affirmative constitutional commitment, we cannot abdicate our responsibility to decide a case that is properly before us. Id. at 194.

2. Section Three Involves Judicially Discoverable and Manageable Standards

¶122 The question of whether there are judicially discoverable and manageable standards for determining a case is not wholly separate from the question of whether the matter has been textually committed to a coordinate political department. Nixon, 506 U.S. at 228. "[T]he lack of judicially manageable standards may strengthen the conclusion that there is a textually demonstrable commitment to a coordinate branch." Id. at 228–29.

¶123 As we have said, President Trump has not argued before us that Section Three lacks judicially discoverable and manageable standards, and we believe for good reason. Section Three disqualifies from certain delineated offices persons who have "taken an oath . . . to support the Constitution of the United States" as an "officer of the United States" and who have thereafter "engaged in insurrection or rebellion." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. Although, as we discuss below, the meanings of some of these terms may not necessarily be precise, we can discern their meanings using "familiar principles of constitutional interpretation" such as "careful examination of the textual, structural, and historical evidence put forward by the parties." Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 201.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶124 Indeed, in this and other contexts, courts have readily interpreted the terms that we are being asked to construe and have reached the substantive merits of the cases before them. See, e.g., United States v. Powell, 27 F. Cas. 605, 607 (C.C.D.N.C. 1871) (No. 16,079) (defining "engage" as that term is used in Section Three); United States v. Rhine, No. 210687 (RC), 2023 WL 2072450, at *8 (D.D.C. Feb. 17, 2023) (defining "insurrection" in the context of ruling on a motion in limine in a criminal prosecution arising out of the events of January 6); Holiday Inns Inc. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 571 F. Supp. 1460, 1487 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (defining "insurrection" in the context of an insurance policy exclusion); Gitlow v. Kiely, 44 F.2d 227, 233 (S.D.N.Y. 1930) (defining "insurrection" as that term is used in a section of the U.S. Code), aff'd, 49 F.2d 1077 (2d Cir. 1931); Hearon v. Calus, 183 S.E. 13, 20 (S.C. 1935) (defining "insurrection" as that term is used in a provision of the South Carolina constitution).

¶125 Accordingly, we conclude that interpreting Section Three does not "turn on standards that defy judicial application." Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 201 (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 211). In so concluding, we respectfully disagree with the Michigan

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Court of Claims' finding that the interpretation of the terms now before us constitutes a nonjusticiable political question merely because "there are . . . many answers and gradations of answers." Trump v. Benson, No. 23000151-MZ, slip op. at 24 (Mich. Ct. Cl. Nov. 14, 2023), aff'd sub nom. Davis v. Wayne Cnty. Election Comm'n, No. 368615, 2023 WL 8656163 (Mich. Ct. App. Dec. 14, 2023). In our view, declining to decide an issue simply because it requires us to address difficult and weighty questions of constitutional interpretation would create a slippery slope that could lead to a prohibited dereliction of our constitutional duty to adjudicate cases that are properly before us.

¶126 For these reasons, we conclude that the issues presented here do not, either alone or together, constitute a nonjusticiable political question. We thus proceed to the question of whether Section Three applies to the President.

E. Section Three Applies to the President

¶127 The parties debate the scope of Section Three. The Electors claim that this potential source of disqualification encompasses the President. President Trump argues that it does not, and the district court agreed. On this issue, we reverse the district court.

¶128 Section Three prohibits a person from holding any "office, civil or military, under the United States" if that person, as "an officer of the United States," took an oath "to support the Constitution of the United States" and subsequently engaged in insurrection. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. Accordingly, Section Three applies to President Trump only if (1) the Presidency is an "office, civil or military, under the United States"; (2) the President is an "officer of the United States"; and (3) the presidential oath set forth in Article II constitutes an oath "to support the Constitution of the United States." Id. We address each point in turn.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. The Presidency Is an Office Under the United States

¶129 The district court concluded that the Presidency is not an "office, civil or military, under the United States" for two reasons. Anderson, ¶¶ 303–04; see U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. First, the court noted that the Presidency is not specifically mentioned in Section Three, though senators, representatives, and presidential electors are. The court found it unlikely that the Presidency would be included in a catch-all of "any office, civil or military." Anderson, ¶ 304; see U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. Second, the court found it compelling that an earlier draft of the Section specifically included the Presidency, suggesting that the drafters intended to omit the Presidency in the version that passed. See Anderson, ¶ 303. We disagree with the district court's conclusion, as our reading of both the constitutional text and the historical record counsel that the Presidency is an "office . . . under the United States" within the meaning of Section Three.

¶130 When interpreting the Constitution, we prefer a phrase's normal and ordinary usage over "secret or technical meanings that would not have been known to ordinary citizens in the founding generation." District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 577 (2008). Dictionaries from the time of the Fourteenth Amendment's ratification define "office" as a "particular duty, charge or trust conferred by public authority, and for a public purpose," that is "undertaken by . . . authority from government or those who administer it." Noah Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language 689 (Chauncey A. Goodrich ed., 1853); see also 5 Johnson's English Dictionary 646 (J.E. Worcester ed., 1859) (defining "office" as "a publick charge or employment; magistracy"); United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211, 1214 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747) ("An office is defined to be 'a public charge or employment,' . . . ."). The Presidency falls comfortably within these definitions.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶131 We do not place the same weight the district court did on the fact that the Presidency is not specifically mentioned in Section Three. It seems most likely that the Presidency is not specifically included because it is so evidently an "office." In fact, no specific office is listed in Section Three; instead, the Section refers to "any office, civil or military." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. True, senators, representatives, and presidential electors are listed, but none of these positions is considered an "office" in the Constitution. Instead, senators and representatives are referred to as "members" of their respective bodies. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, cl. 1 ("Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members . . . ."); id. at § 6, cl. 2 ("[N]o Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office."); id. at art. II, § 1, cl. 2 ("[N]o Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶132 Indeed, even Intervenors do not deny that the Presidency is an office. Instead, they assert that it is not an office "under the United States." Their claim is that the President and elected members of Congress are the government of the United States, and cannot, therefore, be serving "under the United States." Id. at amend. XIV, § 3. We cannot accept this interpretation. A conclusion that the Presidency is something other than an office "under" the United States is fundamentally at odds with the idea that all government officials, including the President, serve "we the people." Id. at pmbl. A more plausible reading of the phrase "under the United States" is that the drafters meant simply to distinguish those holding federal office from those held "under any State." Id. at amend. XIV, § 3.

¶133 This reading of the language of Section Three is, moreover, most consistent with the Constitution as a whole. The Constitution refers to the Presidency as an "Office" twenty-five times. E.g., id. at art. I, § 3, cl. 5 ("The Senate shall chuse [sic] their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States." (emphasis added)); id. at art. II, § 1, cl. 5 (providing that "[n]o Person except a natural born Citizen . . . shall be eligible to the Office of President" and "[t]he executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America [who] shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years" (emphases added)). And it refers to an office "under the United States" in several contexts that clearly support the conclusion that the Presidency is such an office.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶134 Consider, for example, the Impeachment Clause, which reads that Congress can impose, as a consequence of impeachment, a "disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States." Id. at art. I, § 3, cl. 7. If the Presidency is not an "office . . . under the United States," then anyone impeached—including a President—could nonetheless go on to serve as President. See id. This reading is nonsensical, as recent impeachments demonstrate. The Articles of Impeachment brought against both President Clinton and President Trump asked for each man's "removal from office[,] and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." Articles of Impeachment Against William Jefferson Clinton, H. Res. 611, 105th Cong. (Dec. 19, 1998); see also Articles of Impeachment Against Donald J. Trump, H. Res. 755, 116th Cong. (Dec. 8, 2019); Articles of Impeachment Against Donald J. Trump, H. Res. 24, 117th Cong. (Jan 13, 2021). Surely the impeaching members of Congress correctly understood that either man, if convicted and subsequently disqualified from future federal office by the Senate, would be unable to hold the Presidency in the future.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶135 Similarly, the Incompatibility Clause states that "no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office." U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 2. To read "office under the United States" to exclude the Presidency would mean that a sitting President could also constitutionally occupy a seat in Congress, a result foreclosed by basic principles of the separation of powers. See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 124 (1976) ("The principle of separation of powers . . . was woven into the [Constitution] . . . . The further concern of the Framers of the Constitution with maintenance of the separation of powers is found in the so-called 'Ineligibility' and 'Incompatibility' Clauses contained in Art. I, s 6 . . . ."), superseded by statute on other grounds, Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, 116 Stat. 81, as recognized in McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93 (2003), overruled on other grounds by Citizens United v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 558 U.S. 310 (2010).

¶136 Finally, the Emoluments Clause provides that "no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under [the United States] shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State." U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 8. To read the Presidency as something other than an office under the United States would exempt the nation's chief diplomat from these protections against foreign influence. But Presidents have long sought dispensation from Congress to retain gifts from foreign leaders, understanding that the Emoluments Clause required them to do so.[14]

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶137 The district court found it compelling that an earlier draft of the proposed Section listed the Presidency, but the version ultimately passed did not. Anderson, ¶ 303. As a starting point, however, we are mindful that "it is always perilous to derive the meaning of an adopted provision from another provision deleted in the drafting process." Heller, 554 U.S. at 590. And the specifics of the change from the [14] See, e.g., H. Rep. No. 23-302, at 1–2 (Mar. 4, 1834) (discussing the receipt of gifts from the Emperor of Morocco and noting that the President's "surrender of the articles to the Government" satisfied the "constitutional provision in relation to their acceptance"); 14 Abridgement of the Debates of Congress from 1789 to 1856, 140–41 (Thomas Hart Benton ed., 6 1860) (displaying (1) a letter from the Secretary of State to the Imaum of Muscat indicating that the President "directed" the Secretary to refuse the Imaum's gifts "under existing constitutional provisions" and (2) a letter from the President requesting that Congress allow him to accept the gifts); An Act to authorize the sale of two Arabian horses, received as a present by the Consul of the United States at Zanzibar, from the Imaum of Muscat, Mar. 1, 1845, 5 Stat. 730 (providing that the President is "authorized" to sell some of the Imaum's gifts and place the proceeds in the U.S. Treasury); Joint Resolution No. 20, A Resolution providing for the Custody of the Letter and Gifts from the King of Siam, Mar. 15, 1862, 12 Stat. 616 (directing the King of Siam's gifts and letters to be placed in "the collection of curiosities at the Department of the Interior").

---

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

earlier draft to what was ultimately passed do not demonstrate an intent to exclude the Presidency from the covered offices.

¶138 The draft proposal provided that insurrectionist oath-breakers could not hold "the office of President or Vice President of the United States, Senator or Representative in the national Congress, or any office now held under appointment from the President of the United States, and requiring the confirmation of the Senate." Cong. Globe., 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 919 (1866) (emphasis added). Later versions of the Section—including the enacted draft—removed specific reference to the President and Vice President and expanded the category of office-holder to include "any office, civil or military" rather than only those offices requiring presidential appointment and Senate confirmation. See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3.

¶139 It is hard to glean from the limited available evidence what the changes across proposals meant. But we find persuasive amici's suggestion that Representative McKee, who drafted these proposals, most likely took for granted that his second proposal included the President. While nothing in Representative McKee's speeches mentions why his express reference to the Presidency was removed, his public pronouncements leave no doubt that his subsequent draft proposal still sought to ensure that rebels had absolutely no access to political power. Representative McKee explained that, under the proposed amendment,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"the loyal alone shall rule the country" and that traitors would be "cut[] off . . . from all political power in the nation." Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2505 (1866); see also Mark Graber, Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment: Our Questions, Their Answers, 22–23 (Univ. of Md. Legal Stud. Rsch. Paper No. 2023-16), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=4591133 ("Our Questions, Their Answers"); Mark A. Graber, Punish Treason, Reward Loyalty: The Forgotten Goals of Constitutional Reform After the Civil War 106, 114 (2023) (indicating that Representative McKee desired to exclude all oath-breaking insurrectionists from all federal offices, including the Presidency). When considered in light of these pronouncements, the shift from specifically naming the President and Vice President in addition to officers appointed and confirmed to the broadly inclusive "any officer, civil or military" cannot be read to mean that the two highest offices in the government are excluded from the mandate of Section Three.

¶140 The importance of the inclusive language—"any officer, civil or military"—was the subject of a colloquy in the debates around adopting the Fourteenth Amendment. Senator Reverdy Johnson worried that the final version of Section Three did not include the office of the Presidency. He stated, "[T]his amendment does not go far enough" because past rebels "may be elected President or Vice President of the United States." Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2899 (1866). So, he asked, "why did you omit to exclude them? I do not understand them to be excluded from the privilege of holding the two highest offices in the gift of the nation." Id. Senator Lot Morrill fielded this objection. He replied, "Let me call the Senator's attention to the words 'or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States.'" Id. This answer satisfied Senator Johnson, who stated, "Perhaps I am wrong as to the exclusion from the Presidency; no doubt I am; but I was misled by noticing the specific exclusion in the case of Senators and Representatives." Id. This colloquy further supports the view that the drafters of this Amendment intended the phrase "any office" to be broadly inclusive, and certainly to include the Presidency.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶141 Moreover, Reconstruction-Era citizens—supporters and opponents of Section Three alike—understood that Section Three disqualified oath-breaking insurrectionists from holding the office of the President. See Montpelier Daily Journal, Oct. 19, 1868 (writing that Section Three "excludes leading rebels from holding offices . . . from the Presidency downward"). Many supporters of Section Three defended the Amendment on the ground that it would exclude Jefferson Davis from the Presidency. See John Vlahoplus, Insurrection, Disqualification, and the Presidency, 13 Brit. J. Am. Legal Stud. (forthcoming 2023) (manuscript at 7–10), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=4440157; see also, e.g., Rebels and Federal Officers, Gallipolis J., Feb. 21, 1867, at 2 (arguing that foregoing Section Three would "render Jefferson Davis eligible to the Presidency of the United States," and "[t]here is something revolting in the very thought").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶142 Post-ratification history includes more of the same. For example, Congress floated the idea of blanket amnesty to shield rebels from Section Three. See Vlahoplus, supra, (manuscript at 7–9). In response, both supporters and dissenters acknowledged that doing so would allow the likes of Jefferson Davis access to the Presidency. See id.; see also, e.g., The Pulaski Citizen, The New Reconstruction Bill, Apr. 13, 1871, at 4 (acknowledging as a supporter of amnesty that it would "make even Jeff. Davis eligible again to the Presidency"); The Chicago Tribune, May 24, 1872 (asserting that amnesty would make rebels "eligible to the Presidency of the United States"); Indiana Progress, Aug. 24, 1871 (similar).

¶143 We conclude, therefore, that the plain language of Section Three, which provides that no disqualified person shall "hold any office, civil or military, under the United States," includes the office of the Presidency. This textual interpretation is bolstered by constitutional context and by history surrounding the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment.

2. The President Is an Officer of the United States

¶144 We next consider whether a President is an "officer of the United States." U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 3. The district court found that the drafters of Section Three did not intend to include the President within the catch-all phrase "officer of the United States," and, accordingly, that a current or former President can engage in insurrection and then run for and hold any office. Anderson, ¶ 312; see U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 3. We disagree for four reasons.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶145 First, the normal and ordinary usage of the term "officer of the United States" includes the President. As we have explained, the plain meaning of "office . . . under the United States" includes the Presidency; it follows then that the President is an "officer of the United States." See Motions Sys. Corp. v. Bush, 437 F.3d 1356, 1372 (Fed. Cir. 2006) (Gajarsa, J., concurring in part) ("An interpretation of the Constitution in which the holder of an 'office' is not an 'officer' seems, at best, strained."). Indeed, Americans have referred to the President as an "officer" from the days of the founding. See, e.g., The Federalist No. 69 (Alexander Hamilton) ("The President of the United States would be an officer elected by the people . . . ."). And many nineteenth-century presidents were described as, or called themselves, "chief executive officer of the United States." See Vlahoplus, supra (manuscript at 17–18) (listing presidents).

¶146 Second, Section Three's drafters and their contemporaries understood the President as an officer of the United States. See Graber, Our Questions, Their Answers, supra, at 18–19 (listing instances); see also Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 915 (1866) (referring to the "chief executive officer of the country"); The Floyd Acceptances, 74 U.S. 666, 676–77 (1868) ("We have no officers in this government, from the President down to the most subordinate agent, who does not hold office under the law, with prescribed duties and limited authority." (emphases added)).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶147 President Trump concedes as much on appeal, stating that "[t]o be sure, the President is an officer." He argues, however, that the President is an officer of the Constitution, not an "officer of the United States," which, he posits, is a constitutional term of art. Further, at least one amicus contends that the above-referenced historical uses referred to the President as an officer only in a "colloquial sense," and thus have no bearing on the term's use in Section Three. We disagree.

¶148 The informality of these uses is exactly the point: If members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress and their contemporaries all used the term "officer" according to its ordinary meaning to refer to the President, we presume this is the same meaning the drafters intended it to have in Section Three. We perceive no persuasive contemporary evidence demonstrating some other, technical term-of-art meaning. And in the absence of a clear intent to employ a technical definition for a common word, we will not do so. See Heller, 554 U.S. at 576 (explaining that the "normal and ordinary as distinguished from technical meaning" should be favored (quoting United States v. Sprague, 282 U.S. 716, 731 (1931))).

¶149 We also find Attorney General Stanbery's opinions on the meaning of Section Three significant. In one opinion on the subject, Stanbery explained that the term "'officer of the United States,' within [Section Three] . . . is used in its most general sense, and without any qualification, as legislative, or executive, or judicial." The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y. Gen. 141, 158 (1867) ("Stanbery I"). And in a second opinion on the topic, he observed that the term "Officers of the United States" includes "without limitation" any "person who has at any time prior to the rebellion held any office, civil or military, under the United States, and has taken an official oath to support the Constitution of the United States." The Reconstruction Acts, 12 Op. Att'y. Gen. 182, 203 (1867) ("Stanbery II").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶150 Third, the structure of Section Three persuades us that the President is an officer of the United States. The first half of Section Three describes the offices protected and the second half addresses the parties barred from holding those protected offices. There is a parallel structure between the two halves: "Senator or Representative in Congress" (protected office) corresponds to "member of Congress" (barred party); "any office . . . under the United States" (protected office) corresponds to "officer of the United States" (barred party); and "any office . . . under any State" (protected office) also has a corresponding barred party in "member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. The only term in the first half of Section Three that has no corresponding officer or party in the second half is "elector of President and Vice President," which makes sense because electors do not take constitutionally mandated oaths so they have no corresponding barred party. Id.; see also id. at art. II, § 1 (discussing a presidential elector's duties without reference to an oath); id. at art. VI (excluding presidential electors from the list of positions constitutionally obligated to take an oath to support the Constitution). Save electors, there is a perfect parallel structure in Section Three. See Baude & Paulsen, supra (manuscript at 106).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶151 Fourth, the clear purpose of Section Three—to ensure that disloyal officers could never again play a role in governing the country—leaves no room to conclude that "officer of the United States" was used as a term of art. Id. The drafters of Section Three were motivated by a sense of betrayal; that is, by the existence of a broken oath, not by the type of officer who broke it: "[A]ll of us understand the meaning of the third section," Senator John Sherman stated, "[it includes] those men who have once taken an oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States and have violated that oath in spirit by taking up arms against the Government of the United States are to be deprived for a time at least of holding office . . . ." Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2899 (1866); see also id. at 2898 (Senator Thomas Hendricks of Indiana, who opposed the Fourteenth Amendment, agreeing that "the theory" of Section Three was "that persons who have violated the oath to support the Constitution of the United States ought not to be allowed to hold any office."); id. at 3035–36 (Senator John B. Henderson explaining that "[t]he language of this section is so framed as to disfranchise from office . . . the leaders of any rebellion hereafter to come."); Powell, 27 F. Cas. at 607 (summarizing the purpose of Section Three: "[T]hose who had been once trusted to support the power of the United States, and proved false to the trust reposed, ought not, as a class, to be entrusted with power again until congress saw fit to relieve them from disability."). A construction of Section Three that would nevertheless allow a former President who broke his oath, not only to participate in the government again but to run for and hold the highest office in the land, is flatly unfaithful to the Section's purpose.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶152 We therefore conclude that "officer of the United States," as used in Section Three, includes the President.

3. The Presidential Oath Is an Oath to Support the Constitution

¶153 Finally, we consider whether the oath taken by the President to "preserve, protect and defend the Constitution," U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 8, is an oath "to support the Constitution of the United States," id. at amend. XIV, § 3. The district court found that, because the presidential oath's language is more particular than the oath referenced in Section Three, the drafters did not intend to include former Presidents. Anderson, ¶ 313. We disagree.

¶154 Article VI of the Constitution provides that "all executive and judicial Officers . . . of the United States . . . shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution."[15] U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 3. Article II specifies that the President shall swear an oath to "preserve, protect and defend the Constitution." Id. at art. II, § 1, cl. 8. Intervenors contend that because the Article II oath does not include a pledge to "support" the Constitution, an insurrectionist President cannot be disqualified from holding future office under Section Three on the basis of that oath.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶155 This argument fails because the President is an "executive . . . Officer[]" of the United States under Article VI, albeit one for whom a more specific oath is prescribed. Id. at art. VI, cl. 3 ("The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution . . . ."). This conclusion follows logically from the accepted fact that the Vice President is also an executive officer. True, the Vice President takes the more general oath prescribed by federal law, see 5 U.S.C. § 3331 (noting that anyone "except the President, elected or appointed to an office of honor or profit in the civil service or uniformed services, shall take" an oath including a pledge to "support and defend the Constitution"), [15] Article VI, however, does not provide any specific form of oath or affirmation.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

but it makes no sense to conclude that the Vice President is an executive officer under Article VI but the President is not.

¶156 The language of the presidential oath—a commitment to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution"—is consistent with the plain meaning of the word "support." U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 8. Modern dictionaries define "support" to include "defend" and vice versa. See, e.g., Support, Merriam-Webster Dictionary, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/support [https://perma.cc/WGH6-D8KU] (defining "support" as "to uphold or defend as valid or right"); see also Defend, at id., https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/defend [https://perma.cc/QXQ7-LRKX] (defining "defend" as "to maintain or support in the face of argument or hostile criticism"). So did dictionaries from the time of Section Three's drafting. See, e.g., Samuel Johnson, A Dictionary of the English Language (5th ed. 1773) ("defend": "to stand in defense of; to protect; to support"); Noah Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language 271 (Chauncey A. Goodrich, ed., 1857) ("defend": "to support or maintain").

¶157 The specific language of the presidential oath does not make it anything other than an oath to support the Constitution. Indeed, as one Senator explained just a few years before Section Three's ratification, "the language in [the presidential] oath of office, that he shall protect, support [sic], and defend the Constitution, makes his obligation more emphatic and more obligatory, if possible, than ours, which is simply to support the Constitution." Cong. Globe, 37th Cong., 3d Sess. 89 (1862). And, in fact, several nineteenth-century Presidents referred to the presidential oath as an oath to "support" the Constitution. See James D. Richardson, A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789–1897, Vol. 1 at 232, 467 (Adams, Madison), Vol. 2 at 625 (Jackson), Vol. 8 at 381 (Cleveland).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶158 In sum, "[t]he simplest and most obvious interpretation of a Constitution, if in itself sensible, is the most likely to be that meant by the people in its adoption." Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 671 (1889). The most obvious and sensible reading of Section Three, supported by text and history, leads us to conclude that (1) the Presidency is an "office under the United States," (2) the President is an "officer . . . of the United States," and (3) the presidential oath under Article II is an oath to "support" the Constitution.

¶159 President Trump asks us to hold that Section Three disqualifies every oath-breaking insurrectionist except the most powerful one and that it bars oath-breakers from virtually every office, both state and federal, except the highest one in the land. Both results are inconsistent with the plain language and history of Section Three.

¶160 We therefore reverse the district court's finding that Section Three does not apply to a President and conclude that Section Three bars President Trump from holding the office of the President if its other provisions are met; namely, if President Trump "engaged in insurrection." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶161 Before addressing the district court's findings that President Trump engaged in insurrection, however, we consider President Trump's challenge to the admissibility of a congressional report on which the district court premised some of its findings.

F. The District Court Did Not Err in Admitting Portions of the January 6 Report

¶162 President Trump asserts that the district court wrongly admitted into evidence thirty-one findings from a congressional report drafted by the Select Committee to Investigate the January 6th Attack on the U.S. Capitol ("the Committee"), which recounted the Committee's investigation of the facts, circumstances, and causes of the attack on the Capitol. See H.R. Rep. No. 117-663 (Dec. 22, 2022) ("the Report"). In President Trump's view, the Report is an untrustworthy, partisan political document and therefore constituted inadmissible hearsay under Rule 803(8)(C) of the Colorado Rules of Evidence. We are unpersuaded. Under the deferential standard of review that governs, we perceive no error by the district court in admitting portions of the Report into evidence at trial.

¶163 We review a district court's evidentiary rulings for an abuse of discretion. Zapata v. People, 2018 CO 82, ¶ 25, 428 P.3d 517, 524. "A court abuses its discretion only if its decision is 'manifestly arbitrary, unreasonable, or unfair.'" Churchill v. Univ. of Colo. at Boulder, 2012 CO 54, ¶ 74, 285 P.3d 986, 1008 (quoting Freedom Colo. Info., Inc. v. El Paso Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 196 P.3d 892, 899 (Colo. 2008)). We may not consider "whether we would have reached a different result," but only "whether the trial court's decision fell within a range of reasonable options." Id. (quoting E-470 Pub. Highway Auth. v. Revenig, 140 P.3d 227, 230–31 (Colo. App. 2006)).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶164 Hearsay statements are out-of-court statements offered in court for the truth of the matter asserted. CRE 801(c). Such statements are generally inadmissible, CRE 802, but CRE 803(8) creates an exception for "reports . . . of public offices or agencies, setting forth . . . factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law." This exception, however, applies only if the report is trustworthy. Id.

¶165 The Federal Rules of Evidence (on which our evidentiary rules were modeled) contain a near-identical exception to Colorado Rule 803(8), see Fed. R. Evid. 803(8), so we may look to federal case law interpreting the federal rule for guidance on how to assess trustworthiness, see Garcia v. Schneider Energy Servs., Inc., 2012 CO 62, ¶ 10, 287 P.3d 112, 115 (noting that, although we are "not bound to interpret our rules . . . the same way the United States Supreme Court has interpreted its rules, we do look to the federal rules and federal decisions interpreting those rules for guidance"); Harding Glass Co. v. Jones, 640 P.2d 1123, 1125 n.3 (Colo. 1982) ("[C]ase law interpreting the federal rule is persuasive in analysis of the Colorado rule."). Under federal law, courts are instructed to "assume[] admissibility in the first instance." Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153, 167 (1988). Thus, "the party challenging the admissibility of a public or agency report . . . bears the burden of demonstrating that the report is not trustworthy." Barry v. Trs. of Int'l Ass'n, 467 F. Supp. 2d 91, 96 (D.D.C. 2006). The federal courts have also identified four non-exclusive factors to help courts determine trustworthiness: "(1) the timeliness of the investigation; (2) the special skill or expertise of the investigating official; (3) whether a hearing was held and the level at which it was conducted; and (4) possible motivation problems." Id. at 97; see Beech Aircraft, 488 U.S. at 167 n.11.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶166 The district court employed the foregoing presumption and four factors to analyze the Report.[16] The court determined that "the first three Barry factors weigh [16] We also review a district court's trustworthiness analysis for an abuse of discretion. See United States v. Versaint, 849 F.2d 827, 831–32 (3d Cir. 1988) ("Under [Fed. R. Evid. 803(8)], this Court must decide whether the district court abused its discretion by '[g]iving undue weight to trustworthiness factors of slight relevance while disregarding factors more significant.'"(quoting In re Japanese Elec. Prods. Antitrust Litig., 723 F.2d 238, 266 (3d Cir. 1983))); Bright v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 756 F.2d 19, 22 (6th Cir. 1984) ("Rule 803(8)(C) also requires that the report not be subject to circumstances indicating a lack of trustworthiness. This determination is within the discretion of the trial court."); Denny v. Hutchinson Sales Corp., 649 F.2d 816, 821–22 (10th Cir. 1981) ("We believe that 'the trial court strongly in favor of reliability." Anderson, ¶ 24. President Trump focuses his admissibility challenge on the fourth factor: "possible motivation problems." Barry, 467 F. Supp. 2d at 97.

---

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶167 First, President Trump claims the Report was biased against him because all nine Committee members voted in favor of impeaching him before their investigation began. Timothy Heaphy, Chief Investigative Counsel for the Committee, testified at trial, however, that although members "certainly had . . . hypotheses that were a starting point," such hypotheses did not impair the members' ability to be fair and impartial. Anderson, ¶ 26. The district court found "Mr. Heaphy's testimony on this subject to be credible and h[eld] that any perceived animus of the committee members towards [President] Trump did not taint the conclusions of the January 6th Report in such a way that would render them unreliable." Id. We see no abuse of discretion. See People v. Pitts, 13 P.3d 1218, 1221 (Colo. 2000) ("It is the function of the trial court, and not the reviewing court, to weigh evidence and determine the credibility of the witnesses.").

¶168 Second, President Trump believes that the political backdrop against which the Report was created makes it unreliable. This argument proves too much. All is the first and best judge of whether tendered evidence meets th[at] standard of trustworthiness and reliability . . .' and [w]e cannot say the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to admit the report." (quoting Franklin v. Skelly Oil Co., 141 F.2d 568, 572 (10th Cir. 1944))).

---

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

congressional reports contain some level of political motivation, yet neither CRE 803(8) nor the corresponding federal rule declares such reports per se inadmissible; instead, as the district court explained, a court is at liberty to admit what it deems trustworthy. See Anderson, ¶ 28; see, e.g., Barry, 467 F. Supp. 2d at 101 (admitting report from a Senate investigation); Mariani v. United States, 80 F. Supp. 2d 352, 361 (M.D. Pa. 1999) (admitting minority report from a Congressional investigation); Hobson v. Wilson, 556 F. Supp. 1157, 1183 (D.D.C. 1982) (admitting Congressional Committee report), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, 737 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

¶169 Third, President Trump asserts that because Democrats outnumbered Republicans seven to two on the Committee, the Report's findings are necessarily biased. The district court determined that although the Report "would have further reliability had there been greater Republican participation," that deficit did not demonstrate "motivation problems." Anderson, ¶¶ 29–30. The district court observed that House Republicans opted to boycott the Committee after then-Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi agreed to seat only three of the five Republicans recommended to her. Id. at ¶ 30. Despite then-Speaker Pelosi's "unprecedented" move, id., the district court noted that "the two Republicans who did sit . . . were both duly elected Republicans," id. at ¶ 31; "[t]he investigative staff included . . . many Republican[]" lawyers, id. at ¶ 32; "the staffing decisions did not include any inquiry into political affiliation," id.; and "[t]he overwhelming majority of witnesses . . . were [President] Trump administration officials and Republicans," id. at ¶ 33. The court reasoned that "[t]hese facts all cut against Intervenors' argument that lack of participation of the minority party resulted in . . . unreliable conclusions." Id. at ¶ 34.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶170 Again, we perceive no abuse of discretion. CRE 803(8) assumes admissibility, Barry, 467 F. Supp. 2d at 96, and President Trump has not met his burden of demonstrating that, contrary to the evidence the district court highlighted, the Report suffered from motivation problems. See id. Moreover, we remain mindful that this is a four-factor inquiry. No single factor is dispositive. Instead, any perceived shortcomings as to one must be weighed against the strengths of the others. Whatever the "possible motivation problems," the weight of the other three factors remains. As the district court explained, (1) passage of time does not impugn the Report, as the investigation began six months after the attack and was completed in under two years; (2) the investigative staff consisted of highly skilled lawyers, including two former U.S. Attorneys; and (3) there was a formal ten-day hearing in which seventy witnesses testified under oath. Anderson, ¶ 24. So, not only was the court's analysis of the fourth factor reasonable, but it also did not abuse its discretion in reaching its broader conclusion that the Report was trustworthy.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶171 President Trump nonetheless argues that, even if the Report is generally admissible under the CRE 803(8) exception, there were eleven admitted findings within the Report that remained independently inadmissible. Even if the general admissibility of the Report does not necessarily give a green light to multiple layers of hearsay, we conclude that only two of the eleven challenged findings constituted hearsay within hearsay.[17] And even if there was error in admitting those findings, neither is of sufficient consequence to warrant reversal. See Liggett v. People, 135 P.3d 725, 733 (Colo. 2006) (explaining that, under harmless error review, we will reverse only if, viewing the evidence as a whole, the error substantially influenced the outcome or impaired the fairness of the trial and that, [17] The nine remaining statements fall into three categories: statements made (1) by President Trump, (2) to President Trump, and (3) by his supporters during chants. First, President Trump's own statements are not hearsay under the party-opponent rule. See CRE 801(d)(2)(A). Second, various statements made to President Trump on January 6 are not hearsay because they were offered to show the statements' effect on the listener (i.e., that President Trump had knowledge of certain issues). See CRE 801(c); People v. Vanderpauye, 2023 CO 42 ¶ 21 n.4, 530 P.3d 1214, 1221 n.4 (accepting that a "statement was not hearsay because it was offered for its effect on the listener . . . not for the truth of the matter asserted"). Third, chants by President Trump's supporters were not offered to prove the truth of the chants, but simply to establish that the statements were made. That is not hearsay. CRE 801(c); see People v. Dominguez, 2019 COA 78 ¶ 20, 454 P.3d 364, 369 (stating that "verbal acts aren't hearsay" because such a statement is "offered not for its truth, but to show that it was made"). Thus, none of the findings in these three classes constitutes hearsay within the Report.

---

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"[i]n the context of a bench trial, the prejudicial effect of improperly admitted evidence is generally presumed innocuous").

¶172 First, the Report cited a newspaper article stating that the election was called for President Biden. Although this is hearsay, the district court did not rely on the statement in its analysis, so President Trump was not prejudiced by any error in admitting this statement. See Raile v. People, 148 P.3d 126, 136 (Colo. 2006) ("[T]here is no reasonable probability that Raile was prejudiced by the admission of the statements; thus, the trial court's error was harmless.").

¶173 Second, the Report explained that Chief of Staff Mark Meadows told White House Counsel Pat Cipollone that President Trump "doesn't want to do anything" to stop the violence. H.R. Rep. No. 117 663, at 110. The fact that this statement is hearsay is irrelevant: The district court expressly noted that "it has only considered those portions of the January 6th Report which are referenced in this Order and has considered no other portions in reaching its decision," Anderson, ¶ 38, and it did not mention this statement in its order, nor did it rely on it to reach any conclusions. Thus, President Trump's embedded hearsay argument is unavailing.

¶174 For these reasons, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion by admitting portions of the Report into evidence.

¶175 We now consider the district court's findings that President Trump "engaged in" an "insurrection" within the meaning of Section Three.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

G. President Trump Engaged in Insurrection

¶176 President Trump challenges the district court's findings that he "engaged in" an "insurrection." The Constitution leaves these terms undefined. Therefore, we must make a legal determination regarding what the drafters and ratifiers meant when they chose to deploy these words in Section Three. Mindful of the deferential standard of review afforded a district court's factual findings, we conclude that the district court did not clearly err in concluding that the events of January 6 constituted an insurrection and that President Trump engaged in that insurrection.

1. Standard of Review

¶177 As a general matter, we review findings of fact under either a clear error or abuse of discretion standard, and we review legal conclusions de novo. E-470 Pub. Highway Auth. v. 455 Co., 3 P.3d 18, 22 (Colo. 2000); accord State ex rel. Weiser v. Ctr. for Excellence in Higher Educ., Inc., 2023 CO 23, ¶ 33, 529 P.3d 599, 607. When, however, the issue before an appellate court presents a mixed question of law and fact, Colorado courts have taken different approaches, depending on the circumstances. 455 Co., 3 P.3d at 22. For example, courts have sometimes treated the ultimate conclusion as one of fact and applied the clear error standard. Id. In other cases, courts have concluded that a mixed question of law and fact mandates de novo review. Id. And when a trial court made evidentiary findings of fact in support of its application of a legal principle from another jurisdiction, we have found it appropriate to conduct an abuse of discretion review of the evidentiary factual findings supporting the legal conclusion and a de novo review of the legal conclusion itself. Id. at 23.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶178 For our purposes here, where we are called on to review the district court's construction of certain terms used in Section Three to the facts established by the evidence, we will review the district court's factual findings for clear error and its legal conclusions de novo.

2. "Insurrection"

¶179 Dictionaries (both old and new), the district court's order, and the briefing by the parties and the amici curiae suggest several definitions of the word "insurrection."

¶180 For example, Noah Webster's dictionary from 1860 defined "insurrection" as:

> A rising against civil or political authority; the open and active opposition of a number of persons to the execution of law in a city or state. It is equivalent to SEDITION, except that sedition expresses a less extensive rising of citizens. It differs from REBELLION, for the latter expresses a revolt, or an attempt to overthrow the government, to establish a different one, or to place the country under another jurisdiction.

Noah Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language 613 (1860); accord John Bouvier, A Law Dictionary Adapted to the Constitution and Laws of the United States of America and of the Several States to the American Union (6th ed. 1856), available at https://wzukusers.storage.googleapis.com/user-32960741/documents/5ad525c314331myoR8FY/1856_bouvier_6.pdf [https://perma.cc/PXK4-M75N] (defining "insurrection" as "[a] rebellion of citizens or subjects of a country against its government").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶181 Webster's Third New International Dictionary defines "insurrection" as "an act or instance of revolting against civil or political authority or against an established government" or "an act or instance of rising up physically." Insurrection, Webster's Third New International Dictionary (2002).

¶182 In light of these and other proffered definitions, the district court concluded that "an insurrection as used in Section Three is (1) a public use of force or threat of force (2) by a group of people (3) to hinder or prevent execution of the Constitution of the United States." Anderson, ¶ 240.

¶183 Finally, we note that at oral argument, President Trump's counsel, while not providing a specific definition, argued that an insurrection is more than a riot but less than a rebellion. We agree that an insurrection falls along a spectrum of related conduct. See The Brig Amy Warwick (The Prize Cases), 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635, 666 (1862) ("Insurrection against a government may or may not culminate in an organized rebellion, but a civil war always begins by insurrection against the lawful authority of the Government."); Case of Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63, 96 (C.C.D. Va.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1871) (No. 3,621a) ("Although treason by levying war, in a case of civil war, may involve insurrection or rebellion, and they are usually its first stages, they do not necessarily reach to the actual levying of war."); 77 C.J.S. Riot; Insurrection § 36, Westlaw (database updated August 2023) ("Insurrection is distinguished from rout, riot, and offenses connected with mob violence by the fact that, in insurrection, there is an organized and armed uprising against authority or operations of government, while crimes growing out of mob violence, however serious they may be and however numerous the participants, are simply unlawful acts in disturbance of the peace which do not threaten the stability of the government or the existence of political society."). But we part company with him when he goes one step further. No authority supports the position taken by President Trump's counsel at oral argument that insurrectionary conduct must involve a particular length of time or geographic location.

¶184 Although we acknowledge that these definitions vary and some are arguably broader than others, for purposes of deciding this case, we need not adopt a single, all-encompassing definition of the word "insurrection." Rather, it suffices for us to conclude that any definition of "insurrection" for purposes of Section Three would encompass a concerted and public use of force or threat of force by a group of people to hinder or prevent the U.S. government from taking the actions necessary to accomplish a peaceful transfer of power in this country.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The required force or threat of force need not involve bloodshed, nor must the dimensions of the effort be so substantial as to ensure probable success. In re Charge to Grand Jury, 62 F. 828, 830 (N.D. Ill. 1894). Moreover, although those involved must act in a concerted way, they need not be highly organized at the insurrection's inception. See Home Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Davila, 212 F.2d 731, 736 (1st Cir. 1954) ("[A]t its inception an insurrection may be a pretty loosely organized affair. . . . It may start as a sudden surprise attack upon the civil authorities of a community with incidental destruction of property by fire or pillage, even before the military forces of the constituted government have been alerted and mobilized into action to suppress the insurrection.").

¶185 The question thus becomes whether the evidence before the district court sufficiently established that the events of January 6 constituted a concerted and public use of force or threat of force by a group of people to hinder or prevent the U.S. government from taking the actions necessary to accomplish the peaceful transfer of power in this country. We have little difficulty concluding that substantial evidence in the record supported each of these elements and that, as the district court found, the events of January 6 constituted an insurrection.

¶186 It is undisputed that a large group of people forcibly entered the Capitol and that this action was so formidable that the law enforcement officers onsite could not control it. Moreover, contrary to President Trump's assertion that no evidence in the record showed that the mob was armed with deadly weapons or that it attacked law enforcement officers in a manner consistent with a violent insurrection, the district court found—and millions of people saw on live television, recordings of which were introduced into evidence in this case—that the mob was armed with a wide array of weapons. See Anderson, ¶ 155. The court also found that many in the mob stole objects from the Capitol's premises or from law enforcement officers to use as weapons, including metal bars from the police barricades and officers' batons and riot shields and that throughout the day, the mob repeatedly and violently assaulted police officers who were trying to defend the Capitol. Id. at ¶¶ 156–57. The fact that actual and threatened force was used that day cannot reasonably be denied.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶187 Substantial evidence in the record further established that this use of force was concerted and public. As the district court found, with ample record support, "The mob was coordinated and demonstrated a unity of purpose .... They marched through the [Capitol] building chanting in a manner that made clear they were seeking to inflict violence against members of Congress and Vice President Pence." Id. at ¶ 243. And upon breaching the Capitol, the mob immediately pursued its intended target—the certification of the presidential election—and reached the House and Senate chambers within minutes of entering the building. Id. at ¶ 153.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶188 Finally, substantial evidence in the record showed that the mob's unified purpose was to hinder or prevent Congress from counting the electoral votes as required by the Twelfth Amendment and from certifying the 2020 presidential election; that is, to preclude Congress from taking the actions necessary to accomplish a peaceful transfer of power. As noted above, soon after breaching the Capitol, the mob reached the House and Senate chambers, where the certification process was ongoing. Id. This breach caused both the House and the Senate to adjourn, halting the electoral certification process. In addition, much of the mob's ire—which included threats of physical violence—was directed at Vice President Pence, who, in his role as President of the Senate, was constitutionally tasked with carrying out the electoral count. Id. at ¶¶ 163, 179–80; see U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 4; id. at art. II, § 1, cl. 3. As discussed more fully below, these actions were the product of President Trump's conduct in singling out Vice President Pence for refusing President Trump's demand that the Vice President decline to carry out his constitutional duties. Anderson, ¶¶ 148, 170, 172–73.

¶189 In short, the record amply established that the events of January 6 constituted a concerted and public use of force or threat of force by a group of people to hinder or prevent the U.S. government from taking the actions necessary to accomplish the peaceful transfer of power in this country. Under any viable definition, this constituted an insurrection, and thus we will proceed to consider whether President Trump "engaged in" this insurrection.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

3. "Engaged In"

¶190 Dictionaries, historical evidence, and case law all shed light on the meaning of "engaged in," as that phrase is used in Section Three.

¶191 Noah Webster's dictionary from 1860 defined "engage" as "to embark in an affair." Noah Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language 696 (1860). Similarly, Webster's Third New International Dictionary defines "engage" as "to begin and carry on an enterprise" or "to take part" or "participate." Engage, Webster's Third New International Dictionary (2002). And Merriam-Webster defines "engage" as including both "to induce to participate" and "to do or take part in something." Engage, Merriam-Webster Dictionary, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/engage [https://perma.cc/7JDM-4XSB].

¶192 Attorney General Stanbery's opinions on the meaning of "engage," which he issued at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was being debated, are in accord with these historical and modern definitions. Attorney General Stanbery opined that a person may "engage" in insurrection or rebellion "without having actually levied war or taken arms." Stanbery I, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. at 161. Thus, in Attorney General Stanbery's view, when individuals acting in their official capacities act "in the furtherance of the common unlawful purpose" or do "any overt act for the purpose of promoting the rebellion," they have "engaged" in insurrection or rebellion for Section Three disqualification purposes. Id. at 161–62; see also Stanbery II, 12 Op. Att'y. Gen. at 204 (defining "engaging in rebellion" to require "an overt and voluntary act, done with the intent of aiding or furthering the common unlawful purpose"). Accordingly, "[d]isloyal sentiments, opinions, or sympathies would not disqualify; but when a person has, by speech or by writing, incited others to engage in rebellion, [h]e must come under the disqualification." Stanbery II, 12 Op. Att'y. Gen. at 205; accord Stanbery I, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. at 164.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶193 Turning to case law construing the meaning of "engaged in" for purposes of Section Three, although we have found little precedent directly on point, cases concerning treason that had been decided by the time the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified provide some insight into how the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment would have understood the term "engaged in." For example, in Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. 75, 126 (1807), Chief Justice Marshall explained that "if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors." In other words, an individual need not directly participate in the overt act of levying war or insurrection for the law to hold him accountable as if he had:

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> [I]t is not necessary to prove that the individual accused, was a direct, personal actor in the violence. If he was present, directing, aiding, abetting, counselling, or countenancing it, he is in law guilty of the forcible act. Nor is even his personal presence indispensable. Though he be absent at the time of its actual perpetration, yet if he directed the act, devised or knowingly furnished the means, for carrying it into effect, instigating others to perform it, he shares their guilt. In treason there are no accessories.

In re Charge to Grand Jury-Treason, 30 F. Cas. 1047, 1048 (C.C.E.D. Pa. 1851).

¶194 We find the foregoing definitions and authorities to be generally consistent, and we believe that the definition adopted and applied by the district court is supported by the plain meaning of the term "engaged in," as well as by the historical authorities discussed above. Accordingly, like the district court, we conclude that "engaged in" requires "an overt and voluntary act, done with the intent of aiding or furthering the common unlawful purpose." Anderson, ¶ 254.

¶195 In so concluding, we hasten to add that we do not read "engaged in" so broadly as to subsume mere silence in the face of insurrection or mere acquiescence therein, at least absent an affirmative duty to act. Rather, as Attorney General Stanbery observed, "The force of the term to engage carries the idea of active rather than passive conduct, and of voluntary rather than compulsory action." Stanbery I, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. at 161; see also Baude & Paulsen, supra (manuscript at 67) (noting that "passive acquiescence, resigned acceptance, silence, or inaction is not typically enough to have 'engaged in' insurrection or rebellion . . . [unless] a person possesses an affirmative duty to speak or act").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶196 The question remains whether the record supported the district court's finding that President Trump engaged in the January 6 insurrection by acting overtly and voluntarily with the intent of aiding or furthering the insurrectionists' common unlawful purpose. Again, mindful of our applicable standard of review, we conclude that it did, and we proceed to a necessarily detailed discussion of the evidence to show why this is so.

¶197 Substantial evidence in the record showed that even before the November 2020 general election, President Trump was laying the groundwork for a claim that the election was rigged. For example, at an August 17, 2020 campaign rally, he said that "the only way we're going to lose this election is if the election is rigged." Anderson, ¶ 88. Moreover, when asked at a September 23, 2020 press briefing whether he would commit to a peaceful transfer of power after the election, President Trump refused to do so. Id. at ¶ 90.

¶198 President Trump then lost the election, and despite the facts that his advisors repeatedly advised him that there was no evidence of widespread voter fraud and that no evidence showed that he himself believed the election was wrought with fraud, President Trump ramped up his claims that the election was stolen from him and undertook efforts to prevent the certification of the election results. For example, in a December 13, 2020 tweet, he stated, "Swing States that have found massive VOTER FRAUD, which is all of them, CANNOT LEGALLY CERTIFY these votes as complete & correct without committing a severely punishable crime." Id. at ¶ 101. And President Trump sought to overturn the election results by directly exerting pressure on Republican officeholders in various states. Id. at ¶ 103.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶199 On this point, and relevant to President Trump's intent in this case, many of the state officials targeted by President Trump's efforts were subjected to a barrage of harassment and violent threats by his supporters. Id. at ¶ 104. President Trump was well aware of these threats, particularly after Georgia election official Gabriel Sterling issued a public warning to President Trump to "stop inspiring people to commit potential acts of violence" or "[s]omeone's going to get killed." Id. President Trump responded by retweeting a video of Sterling's press conference with a message repeating the very rhetoric that Sterling warned would result in violence. Id. at ¶ 105.

¶200 And President Trump continued to fan the flames of his supporters' ire, which he had ignited, with ongoing false assertions of election fraud, propelling the "Stop the Steal" movement and cross-country rallies leading up to January 6. Id. at ¶ 106. Specifically, between Election Day 2020 and January 6, Stop the Steal organizers held dozens of rallies around the country, proliferating President

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Trump's election disinformation and recruiting attendees, including members of violent extremist groups like the Proud Boys, the Oath Keepers, and the Three Percenters, QAnon conspiracy theorists, and white nationalists, to travel to Washington, D.C. on January 6. Id. at ¶ 107.

¶201 Stop the Steal leaders also joined two "Million MAGA Marches" in Washington, D.C. on November 14, 2020, and December 12, 2020. Id. at ¶ 108. Again, as relevant to President Trump's intent here, after the November rally turned violent, President Trump acknowledged the violence but justified it as self-defense against "ANTIFA SCUM." Id. at ¶ 109.

¶202 With full knowledge of these sometimes-violent events, President Trump sent the following tweet on December 19, 2020, urging his supporters to travel to Washington, D.C. on January 6: "Statistically impossible to have lost the 2020 Election. Big protest in D.C. on January 6. Be there, will be wild!" Id. at ¶ 112.

¶203 At this point, the record established that President Trump's "plan" was that when Congress met to certify the election results on January 6, Vice President Pence could reject the true electors who voted for President Biden and certify a slate of fake electors supporting President Trump or he could return the slates to the states for further proceedings. Id. at ¶ 113.

¶204 Far right extremists and militias such as the Proud Boys, the Oath Keepers, and the Three Percenters viewed President Trump's December 19, 2020 tweet as a

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"call to arms," and they began to plot activities to disrupt the January 6 joint session of Congress. Id. at ¶ 117. In the meantime, President Trump repeated his invitation to come to Washington, D.C. on January 6 at least twelve times. Id. at ¶ 118.

¶205 On December 26, 2020, President Trump tweeted:

> If a Democrat Presidential Candidate had an Election Rigged & Stolen, with proof of such acts at a level never seen before, the Democrat Senators would consider it an act of war, and fight to the death. Mitch [McConnell] & the Republicans do NOTHING, just want to let it pass. NO FIGHT!

Id. at ¶ 121.

¶206 And on January 1, 2021, President Trump retweeted a post from Kylie Jane Kremer, an organizer of the scheduled January 6 March for Trump, that stated, "The calvary [sic] is coming, Mr. President! JANUARY 6 | Washington, D.C." President Trump added to his retweet, "A great honor!" Id. at ¶ 119.

¶207 The foregoing evidence established that President Trump's messages were a call to his supporters to fight and that his supporters responded to that call. Further supporting such a conclusion was the fact that multiple federal agencies, including the Secret Service, identified significant threats of violence in the days leading up to January 6. Id. at ¶ 123. These threats were made openly online, and they were widely reported in the press. Id. Agency threat assessments thus stated that domestic violent extremists planned for violence on January 6, with weapons including firearms and enough ammunition to "win a small war." Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶208 Along the same lines, the Federal Bureau of Investigation received many tips regarding the potential for violence on January 6. Id. at ¶ 124. One tip said:

> They think they will have a large enough group to march into DC armed and will outnumber the police so they can't be stopped . . . . They believe that since the election was "stolen" it's their constitutional right to overtake the government and during this coup no U.S. laws apply. Their plan is to literally kill. Please, please take this tip seriously and investigate further.

Id.

¶209 The record reflects that President Trump had reason to know of the potential for violence on January 6. As President, he oversaw the agencies reporting the foregoing threats. Id. at ¶ 123. In addition, Katrina Pierson, a senior advisor to both of President Trump's presidential campaigns, testified, on behalf of President Trump, that at a January 5, 2021 meeting, President Trump chose the speakers for the January 6 event at which he, too, would speak (avoiding at least some extremist speakers) and that he knew that radical political extremists were going to be in Washington, D.C. on January 6 and would likely attend his speech. Id. at ¶¶ 48, 126.

¶210 January 6 arrived, and in the early morning, President Trump tweeted, "If Vice President @Mike_Pence comes through for us, we will win the Presidency. Many States want to decertify the mistake they made in certifying incorrect & even fraudulent numbers in a process NOT approved by their State Legislatures (which it must be). Mike can send it back!" Id. at ¶ 127. He followed this tweet later that morning with another that said, "All Mike Pence has to do is send them back to the States, AND WE WIN. Do it Mike, this is a time for extreme courage!" Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶211 These tweets had the obvious effect of putting a significant target on Vice President Pence's back, focusing President Trump's supporters on the Vice President's role in overseeing the counting of the electoral votes and certifying the 2020 presidential election to ensure the peaceful transfer of power. Id. at ¶¶ 128, 291.

¶212 At about this same time, tens of thousands of President Trump's supporters began gathering around the Ellipse for his speech. Id. at ¶ 129. To enter the Ellipse itself, attendees were required to pass through magnetometers. Id. at ¶ 130. Notably, from the approximately 28,000 attendees who passed through these security checkpoints, the Secret Service confiscated hundreds of weapons and other prohibited items, including knives or blades, pepper spray, brass knuckles, tasers, body armor, gas masks, and batons or blunt instruments. Id. at ¶¶ 130–31. Approximately 25,000 additional attendees remained outside the Secret Service perimeter, thus avoiding the magnetometers. Id. at ¶ 132.

¶213 President Trump then gave a speech in which he literally exhorted his supporters to fight at the Capitol. Among other things, he told the crowd:

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

- "We're gathered together in the heart of our nation's capital for one very, very basic reason: to save our democracy." Id. at ¶ 135.
- "Republicans are constantly fighting like a boxer with his hands tied behind his back. It's like a boxer. And we want to be so nice. We want to be so respectful of everybody, including bad people. And we're going to have to fight much harder." Id.
- "Now, it is up to Congress to confront this egregious assault on our democracy. And after this, we're going to walk down, and I'll be there with you . . . ." Id.
- "[W]e're going to walk down to the Capitol, and we're going to cheer on our brave senators and congressmen and women, and we're probably not going to be cheering so much for some of them. Because you'll never take back our country with weakness. You have to show strength and you have to be strong." Id.
- "When you catch somebody in a fraud, you're allowed to go by very different rules." Id.
- "This the most corrupt election in the history, maybe of the world. . . . This is not just a matter of domestic politics—this is a matter of national security." Id.
- "And we fight. We fight like hell. And if you don't fight like hell, you're not going to have a country anymore." Id.

¶214 Unsurprisingly, the crowd at the Ellipse reacted to President Trump's words with calls for violence. Indeed, after President Trump instructed his supporters to march to the Capitol, members of the crowd shouted, "[S]torm the capitol!"; "[I]nvade the Capitol Building!"; and "[T]ake the Capitol!" Id. at ¶ 141. And before he had even concluded his speech, President Trump's supporters followed his instructions. Id. at ¶ 146. The crowd marched to the Capitol, many carrying

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Revolutionary War flags and Confederate battle flags; quickly breached the building; and immediately advanced to the House and Senate chambers to carry out their mission of blocking the certification of the 2020 presidential election. Id. at ¶¶ 146–53.

¶215 By 1:21 p.m., President Trump was informed that the Capitol was under attack. Id. at ¶ 169. Rather than taking action to end the siege, however, approximately one hour later, at 2:24 p.m., he tweeted, "Mike Pence didn't have the courage to do what should have been done to protect our Country and our Constitution, giving States a chance to certify a corrected set of facts, not the fraudulent or inaccurate ones which they were asked to previously certify. USA demands the truth!" Id. at ¶ 170.

¶216 This tweet was read over a bullhorn to the crowd at the Capitol, and produced further violence, necessitating the evacuation of Vice President Pence from his Senate office to a more secure location to ensure his physical safety. Id. at ¶¶ 171–75.

¶217 President Trump's next public communications were two tweets sent at 2:38 p.m. and 3:13 p.m., encouraging the mob to "remain peaceful" and to "[s]tay peaceful" (obviously, the mob was not at all peaceful), but neither tweet condemned the violence nor asked the mob to disperse. Id. at ¶ 178 (alteration in original).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶218 Throughout these several hours, President Trump ignored pleas to intervene and instead called on Senators, urging them to help delay the electoral count, which is what the mob, upon President Trump's exhortations, was also trying to achieve. Id. at ¶ 180. And President Trump took no action to put an end to the violence. To the contrary, as mentioned above, when told that the mob was chanting, "Hang Mike Pence," President Trump responded that perhaps the Vice President deserved to be hanged. Id. President Trump also rejected pleas from House Republican Leader Kevin McCarthy, imploring him to tell his supporters to leave the Capitol, stating, "Well, Kevin, I guess these people are more upset about the election than you are." Id.

¶219 Finally, at 4:17 p.m., President Trump released a video urging the mob "to go home now." Id. at ¶ 186. Even then, he did not condemn the mob's actions. Id. at ¶ 187. Instead, he sympathized with those who had violently overtaken the Capitol, telling them that he knew their pain. Id. at ¶¶ 186–87. He told them that he loved them and that they were "very special." Id. at ¶ 186. And he repeated his false claim that the election had been stolen notwithstanding his "landslide" victory, thereby further endorsing the mob's effort to try to stop the peaceful transfer of power. Id. at ¶¶ 186–87.

¶220 A short while later, President Trump reiterated this supportive message to the mob by justifying its actions, tweeting at 6:01 p.m., "These are the things and events that happen when a sacred landslide election victory is so unceremoniously & viciously stripped away from great patriots who have been badly & unfairly treated for so long. Go home with love & in peace." Id. at ¶ 189. President Trump concluded by encouraging the country to "[r]emember this day forever!" Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶221 We conclude that the foregoing evidence, the great bulk of which was undisputed at trial, established that President Trump engaged in insurrection. President Trump's direct and express efforts, over several months, exhorting his supporters to march to the Capitol to prevent what he falsely characterized as an alleged fraud on the people of this country were indisputably overt and voluntary. Moreover, the evidence amply showed that President Trump undertook all these actions to aid and further a common unlawful purpose that he himself conceived and set in motion: prevent Congress from certifying the 2020 presidential election and stop the peaceful transfer of power.

¶222 We disagree with President Trump's contentions that the record does not support a finding that he engaged in an insurrection because (1) "engage" does not include "incite," and (2) he did not have the requisite intent to aid or further the insurrectionists' common unlawful purpose.

¶223 As our detailed recitation of the evidence shows, President Trump did not merely incite the insurrection. Even when the siege on the Capitol was fully underway, he continued to support it by repeatedly demanding that Vice President Pence refuse to perform his constitutional duty and by calling Senators to persuade them to stop the counting of electoral votes. These actions constituted overt, voluntary, and direct participation in the insurrection.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶224 Moreover, the record amply demonstrates that President Trump fully intended to—and did—aid or further the insurrectionists' common unlawful purpose of preventing the peaceful transfer of power in this country. He exhorted them to fight to prevent the certification of the 2020 presidential election. He personally took action to try to stop the certification. And for many hours, he and his supporters succeeded in halting that process.

¶225 For these reasons, we conclude that the record fully supports the district court's finding that President Trump engaged in insurrection within the meaning of Section Three.

H. President Trump's Speech on January 6 Was Not Protected by the First Amendment Right to Freedom of Speech ¶226 President Trump contends that his speech on January 6 was protected by the First Amendment and, therefore, cannot be used to justify his disqualification from office under Section Three. The district court concluded that this speech was unprotected by the First Amendment. Anderson, ¶ 298. We agree with the district court.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. Standard of Review

¶227 In considering President Trump's First Amendment challenge, we undertake an "independent review of the record . . . to be sure that the speech in question actually falls within [an] unprotected category" of communication. Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 505 (1984). We have interpreted this independent review as being akin to de novo review. See Air Wis. Airlines Corp. v. Hoeper, 2012 CO 19, ¶ 46, 320 P.3d 830, 841, rev'd on other grounds, 571 U.S. 237 (2014); Lewis v. Colo. Rockies Baseball Club, Ltd., 941 P.2d 266, 271 (Colo. 1997). Bose recognizes, however, that we may give some "presumption of correctness" to factual findings, 466 U.S. at 500, especially those that do not involve the application of standards of law, id. at 500 n.16, or those that arise from complex cases such as this one, where the district judge has "lived with the controversy," id. at 500. Focusing on the findings by the district court, we therefore "examine for ourselves the statements in issue and the circumstances under which they were made to see . . . whether they are of a character which the principles of the First Amendment . . . protect." Id. at 508 (first alteration in original) (quoting Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 335 (1946)).

2. First Amendment Protections and Incitement

¶228 The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech . . . ." U.S. Const. amend. I. This robust protection for speech functions to "invite dispute," Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, 4 (1949), and "was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people," Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957); see also N.Y. Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269 (1964).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶229 Even so, "the right of free speech is not absolute at all times and under all circumstances." Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571 (1942). The First Amendment does not protect, for example, true threats, Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705, 708 (1969); speech essential to criminal conduct, Packingham v. North Carolina, 582 U.S. 98, 107 (2017); or speech that incites lawless action, Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969). It is this last strand of First Amendment jurisprudence that the parties debate here.

¶230 As the Supreme Court explained in Brandenburg, the First Amendment's "constitutional guarantees of free speech . . . do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action." 395 U.S. at 447. Under Brandenburg and its progeny, the modern test to determine whether speech is unprotected under the First Amendment because it incited lawless action is whether (1) the speech explicitly or implicitly encouraged the use of violence or lawless action; (2) the speaker intended that the speech would result in the use of violence or lawless action; and (3) the imminent use of violence or lawless action was the likely result of the speech. Nwanguma v. Trump, 903 F.3d 604, 609 (6th Cir. 2018); accord Bible Believers v. Wayne Cnty., 805 F.3d 228, 246 (6th Cir. 2015).[18]

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

3. Applying the Brandenburg Test

a. Context

¶231 President Trump contends that the district court erred by examining the broader context in which President Trump's speech was made, thereby "expand[ing] the context relevant to a Brandenburg analysis beyond anything recognized in precedent." He asserts that we should examine his speech only in the narrow context in which it was made. We disagree.

¶232 In Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919), the Supreme Court addressed, for the first time, advocacy of illegal conduct, and it recognized the importance of context in holding that "the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done." Although the Supreme Court has said little about how to analyze incitement since Brandenburg, it offered some guidance regarding a court's use of other statements for context in NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 (1982).

---

[18] This tripartite formulation incorporates the holdings from Brandenburg and its progeny. See Brandenburg, 395 U.S. at 447 ("[T]he constitutional guarantees of free speech . . . do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."); Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105, 108–09 (1973) (holding there was "no evidence or rational inference from the import of the language" that the defendant's words were intended to produce imminent disorder and thereby indicating that although illegal action must be imminent, advocacy of lawless action could be implicit (emphases added)); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. 886, 928 (1982) ("When such [emotional] appeals [for unity and action in a common cause] do not incite lawless action, they must be regarded as protected speech.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶233 In Claiborne Hardware, the Court considered speeches given by Charles Evers, the field secretary of the Mississippi NAACP, in connection with the NAACP's boycott of white merchants in Claiborne County from 1966 to 1969. 458 U.S. at 890. Evers declared to Black residents of Claiborne County that "blacks who traded with white merchants would be answerable to him," and that "any 'uncle toms' who broke the boycott would 'have their necks broken' by their own people." Id. at 900 n.28. Evers's statements also included that "boycott violators would be 'disciplined' by their own people," and he "warned that the Sheriff could not sleep with boycott violators at night." Id. at 902. The Court held that Evers's speeches were protected by the First Amendment but said that "[i]f there [was] other evidence of [Evers's] authorization of wrongful conduct, the references to discipline in the speeches could be used to corroborate that evidence." Id. at 929. By considering and placing value in the absence of corroborating evidence of Evers's violent intentions, the Court implied that courts may look to circumstances beyond the speech itself to determine intent. See United States v. White, 610 F.3d

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

956, 961–62 (7th Cir. 2010) (relying on Claiborne Hardware in denying a motion to dismiss in a solicitation case based on the existence of "further evidence of . . . the relationship between [the defendant] and his followers which will show the posting was a specific request to [the defendant's] followers").

¶234 While incitement precedent is sparse, the case law on "true threats" is instructive regarding the importance of context. True threats and incitement are doctrinally distinct,[19] but true threats are the "closest cousin" to incitement under the First Amendment. Counterman v. Colorado, 600 U.S. 66, 97 (2023) (Sotomayor, J., concurring in part); accord United States v. Howell, 719 F.2d 1258, 1260 (5th Cir. 1983) ("The line between the two forms of speech [incitement and true threats] may be difficult to draw in some instances . . . ."); see also G. Robert Blakey & Brian J. Murray, Threats, Free Speech, and the Jurisprudence of the Federal Criminal Law, 2002 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 829, 1069 (2002) (explaining that both exceptions involve exhortations regarding violence that derive from Schenck's "clear and present danger" test).

---

[19] Compare Brandenburg, 395 U.S. at 447 (defining unprotected incitement as that "directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and . . . likely to incite or produce such action"), with Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 359 (2003) (defining true threats as "those statements where the speaker means to communicate a serious expression of an intent to commit an act of unlawful violence to a particular individual or group of individuals").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶235 And multiple federal circuit courts conducting a true-threat analysis confirm what common sense suggests: When assessing whether someone means to threaten another with unlawful violence, we sometimes need to consider more than the behavior exhibited on one occasion. See, e.g., Planned Parenthood of the Columbia/Willamette, Inc. v. Am. Coal. of Life Activists, 290 F.3d 1058, 1078 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting an argument that "'context' means the direct circumstances surrounding delivery of the threat," and instead concluding that "[w]e, and so far as we can tell, other circuits as well, consider the whole factual context and 'all of the circumstances' in order to determine whether a statement is a true threat" (internal citation omitted) (quoting United States v. Merrill, 746 F.2d 458, 462 (9th Cir. 1984), overruled on other grounds by Planned Parenthood, 290 F.3d at 1066–77, and United States v. Hanna, 293 F.3d 1080, 1088 n.5 (9th Cir. 2002))); United States v. Hart, 212 F.3d 1067, 1071 (8th Cir. 2000) (considering "whether the maker of the threat had made similar statements to the victim on other occasions" and "whether the victim had reason to believe that the maker of the threat had a propensity to engage in violence" when determining whether a true threat exists). So too with incitement. Context matters.

¶236 This is not to say, as President Trump contends the district court found, that we "may consider any speech ever uttered by [President Trump]" in evaluating incitement. Of course, there are limits. But we need not define those outer limits now. Instead, we simply conclude that it was appropriate for the district court to consider President Trump's "history of courting extremists and endorsing political violence as legitimate and proper, as well as his efforts to undermine the legitimacy of the 2020 election results and hinder the certification of the Electoral College results in Congress." Anderson, ¶ 289.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶237 With this in mind, we review the district court's application of Brandenburg's three-pronged test.

b. Encouraging the Use of Violence or Lawless Action

¶238 Again, the first prong of the test for incitement is that "the speech explicitly or implicitly encouraged the use of violence or lawless action." Nwanguma, 903 F.3d at 609.

¶239 The district court made dozens of findings regarding the general atmosphere of political violence that President Trump created before January 6, many of which we have already outlined in discussing why the district court concluded that President Trump "engaged in" insurrection. We incorporate those observations here by reference and supplement them with other illuminating evidence from the record below. For example, the district court found that "[a]t [a] February 2016 rally, [President] Trump told his supporters that in the 'old days,' a protester would be 'carried out on a stretcher' and that he would like to 'punch him in the face.'" Anderson, ¶ 68. In March 2016, President Trump responded to questions about his supporters' violence by saying it was "very, very appropriate" and "we need a little bit more of" it. Id. at ¶ 69. And during the 2020 election cycle, "President Trump threatened to deploy 'the Military' to Minneapolis to shoot 'looters' amid protests over the police killing of George Floyd," id. at ¶ 76, and told the Proud Boys to "stand back and stand by" during a debate for the 2020 presidential election. id. at ¶ 77.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶240 The district court also credited the testimony of Professor Peter Simi, a professor of sociology at Chapman University, whom it had "qualified . . . as an expert in political extremism, including how extremists communicate, and how the events leading up to and including the January 6 attack relate to longstanding patterns of behavior and communication by political extremists." Id. at ¶ 42. He testified, according to the court's summary, that (1) "violent far-right extremists understood that [President] Trump's calls to 'fight,' which most politicians would mean only symbolically, were, when spoken by [President] Trump, literal calls to violence by these groups, while [President] Trump's statements negating that sentiment were insincere and existed to obfuscate and create plausible deniability," id. at ¶ 84; and that (2) "[President] Trump's speech took place in the context of a pattern of [President] Trump's knowing 'encouragement and promotion of violence' to develop and deploy a shared coded language with his violent supporters," id. at ¶ 142.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶241 As we described in the foregoing section, the district court further found that President Trump encouraged and supported violence before and after the 2020 election by telling his supporters that "the only way we're going to lose this election is if the election is rigged. Remember that," id. at ¶ 88; that the election was "a fraud on the American public," id. at ¶ 92; see also id. at ¶ 101 ("Swing States that have found massive VOTER FRAUD, which is all of them, CANNOT LEGALLY CERTIFY these votes as complete & correct without committing a severely punishable crime"); and that the Democrats had stolen an election that rightfully belonged to President Trump and his supporters, id. at ¶¶ 93, 96. The district court also found that "[m]any of the state officials targeted by [President] Trump's campaign of intimidation were subject to a barrage of harassment and violent threats by [his] supporters—prompting Georgia election official Gabriel Sterling to issue a public warning to [President] Trump to 'stop inspiring people to commit potential acts of violence' or '[s]omeone's going to get killed.'" Id. at ¶ 104 (last alteration in original); see also id. at ¶ 105 (finding that "[f]ar-right extremists understood [President] Trump's refusal to condemn the violence [Sterling condemned] . . . as an endorsement of the use of violence to prevent the transfer of presidential power").

¶242 The district court then identified specific incendiary language in President Trump's speech at the Ellipse on January 6, some of which we alluded to earlier in this opinion. To reiterate: President Trump announced, "we're going to walk down, and I'll be with you, we're going to walk down . . . to the Capitol . . . ." Id. at ¶ 135. He "used the word 'fight' or variations of it [twenty] times during his Ellipse speech." Id. at ¶ 137; see also, e.g., id. at ¶ 135 ("And we fight. We fight like hell. And if you don't fight like hell, you're not going to have a country anymore."). He declared, "[w]hen you catch somebody in a fraud," a sentiment he had repeatedly said had occurred with the 2020 election, "you're allowed to go by very different rules." Id. at ¶ 135; see also id. at ¶ 138 ("You don't concede when there's theft involved."). And he claimed that "our election victory [was] stolen by emboldened radical-left Democrats . . . ." Id. at ¶ 135.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶243 In short, the district court found that President Trump's speech at the Ellipse "was understood by a portion of the crowd as, a call to arms." Id. at ¶ 145. And the district court here is not the first or only court to reach this conclusion. In Thompson v. Trump, 590 F. Supp. 3d 46, 118 (D.D.C. 2022), the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia found that President Trump > invited his supporters to Washington, D.C., after telling them for months that corrupt and spineless politicians were to blame for stealing an election from them; retold that narrative when thousands of them assembled on the Ellipse; and directed them to march on the Capitol building . . . where those very politicians were at work to certify an election that he had lost.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The court concluded that President Trump's speech was, therefore "plausibly . . . a positive instigation of a mischievous act."[20] Id. (quoting John Stuart Mill, On Liberty 100 (London, John W. Parker & Son, 2d ed. 1859)). Our independent review of the record in this case brings us to the same conclusion: President Trump incited and encouraged the use of violence and lawless action to disrupt the peaceful transfer of power. The tenor of President Trump's messages to his supporters in exhorting them to travel to Washington, D.C. on January 6 was obvious and unmistakable: the allegedly rigged election was an act of war and those victimized by it had an obligation to fight back and to fight aggressively. And President Trump's supporters did not miss or misunderstand the message: the cavalry was coming to fight.

¶244 The fact that, at one point during his speech, President Trump said that "everyone here will soon be marching to the Capitol building to peacefully and patriotically make your voices heard" does not persuade us that the district court erred in finding that the first prong of the Brandenberg test was met. See Thompson, 590 F. Supp. 3d at 113–14. This isolated reference "cannot inoculate [President

---

[20] Thompson involved a motion to dismiss. As a result, the court determined only that President Trump's speech "plausibly [involved] words of incitement not protected by the First Amendment." Thompson, 590 F. Supp. 3d at 115; see Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 553 (2007) (requiring plaintiffs to show that their complaints are plausible to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Trump] against the conclusion that his exhortation, made nearly an hour later, to 'fight like hell' immediately before sending rally-goers to the Capitol, within the context of the larger Speech and circumstances, was not protected expression." Id. at 117.

c. Intent to Produce Violent or Lawless Action

¶245 The second prong of the test for incitement is that "the speaker intends that his speech will result in the use of violence or lawless action." Nwanguma, 903 F.3d at 609. The Supreme Court has interpreted this second prong of the Brandenburg test to require specific intent.[21] Counterman, 600 U.S. at 79, 81 (establishing that "when incitement is at issue, we have spoken in terms of specific intent, presumably equivalent to purpose or knowledge," and defining acting purposely as "'consciously desir[ing]' a result"). So, we must consider whether President Trump's exhortations at the Ellipse on January 6 to "fight like hell," and his [21] There is some uncertainty as to whether specific intent to incite imminent lawless action is needed in civil cases such as the one before us now because most of the modern incitement cases arose in a criminal context. See Counterman, 600 U.S. at 70; Hess, 414 U.S. at 105; Brandenburg, 395 U.S. at 444; but see Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. at 890 (adjudicating complainants' request for injunctive relief and damages). The Counterman Court's justification for the specific intent standard was therefore tied to criminal liability. Counterman, 600 U.S. at 81 ("A strong intent requirement . . . was a way to ensure that efforts to prosecute incitement would not bleed over . . . to dissenting political speech at the First Amendment's core." (emphasis added)). But we need not resolve the issue because, regardless of whether it is required, we agree with the district court that President Trump acted with specific intent.

---

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

urgings that his followers "go[] to the Capitol" and that they would get to "go by 'very different rules,'" were intended to produce imminent lawless action.

¶246 The district court concluded that President Trump exhibited the requisite intent here. It found that, before the January 6 rally, "[President] Trump knew that his supporters were angry and prepared to use violence to 'stop the steal' including physically preventing Vice President Pence from certifying the election," Anderson, ¶ 128, and that President Trump's response to the events following his speech "support . . . that [President] Trump endorsed and intended the actions of the mob on January 6," id. at ¶ 193 (second alteration in original). Based on these findings of fact, the court "conclude[d] that [President] Trump acted with the specific intent to incite political violence and direct it at the Capitol with the purpose of disrupting the electoral certification." Id. at ¶ 293.

¶247 The district court found that President Trump knew, before he gave his speech, that there was the potential for violence on January 6. It found that "[President] Trump himself agrees that his supporters 'listen to [him] like no one else,'" id. at ¶ 63 (second alteration in original), and that federal agencies that President Trump oversaw identified threats of violence ahead of January 6, including "threats to storm the U.S. Capitol and kill elected officials," id. at ¶¶ 123–24.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶248 The court also found that President Trump's conduct and tweets, which we outlined above, from the time he was told of the attack on the Capitol at 1:21 p.m. until Congress reconvened later that night, indicated his intent to produce lawless or violent conduct. See id. at ¶¶ 169–73, 178, 183, 186, 189.

¶249 In conducting our independent review of the district court's factual findings, we agree that President Trump intended that his speech would result in the use of violence or lawless action on January 6 to prevent the peaceful transfer of power. Despite his knowledge of the anger that he had instigated, his calls to arms, his awareness of the threats of violence that had been made leading up to January 6, and the obvious fact that many in the crowd were angry and armed, President Trump told his riled-up supporters to walk down to the Capitol and fight. He then stood back and let the fighting happen, despite having the ability and authority to stop it (with his words or by calling in the military), thereby confirming that this violence was what he intended.

¶250 We therefore conclude that the second prong of the Brandenburg test has also been met.

d. Likely to Incite or Produce Imminent Lawless Action

¶251 Finally, for speech to be unprotected, we must conclude that "the imminent use of violence or lawless action is the likely result of the speech." Nwanguma, 903 F.3d at 609.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶252 The district court found that:

> Professor Simi reviewed [President] Trump's relationship with his supporters over the years, identified a pattern of calls for violence that his supporters responded to, and explained how that long experience allowed [President] Trump to know how his supporters responded to his calls for violence using a shared language that allowed him to maintain plausible deniability with the wider public.

Id. at ¶ 62.

¶253 Professor Simi then "testified about . . . examples of [these] patterns of call-and-response that [President] Trump developed and used to incite violence by his supporters." Id. at ¶ 64. In one such instance, a November 2015 political rally, "[President] Trump . . . t[old] his supporters to 'get [a protester] the hell out of here' and the protester was then assaulted. When asked about the attack the next day, Trump said 'maybe [the protester] should have been roughed up.'" Id. at ¶ 66 (third and fourth alterations in original).

¶254 Further, the district court found that "on January 1, 2021, [President] Trump retweeted a post from Kylie Jane Kremer, an organizer of March for Trump on January 6, saying, 'The calvary [sic] is coming, Mr. President!'" Id. at ¶ 119. It found that, according to Professor Simi, "[President] Trump's December 19, 2020 ['will be wild'] tweet had an immediate effect on far-right extremists and militias . . . , who viewed the tweet as a 'call to arms' and began to plot activities to disrupt the January 6, 2021 joint session." Id. at ¶ 117.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶255 These findings support the conclusion that President Trump's calls for imminent lawlessness and violence during his speech were likely to incite such imminent lawlessness and violence. When President Trump told his supporters that they were "allowed to go by very different rules" and that if they did not "fight like hell," they would not "have a country anymore," it was likely that his supporters would heed his encouragement and act violently. We therefore hold that this final prong of the Brandenburg test has been met.

¶256 In sum, we conclude that President Trump's speech on January 6 was not protected by the First Amendment.

IV. Conclusion

¶257 The district court erred by concluding that Section Three does not apply to the President. We therefore reverse the district court's judgment. As stated above, however, we affirm much of the district court's reasoning on other issues. Accordingly, we conclude that because President Trump is disqualified from holding the office of President under Section Three, it would be a wrongful act under the Election Code for the Secretary to list President Trump as a candidate on the presidential primary ballot. Therefore, the Secretary may not list President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot, nor may she count any write-in votes cast for him. See § 1-7-114(2), C.R.S. (2023) ("A vote for a write-in candidate shall not be counted unless that candidate is qualified to hold the office for which the elector's vote was cast."). But we stay our ruling until January 4, 2024 (the day before the Secretary's deadline to certify the content of the presidential primary ballot). If review is sought in the Supreme Court before the stay expires, it shall remain in place, and the Secretary will continue to be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot until the receipt of any order or mandate from the Supreme Court.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

CHIEF JUSTICE BOATRIGHT dissented.

JUSTICE SAMOUR dissented.

JUSTICE BERKENKOTTER dissented.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

CHIEF JUSTICE BOATRIGHT dissenting.

¶258 I agree with the majority that an action brought under section 1-1-113, C.R.S. (2023) of Colorado's election code ("Election Code") may examine whether a candidate is qualified for office under the U.S. Constitution. But section 1-1-113 has a limited scope. Kuhn v. Williams, 2018 CO 30M, ¶ 1 n.1, 418 P.3d 478, 480 n.1 (per curiam, unanimous) (emphasizing "the narrow nature of our review under section 1-1-113"). In my view, the claim at issue in this case exceeds that scope. The voters' (the "Electors") action to disqualify former President Donald J. Trump under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment presents uniquely complex questions that exceed the adjudicative competence of section 1-1-113's expedited procedures. Simply put, section 1-1-113 was not enacted to decide whether a candidate engaged in insurrection. In my view, this cause of action should have been dismissed. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

I. The Electors' Challenge Is Incompatible with a Section 1-1-113 Proceeding

¶259 Section 1-1-113 provides for the resolution of potential election code violations in a timely manner. In many scenarios, Colorado voters can challenge the Secretary of State's (the "Secretary") certification of a candidate's qualifications. Carson v. Reiner, 2016 CO 38, ¶ 17, 370 P.3d 1137, 1141 (acknowledging that section 1-1-113 "clearly comprehends challenges to a broad range of wrongful acts committed by [Colorado's election] officials charged with duties under the code [and] comprehends a specific challenge to a designated election official's certification of a candidate"). While section 1-1-113 only offers voters a "narrow opportunity," Kuhn, ¶ 28, 418 P.3d at 484, that opportunity has proven effective as voters have compelled the Secretary to omit from the ballot unqualified candidates whom they would have otherwise listed. E.g., id. at ¶ 57, 418 P.3d at 489 (barring a candidate from the ballot because his petition circulator was not a Colorado resident). Section 1-1-113's grant of discretionary review to this court has also vindicated voters' rights by preventing a decision that would have compelled the Secretary to place an unqualified candidate on the ballot. Griswold v. Ferrigno Warren, 2020 CO 34, ¶ 26, 462 P.3d 1081, 1087 (barring a candidate from the ballot because she failed to gather sufficient signatures).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶260 Further, our election code suggests that a petitioner may base a challenge to the Secretary's certification of an aspiring presidential primary candidate on federal law. Compare § 1-4-1203(2)(a), C.R.S. (2023) (stating that a candidate must be "qualified"), with §1-4-1201, C.R.S. (2023) (declaring that the code conforms to federal law); see also Coats v. Dish Network, LLC, 2015 CO 44, ¶ 20, 350 P.3d 849, 853 (relying on federal law to interpret "lawful activity" in a Colorado statute). We have previously held, however, that some federal law claims cannot be adjudicated under section 1-1-113. E.g., Frazier v. Williams, 2017 CO 85, ¶ 19,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

401 P.3d 541, 545 (concluding that a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claim cannot be the basis of, or joined to, a section 1-1-113 action).

¶261 But not all federal questions exceed the scope of section 1-1-113. A qualification challenge under Article II, Section 1[1] or the Twenty-Second Amendment[2] lends itself to section 1-1-113's procedures. Although a claim that a candidate is not thirty-five years old may be easier to resolve than a claim that a candidate is not a natural born citizen, these presidential qualifications are characteristically objective, discernible facts. Age, time previously served as president, and place of birth all parallel core qualification issues under Colorado's election code.[3] Conversely, all these questions pale in comparison to the complexity of an action to disqualify a candidate for engaging in insurrection.

---

[1] U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5 provides the presidential qualifications:

> No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

[2] U.S. Const. amend. XXII, § 1 provides further presidential qualifications:

> No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once.

[3] See also Colorado Secretary of State, Presidential Primary 2024 Candidate Qualification Guide 3, https://www.coloradosos.gov/pubs/elections/

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶262 Far from presenting a straightforward biographical question, Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment proscribes insurrectionist U.S. officers from again holding office. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. Unlike qualifications such as age and place of birth, an application of Section Three requires courts to define complex terms, determine legislative intent from over 150 years ago, and make factual findings foreign to our election code. The Electors contend that there is nothing "particularly unusual about a section 1-1-113 proceeding raising constitutional issues." However, the framework that section 1-1-113 offers for identifying qualified candidates is not commensurate with the extraordinary determination to disqualify a candidate because they engaged in insurrection against the Constitution. See Dis. op. ¶ 352 (Berkenkotter, J., dissenting) (noting that "the historical application of section 1-1-113 . . . has been limited to challenges involving relatively straightforward issues, like whether a candidate meets a residency requirement for a school board election."). Recognizing this limitation of section 1-1-113 is not novel. See Kuhn, ¶ 1 n.1, 418 P.3d at 480 n.1 (emphasizing "the narrow nature of our review under section 1-1-113" and declining to address a First Amendment challenge to Colorado's residency requirement for petition

---

Candidates/packets/2024PresidentialPrimaryGuide.pdf [https:// perma.cc/ KK3L-X8BM] (listing the "basic qualifications" for the presidency including the qualifications from Article II and the Twenty-Second Amendment but not mentioning the Fourteenth Amendment's disqualification for insurrectionists).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

circulators "because such claims exceed this court's jurisdiction in a section 1-1-113 action").

¶263 Dismissal is particularly appropriate here because the Electors brought their challenge without a determination from a proceeding (e.g., a prosecution for an insurrection-related offense) with more rigorous procedures to ensure adequate due process. Instead, the Electors relied on section 1-1-113 and its "breakneck pace" to declare President Trump a disqualified insurrectionist. See Frazier, ¶ 11, 401 P.3d at 544.

II. As Demonstrated by the Proceeding Below, the Statutory Timeline for a Section 1-1-113 Proceeding Does Not Permit a Claim as Complex as the Electors'

¶264 In addition to qualitative incompatibilities, the complexity of the Electors' claims cannot be squared with section 1-1-113's truncated timeline for adjudication. Section 1-1-113 actions for presidential primary ballots fulfill a need for speed by requiring the district court to hold a hearing within five days and issue its decision within forty-eight hours of the hearing:

> Any such challenge must provide notice in a summary manner of an alleged impropriety that gives rise to the complaint. No later than five days after the challenge is filed, a hearing must be held at which time the district court shall hear the challenge and assess the validity of all alleged improprieties. The district court shall issue findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing. The party filing the challenge has the burden to sustain the challenge by a preponderance of the evidence.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

§ 1-4-1204, C.R.S. (2023). This speed comes with consequences, namely, the absence of procedures that courts, litigants, and the public would expect for complex constitutional litigation. As President Trump, argues and the Electors do not contest, section 1-1-113's procedures do not provide common tools for complex fact-finding: preliminary evidentiary or pre-trial motions hearings, subpoena powers, basic discovery, depositions, and time for disclosure of witnesses and exhibits. This same concern was raised in Frazier; the then-Secretary argued that "it is impossible to fully litigate a complex constitutional issue within days or weeks, as is typical of a section 1-1-113 proceeding." ¶ 18 n.3, 401 P.3d at 545 n.3. While we avoided deciding if a claim could be too complex for a section 1-1-113 proceeding in Frazier, that question is unavoidable here, and it demands that we reconcile the complexity of this issue with the breakneck pace of a section 1-1-113 procedure. In my view, the answer to this question is dispositive.

¶265 This case's procedural history proves my point. Despite clear requirements, the district court did not follow section 1-4-1204's statutory timeline for section 1-1-113 claims. The proceeding below involved two delays that, respectively, violated (1) the requirement that the merits hearing be held within five days of the challenge being lodged, and (2) the requirement that the district court issue its order within forty-eight hours of the merits hearing.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶266 The Electors filed their challenge on September 6, 2023. Although the question of whether this action should be removed to federal court was resolved by September 14, the district court did not hold an evidentiary hearing until October 30. The majority appears to imply that a "status conference" on September 18 fulfills the statutory requirement that the hearing be held within five days of the Electors' challenge. Maj. op. ¶ 83. However, a status conference plainly does not satisfy the requirement: "No later than five days after the challenge is filed, a hearing must be held at which time the district court shall hear the challenge and assess the validity of all alleged improprieties." § 1-4-1204 (emphasis added); see Carson, ¶ 21, 370 P.3d at 1142 (ruling that section 1-1-113 "does not permit a challenge to an election official's certification of a candidate to the ballot, solely on the basis of the certified candidate's qualification, once the period . . . for challenging the qualification of the candidate directly has expired . . . ."). It is no mystery why the statutory timeline could not be enforced: This claim was too complex.[4] The fact it took a week shy of two months to hold a hearing that "must" take place within five days proves that section 1-1-113 is an incompatible vehicle

[4] The intervals between the challenge and the hearing, and the hearing and the order, should not cast aspersions on the district court, which made valiant efforts to add some process above and beyond what the election code provides. However, the Colorado General Assembly, not the district court, decides when and how to change statutory requirements.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

for this claim. The majority recognizes the five-day requirement, Maj. op. ¶ 38, but it does not acknowledge the violation of section 1-4-1204's timeline or give consequence to that violation.

¶267 Nonetheless, the majority touts the fact that a hearing was held and lauds the district court's timely issuance of its decision as evidence that this matter was not too complex for a section 1-1-113 proceeding. Maj. op. ¶¶ 84–85. But was the order timely issued? Substantially, I think not. Compare Maj. op. ¶ 22 ("The trial began, as scheduled, on October 30 [a Monday]. The evidentiary portion lasted five days [through Friday, November 3], with closing arguments almost two weeks later, on November 15. . . . The court issued its written final order on November 17 . . . ."), with § 1-4-1204 ("The district court shall issue findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing."). Section 1-4-1204 only mandates two deadlines, and neither were honored. After all the evidence had been presented at a week-long hearing, the court suspended proceedings for two weeks. I find nothing in the record offering a reason grounded in the election code for the interval between the five consecutive days of the hearing and the solitary closing arguments. However, I understand the necessity to postpone the closing arguments for one reason: The complexity of the case required more time than "no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing" for the court to draft its 102-page order. Thus, while the district court formally issued its order within forty-eight hours of the closing arguments, the interval between the evidentiary hearings and the closing arguments was not in compliance with section 1-4-1204.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶268 The majority condoned the district court's failure to observe the statutory timeline by concluding that it "substantially compl[ied]." See Maj. op. ¶ 85. This renders the statute's five-day and forty-eight-hour requirements meaningless. Contra Ferrigno Warren, ¶ 20, 462 P.3d at 1085 (holding that, under Colorado's election code, a "specific statutory command could not be ignored in the name of substantial compliance"); Gallegos Fam. Props., LLC v. Colo. Groundwater Comm'n, 2017 CO 73, ¶ 25, 398 P.3d 599, 608 ("Where the language is clear, we must apply the language as written."). If a court must contort a special proceeding's statutory timeline to process a claim, then that claim is not proper for the special proceeding.

¶269 From my perspective, just because a hearing was held and Intervenors participated, it doesn't mean that due process was observed. Nor should it be inferred that section 1-1-113's statutory procedures, which were not followed, were up to the task. I cannot agree with the majority that the district court's extra-statutory delays and select procedure augmentations indicate that the Electors' claim was fit for adjudication under sections 1-4-1204(4) and 1-1-113. Contra, Maj. op. ¶ 81 ("In short, the district court admirably—and swiftly—discharged its duty to adjudicate this complex section 1-1-113 action."). Dragging someone through a "makeshift proceeding" is not an indication that it was an appropriate process. See Dis. op. ¶ 274 (Samour, J., dissenting). Importantly, the Electors were not rushed into the process; they didn't have to file their challenge until they were prepared. Only Intervenors arguably had inadequate time to prepare.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶270 Finally, only a two-thirds majority of both houses of Congress can overturn a Section Three disqualification. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3. This remedy is extraordinary and speaks volumes about the gravity of the disqualification. Such a high bar indicates that an expedited hearing absent any discovery procedures and with a preponderance of the evidence standard is not the appropriate means for adjudicating a matter of this magnitude.[5] See Frazier, ¶¶ 17–18, 401 P.3d at 545 (holding that "inconsistencies" between the procedures of section 1-1-113 and a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 "reinforce" the conclusion that not all federal law claims can be raised in section 1-1-113 proceedings).

[5] Although the district court made its findings using the clear and convincing standard, the election code calls for a preponderance standard. § 1-4-1204 ("The party filing the challenge has the burden to sustain the challenge by a preponderance of the evidence.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

III. Conclusion

¶271 My opinion that this is an inadequate cause of action is dictated by the facts of this case, particularly the absence of a criminal conviction for an insurrection-related offense.

¶272 The questions presented here simply reach a magnitude of complexity not contemplated by the Colorado General Assembly for its election code enforcement statute. The proceedings below ran counter to the letter and spirit of the statutory timeframe because the Electors' claim overwhelmed the process. In the absence of an insurrection-related conviction, I would hold that a request to disqualify a candidate under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is not a proper cause of action under Colorado's election code. Therefore, I would dismiss the claim at issue here. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

JUSTICE SAMOUR dissenting.

> Now it is undoubted that those provisions of the constitution which deny to the legislature power to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or to pass a bill of attainder or an ex post facto, are inconsistent in their spirit and general purpose with a provision which, at once without trial, deprives a whole class of persons of offices . . . for cause, however grave.

In re Griffin, 11 F. Cas. 7, 26 (C.C.D. Va. 1869) (No. 5,815) ("Griffin's Case").

¶273 These astute words, uttered by U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase a century and a half ago, eloquently describe one of the bedrock principles of American democracy: Our government cannot deprive someone of the right to hold public office without due process of law. Even if we are convinced that a candidate committed horrible acts in the past—dare I say, engaged in insurrection—there must be procedural due process before we can declare that individual disqualified from holding public office. Procedural due process is one of the aspects of America's democracy that sets this country apart.

¶274 The decision to bar former President Donald J. Trump ("President Trump")—by all accounts the current leading Republican presidential candidate (and reportedly the current leading overall presidential candidate)—from Colorado's presidential primary ballot flies in the face of the due process doctrine. By concluding that Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing, the majority approves the enforcement of that federal constitutional provision by our state courts through the truncated procedural mechanism that resides in our state Election Code.[1] Thus, based on its interpretation of Section Three, our court sanctions these makeshift proceedings employed by the district court below—which lacked basic discovery, the ability to subpoena documents and compel witnesses, workable timeframes to adequately investigate and develop defenses, and the opportunity for a fair trial—to adjudicate a federal constitutional claim (a complicated one at that) masquerading as a run-of-the-mill state Election Code claim. And because most other states don't have the Election Code provisions we do, they won't be able to enforce Section Three. That, in turn, will inevitably lead to the disqualification of President Trump from the presidential primary ballot in less than all fifty states, thereby risking chaos in our country. This can't possibly be the outcome the framers intended.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶275 I agree that Section Three bars from public office anyone who, having previously taken an oath as an officer of the United States to support the federal Constitution, engages in insurrection. But Section Three doesn't spell out the

---

[1] As pertinent here, Section Three provides that:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office . . . under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath . . . as an officer of the United States . . . to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same . . . .

U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

procedures that must be followed to determine whether someone has engaged in insurrection after taking the prerequisite oath. That is, it sheds no light on whether a jury must be empaneled or a bench trial will suffice, the proper burdens of proof and standards of review, the application of discovery and evidentiary rules, or even whether civil or criminal proceedings are contemplated. This dearth of procedural guidance is not surprising: Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment specifically gives Congress absolute power to enact legislation to enforce Section Three. My colleagues in the majority concede that there is currently no legislation enacted by Congress to enforce Section Three. This is of no moment to them, however, because they conclude that Section Three is self-executing, and that the states are free to apply their own procedures (including compressed ones in an election code) to enforce it.[2] That is hard for me to swallow.

---

[2] The majority repeatedly uses "self-executing" to describe Section Three, but then reasons that this part of the Fourteenth Amendment is enforceable in Colorado only because of the procedures our legislature has enacted as part of the state's Election Code. This strikes me as an oxymoron. If a constitutional provision is truly self-executing, it needs no legislation to be enforced. See Self-executing, Merriam-Webster Dictionary, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/self-executing [https://perma.cc/4X7W-Y8AR] (defining "self-executing" as "taking effect immediately without implementing legislation"); see also Self-enforcing, Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019) ("self-enforcing" means "effective and applicable without the need for any other action; self-executing"). Much like Inigo Montoya advised Vizzini, "I do not think [self-executing] means what [my colleagues in the majority] think it means." The Princess Bride (20th Century Fox 1987) ("You keep using that word [inconceivable]. I do not think it means what you think it means.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶276 Significantly, there is a federal statute that specifically criminalizes insurrection and requires that anyone convicted of engaging in such conduct be fined or imprisoned and be disqualified from holding public office. See 18 U.S.C. § 2383. If any federal legislation arguably enables the enforcement of Section Three, it's section 2383. True, President Trump has not been charged under that statute, so it is not before us. But the point is that this is the only federal legislation in existence at this time to potentially enforce Section Three. Had President Trump been charged under section 2383, he would have received the full panoply of constitutional rights that all defendants are afforded in criminal cases. More to the point for our purposes, had he been so charged, I wouldn't be writing separately to call attention to the substandard due process of law he received in these abbreviated Election Code proceedings.

¶277 I recognize the need to defend and protect our democracy against those who seek to undermine the peaceful transfer of power. And I embrace the judiciary's solemn role in upholding and applying the law. But that solemn role necessarily includes ensuring our courts afford everyone who comes before them (in criminal and civil proceedings alike) due process of law. Otherwise, as relevant here, how can we ever be confident that someone who is declared ineligible to hold public office pursuant to Section Three actually engaged in insurrection or rebellion after taking the prerequisite oath?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶278 In my view, what transpired in this litigation fell woefully short of what due process demands. Because I perceive the majority's ruling that Section Three is self-executing to be the most concerning misstep in today's lengthy opinion, I focus on that aspect of the legal analysis.

¶279 Context is key here. The Fourteenth Amendment was designed to address a particular juncture in American history. William Baude & Michael Stokes Paulsen, The Sweep and Force of Section Three, 172 U. Pa. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2024) (manuscript at 3), https://ssrn.com/abstract=4532751. The postbellum framers were confronted with the unprecedented nexus of historical events that gave rise to and shaped secession, the Civil War, and Reconstruction. Josh Blackman & Seth Barrett Tillman, Sweeping and Forcing the President into Section 3, 28(2) Tex. Rev. L. & Pol. (forthcoming 2024) (manuscript at 214–15), https://ssrn.com/abstract=4568771. And their response, in some measure, sounded the clarion call of "a constitutional revolution." Id. at 99.

¶280 Indeed, the Fourteenth Amendment ushered in an expansion of federal power that undercut traditional state power. See United States v. Washington, 20 F. 630, 631 (C.C.W.D. Tex. 1883) ("The fourteenth amendment is a limitation upon the powers of the state and an enlargement of the powers of congress."); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 255 (1995) (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("The Fourteenth Amendment directly empowers Congress at the same time it expressly limits the States."). Forefront in the minds of the framers was the evident concern that the states would again seek to undermine the national government. In short, the states—state institutions, state officials, and state courts—were not to be trusted. Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 346 (1879) ("The prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment are directed to the States, and they are to a degree restrictions of State power.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶281 Thus, the indelible trespass of the former confederate states was met squarely by an overarching goal to render federal institutional authority paramount. Such is the contextual framework informing my view of the instant matter. To my mind, it compels the conclusion, soundly supported by the framers' intent and the weight of the relevant authorities, that Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is not self-executing, and that Congress alone is empowered to pass any enabling legislation.

¶282 My colleagues in the majority turn Section Three on its head and hold that it licenses states to supersede the federal government. Respectfully, they have it backwards. Because no federal legislation currently exists to power Section Three and propel it into action, because President Trump has not been charged under section 2383, and because there is absolutely no authority permitting Colorado state courts to use Colorado's Election Code as an engine to provide the necessary thrust to effectuate Section Three, I respectfully dissent.[3] I would affirm the district court's judgment in favor of President Trump, but I would do so on other grounds.[4]

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I. Analysis

A. Pertinent Procedural Posture

¶283 The district court gave short shrift to the question of whether Section Three is self-executing. In its Omnibus Order, which denied President Trump's September 29 motion to dismiss, the court found the issue "irrelevant." The court ruled, in conclusory fashion, that states are empowered to execute Section Three via their own enabling legislation and that Colorado's Election Code constitutes such an enactment. This analytical shortcut, though convenient, is inconsistent with both the text of the Fourteenth Amendment and persuasive authority interpreting it.

¶284 Griffin's Case is the jumping-off point for any Section Three analysis.

---

[3] There is a colorable argument that the majority incorrectly holds that Section Three applies to the President of the United States. Other parts of the majority's analysis, including the determinations that President Trump engaged in insurrection and that his remarks deserve no shelter under the First Amendment's rather expansive protective canopy, are at least questionable. Because I conclude that Section Three is not self-executing, and because that conclusion is dispositive, I don't address any other issue.

[4] The district court decided that Section Three does not apply to the President of the United States.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

B. Griffin's Case: The Fountainhead

¶285 In 1869, less than a year after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Chase presided over Griffin's Case in the federal circuit court for the district of Virginia.[5] Griffin's Case is the wellspring of Section Three jurisprudence. And, given the temporal proximity of Chief Justice Chase's pronouncements on the topic of self-execution to the passage and ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, I consider the holding in Griffin's Case compelling.

¶286 Judge Hugh W. Sheffey presided over Caesar Griffin's criminal trial after the Fourteenth Amendment went into effect. Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 22. Before the Civil War, Sheffey held a Section Three-triggering position, and so, had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Id. Subsequently, Sheffey served in Virginia's confederate legislature. Id. It was not until after the war that Sheffey was appointed to a state court judgeship, the position he held at the time of Griffin's trial. Id. at 16. Following the jury's guilty verdict on the charge of assault with intent to kill, Judge Sheffey sentenced Griffin to two years' imprisonment. Id. at 22–23.

¶287 Griffin filed a collateral attack in federal district court. He argued that his sentence was null because Section Three had "instantly, on the day of its

[5] At the time, Supreme Court justices rode the circuit and sat in regional federal courts.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

promulgation, vacated all offices held by persons within the category of prohibition," thereby rendering Judge Sheffey ineligible to be on the bench. Id. at 24. More specifically, Griffin claimed that Sheffey was disqualified from being a judge because he had engaged in conduct prohibited by Section Three. Id. The federal district court agreed and ordered Griffin's immediate discharge from custody. Id.

¶288 On appeal, Chief Justice Chase framed the issue in the following terms: "[W]hether upon a sound construction of the amendment, it must be regarded as operating directly, without any intermediate proceeding whatever, upon all persons within the category of prohibition, and as depriving them at once, and absolutely, of all official authority and power." Id. at 23 (emphasis added). Chief Justice Chase grounded his resolution of this self-execution inquiry in the "character of the third section of the amendment." Id. at 25. In other words, he focused on the context in which the disqualification clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was enacted. Of course, he recognized that the ultimate object of this part of the Fourteenth Amendment was "to exclude from certain offices a certain class of persons." Id. at 26. But his prefatory statements echo the bugle blow of constitutional revolution: "The amendment itself was the first of the series of measures proposed or adopted by congress with a view to the reorganization of state governments acknowledging the constitutional supremacy of the national government, in those states which had attempted . . . to establish an independent Confederacy." Id. at 25.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶289 Crucially, he observed that "it is obviously impossible to [disqualify certain officers] by a simple declaration, whether in the constitution or in an act of congress." Id. at 26. He added that to carry out Section Three's punitive mandate and enforce "any sentence of exclusion," it must first "be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition." Id. Chief Justice Chase explained that "[t]o accomplish this ascertainment and ensure effective results," considerable procedural and normative mechanisms would need to be introduced; certainly, "proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcements of decisions, more or less formal, are indispensable." Id. And here's the kicker, the beating heart of Griffin's Case: Chief Justice Chase declared that these indispensable mechanisms "can only be provided for by congress." Id. (emphasis added).

¶290 It was the very language of the Fourteenth Amendment, Chief Justice Chase continued, that put this proposition beyond doubt: "Now, the necessity of this is recognized by the amendment itself, in its fifth and final section, which declares that 'congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provision[s] of this article.'" Id. (emphasis added) (quoting U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3). Chief Justice Chase noted that Section Five "qualifies [Section Three] to the same extent as it would if the whole amendment consisted of these two sections." Id. And pivoting back to Section Three, he pointed out that, consistent with Section Five, its final clause "gives to congress absolute control of the whole operation of the amendment." Id.; see U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3 ("But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶291 Chief Justice Chase, therefore, concluded:

> Taking the third section then, in its completeness with this final clause, it seems to put beyond reasonable question the conclusion that the intention of the people of the United States, in adopting the fourteenth amendment, was to create a disability, to be removed in proper cases by a two-thirds vote, and to be made operative in other cases by the legislation of congress in its ordinary course.

Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 26 (emphases added).

¶292 I extract three seminal, and related, takeaways from this review of Griffin's Case. First, Section Three is not self-executing. Second, only Congress can pass the "appropriate legislation" needed to execute it. And third, this grant of power to Congress was not merely formalistic; it was also pragmatic. Indeed, it was indicative of the complex nature of the disqualification function. Chief Justice Chase perceived that Section Three would require an array of mechanisms—procedural, evidentiary, and definitional—to ascertain who was subject to disqualification and how they could be disqualified. More on this third notion later.

¶293 For now, though, it is worth stressing that, despite detractors in some quarters, the other premises have withstood the test of time: Section Three is not self-executing, and Congress has the exclusive authority to enforce it. See Cale v. City of Covington, 586 F.2d 311, 316 (4th Cir. 1978) (citing Griffin's Case for the proposition that Section Three is "not self-executing absent congressional action"); State v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599, 616–17 (1875) (same); Hansen v. Finchem, No. CV-22-0099-AP/EL, 2022 WL 1468157, *1 (Ariz. May 9, 2022) (affirming the lower court's ruling against disqualification on state law grounds but stating that "Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment appears to expressly delegate to Congress the authority to devise the method to enforce the Disqualification Clause"); see also Va. Op. Att'y Gen. No. 21-003, at 3 (Jan. 22, 2021) (citing Griffin's Case and stating that "the weight of authority appears to be that Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment is not 'self-executing'").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶294 I now address the criticisms launched by the Electors against the enduring vintage of Griffin's Case. For the reasons I articulate, I am not persuaded by any of the contentions advanced.

C. Harmonizing Griffin's Case and Case of Davis

¶295 The Electors argue that Chief Justice Chase took the opposite tack on Section Three a couple of years before deciding Griffin's Case. See Case of Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63 (C.C.D. Va. 1871). But Griffin's Case was decided after Case of Davis, and unlike

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Griffin's Case, Case of Davis is a two-judicial-officer, unwritten, split decision.[6] Hence, to put it mildly, Case of Davis is of questionable precedential value. Indeed, the majority doesn't rely on Case of Davis in its attempt to undermine Griffin's Case.

¶296 In Case of Davis, Chief Justice Chase, again sitting as a circuit court judge, presided over the treason prosecution of former confederate president, Jefferson Davis. Id. The question before the court was whether Section Three displaced the federal criminal treason charges levied against Davis. Id. at 102. Defense counsel asserted that Section Three provided the exclusive punishment for those within its reach, thus foreclosing prosecution under the federal treason statute. Id. at 90–91. Furthermore, defense counsel maintained that Section Three "executes itself" and "needs no legislation on the part of congress to give it effect." Id. at 90.

¶297 Due to the structure of the federal judiciary at the time, the case was heard by both a federal district court judge and Chief Justice Chase sitting together. See Judiciary Act of 1802, 2 Stat. 156, 159, § 6. The judicial officers, however, failed to reach consensus on the defense's motion to quash the indictment. Case of Davis,

---

[6] Although the year in the citation for Case of Davis (1871) postdates the year in the citation for Griffin's Case (1869), it was in fact Case of Davis that came first. See Gerard N. Magliocca, Amnesty and Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, 36 Const. Comment. 87, 100 n.66 (2021). Chief Justice Chase announced on December 5, 1868, that the court had failed to reach consensus in Case of Davis. Case of Davis, 7 F. Cas. at 102; Certificate of Division, Case of Jefferson Davis, 7 F. Cas. 63 (C.C.D. Va. 1867–1871) (No. 324), https://joshblackman.com/wp-content/uploads/2023/08/5220.pdf [https://perma.cc/K7QC-4YZJ].

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

7 F. Cas. at 102. Accordingly, a certificate of disagreement was submitted for review by the Supreme Court at its next session. Id. Notably, though, the case was never heard by the Supreme Court because President Johnson issued a proclamation of general amnesty in December 1868, effectively disposing of the treason charges. Id.

¶298 Although the certificate of disagreement did not indicate the judicial officers' votes, the final sentence in the 1894 report of the case in the Federal Reports states that Chief Justice Chase "instructed the reporter to record him as having been of opinion on the disagreement, that the indictment should be quashed, and all further proceedings barred by the effect of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States." Id. Over the years, some have clung to this hearsay to posit that Chief Justice Chase was inconsistent in his application of Section Three, waffling on the issue of self-execution.

¶299 Certain legal scholars have sought to explain this purported incongruence by surmising that Chief Justice Chase's application of Section Three in Griffin's Case was politically motivated. Consequently, they criticize Griffin's Case as wrongly decided and the result of flawed logic. See Baude & Paulsen, supra (manuscript at 35–49). Other legal scholars, however, question whether the statement quoted above from the Federal Reports accurately represented Chief Justice Chase's views. They point out that the case reporter, a former confederate general, was the very attorney who represented Judge Sheffey in Griffin's Case.[7] See Blackman & Tillman, supra (manuscript at 15). Even assuming Case of Davis warrants any consideration at all, there is no need to join this affray because these cases can be reconciled in a principled manner by recognizing that there are two distinct senses of self-execution. Id. at 19. I find this distinction both helpful and borne out by the case law.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶300 First, there is self-execution as a shield, allowing individuals to raise the Constitution defensively, in response to an action brought by a third party. Second, there is self-execution as a sword—such as when individuals invoke the Constitution in advancing a theory of liability or cause of action that supports affirmative relief. When acting as a shield, the Fourteenth Amendment is self-executing. Cale, 586 F.2d at 316. The Fourteenth Amendment, however, cannot act as a self-executing sword; rather, an individual seeking affirmative relief under the Amendment must rely on legislation from Congress. Id.

¶301 The Fourth Circuit aptly adopted this distinction in Cale, thereby reconciling any apparent inconsistencies in Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence. That case

---

[7] Griffin's Case was decided in 1869 and the statement from the case reporter regarding Case of Davis appeared in the 1894 Federal Reports. Blackman & Tillman, supra (manuscript at 140).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

implicated a wrongful discharge action in which the plaintiff asked the court to sanction an implied cause of action arising under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Id. at 313. In examining whether an implied cause of action exists under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the court turned to cases that have construed Section Five. It began by discussing Ex parte Virginia, where the Supreme Court explained that the Fourteenth Amendment derives much of its force from Section Five, which envisions enabling legislation from Congress to effectuate the prohibitions of the amendment:

> It is not said the judicial power of the general government shall extend to enforcing the prohibitions and to protecting the rights and immunities guaranteed. It is not said that branch of the government shall be authorized to declare void any action of a State in violation of the prohibitions. It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged[.] Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective.

Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. at 345–46 (first emphasis in original, second emphasis added).

¶302 But shortly after deciding Ex parte Virginia, the Supreme Court declared the Fourteenth Amendment to be "undoubtedly self-executing without any ancillary legislation," while simultaneously making the seemingly inconsistent statement that Section Five "invests Congress with power to enforce" the Fourteenth Amendment "in order that the national will, thus declared, may not be a mere brutum fulmen." The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 11, 20 (1883). Although at first blush the opinion in the Civil Rights Cases appears to be both internally inconsistent and inconsistent with Ex parte Virginia, the Cale court did not so hold. Cale, 586 F.2d at 316. Instead, the Cale court resolved any apparent inconsistencies by distinguishing between, on the one hand, "the protection the Fourteenth Amendment provide[s] of its own force as a shield under the doctrine of judicial review," and on the other, affirmative relief sought under the amendment as a sword, which is unavailable without legislation from Congress. Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶303 In supporting this distinction, the Cale court found refuge in the Slaughter-House Cases. 83 U.S. 36 (1872). There, the defendants invoked the Fourteenth Amendment as a shield by arguing that a local law restricting where animals could be slaughtered deprived the city's butchers of their "right to exercise their trade." Id. at 60. The Supreme Court, however, held that given the history of the Reconstruction Amendments and their purpose of preventing discrimination against the newly liberated enslaved people, the butchers' "right to exercise their trade" was not a right that fell within the purview of the privileges-and-immunities provision of Section One of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at 81. Of particular interest for our purposes is the fact that the Court did not reject the use of the Fourteenth Amendment as a self-executing shield, but rather rejected the argument that the particular right in question fit within the Fourteenth Amendment's protection.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶304 Importantly, based on its examination of Ex parte Virginia, the Civil Rights Cases, and the Slaughter-House Cases, the Cale court observed that "the Congress and Supreme Court of the time were in agreement that affirmative relief under the amendment should come from Congress." Cale, 586 F.2d at 316. The Cale court added that it's only when state laws or proceedings are asserted "in hostility to rights and privileges" that the Fourteenth Amendment, and specifically Section One, may be raised as a self-executing defense to those laws or proceedings. Id. (discussing the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. at 46 (Harlan, J., dissenting)); see also The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. at 81 (explaining that when "it is a State that is to be dealt with, and not alone the validity of its laws," the matter should be left in the hands of Congress).

¶305 The defensive-offensive dynamic of the Fourteenth Amendment is best exemplified by the interplay between 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908). See Cale, 586 F.2d at 316–17. In Ex parte Young, multiple railroad companies wielded the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause as a shield to request enjoinment of the future enforcement of Minnesota's mandatory railroad rates. 209 U.S. at 130. The Court ruled in their favor, holding that they could prospectively bring suit against a state official to prevent the enforcement of an act that violated the federal constitution. Id. at 167. But an Ex parte Young claim is not so much an affirmative cause of action as it is a defense that may be asserted in anticipation of the enforcement of state laws alleged to be unconstitutional. See Mich. Corr. Org. v. Mich. Dep't of Corr., 774 F.3d 895, 906 (6th Cir. 2014). Hence, Ex parte Young provides a means of vindicating Fourteenth Amendment rights without violating the grant of exclusive enforcement power to Congress. When a party wishes to assert its Fourteenth Amendment rights offensively, however, it must bring a cause of action under legislation enacted by Congress, such as section 1983.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶306 Between affirmative relief provided by Congress and defensive Ex parte Young claims, constitutional rights are "protected in all instances." Cale, 586 F.2d at 316–17. Not surprisingly, after declining to find an implied cause of action permitting affirmative relief within the Fourteenth Amendment, the Fourth Circuit in Cale remanded to the district court with instructions to determine whether the plaintiff's wrongful discharge claim could be brought under section 1983, the proper enforcement mechanism. Id. at 312.

¶307 The majority devotes all of one sentence to Cale and disregards most of the Supreme Court jurisprudence to which that thoughtful opinion is moored. Maj. op. at ¶ 103. It is true that Cale was a Section One, not a Section Three, case. But Cale cited to Griffin's Case (a Section Three case) in determining that the Fourteenth Amendment cannot be used as a self-executing sword, thus tethering the distinction to both Sections. Cale, 586 F.2d at 316. Accordingly, while courts have seldom had occasion to interpret Section Three, the case law on Section One is instructive on the issue of self-execution.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶308 Critically, the Supreme Court has affirmed that the Fourteenth Amendment, while offering protection under certain circumstances, does not provide a self-executing cause of action. Ownbey v. Morgan, 256 U.S. 94, 112 (1921) ("[I]t cannot rightly be said that the Fourteenth Amendment furnishes a universal and self-executing remedy. Its function is negative, [n]ot affirmative, and it carries no mandate for particular measures of reform."). Moreover, as pertinent here, the Supreme Court has retreated from recognizing implied causes of action, instead holding that for a cause of action to exist, Congress must expressly authorize it. Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, 276 (2001) (refusing to recognize a private right of action because, "[l]ike substantive federal law itself, private rights of action to enforce federal law must be created by Congress").

¶309 The majority nevertheless protests that interpreting any section of the Fourteenth Amendment as requiring legislation yields absurd results because the rest of the Reconstruction Amendments are self-executing. Maj. op. ¶ 96. I do not dispute that the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Amendments are self-executing. But I disagree that Section Three must therefore be deemed self-executing as well. The Thirteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, on the one hand, and the Fourteenth Amendment, on the other, are different.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶310 The Thirteenth and Fifteenth Amendments speak in affirmative, universal terms to abolish slavery, create the right to vote, and restrain not only government actors, but also private individuals. See George Rutherglen, State Action, Private Action, and the Thirteenth Amendment, 94 Va. L. Rev. 1367, 1367 (2008); Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347, 363 (1915) (recognizing "the right of suffrage" created by the Fifteenth Amendment's "generic character"). The Fourteenth Amendment, however, was born out of a deep suspicion of the states and acts as a negative policing mechanism intended solely to curtail state power. Adarand, 515 U.S. at 255 (Stevens, J. dissenting) ("The Fourteenth Amendment directly empowers Congress at the same time it expressly limits the States."); The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. at 11 (holding that the Fourteenth Amendment applies to state action, not private action). This curtailment applies both to state laws or actions abridging rights and to a state's selection of government officials. To give effect to this amendment while respecting our federalist system, courts have turned to the sword-shield paradigm of self-execution, thereby striking "a balance between delegated federal power and reserved state power" without forsaking the protection of constitutional rights "in all instances." Michigan Corr. Org., 774 F.3d at 900; Cale, 586 F.2d at 317.

¶311 To draw a yet deeper line in the sand, unlike the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, Section Three does not indelibly ensure a right but instead allows the federal government to act as a protective check against a state's selection of government officials so as to preclude elected insurrectionists and safeguard democracy. This shift in power between the authority of the states to choose their own government officials and the authority of the federal government as a last defense is all the more reason to require a congressionally created cause of action to direct the execution of this federal oversight.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶312 In sum, Chief Justice Chase's holding in Griffin's Case appears consistent and in alignment with both his alleged vote in Case of Davis and our framework for Fourteenth Amendment litigation. Griffin wielded Section Three as a self-executing sword, invoking the provision as a cause of action to disqualify Judge Sheffey. Davis, on the other hand, took a defensive posture and invoked Section Three as a self-executing shield, arguing that it provided the exclusive punishment for insurrection, thus displacing the federal criminal treason charges brought against him.

¶313 Having said that, I do not rely solely on Griffin's Case. Congress's own actions corroborate my understanding of Section Three.

D. Erstwhile Enabling Legislation

¶314 The majority's ruling that Section Three self-executes without the need for any federal enforcement legislation is further undermined by Congress's promulgation of just such legislation. One year after Griffin's Case was decided, and perhaps in response to it, Congress enacted the Enforcement Act of 1870. The Enforcement Act contained two provisions for the specific purpose of enforcing Section Three. Enforcement Act of 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 140, 143–44. The first provided a quo warranto mechanism whereby a federal district attorney could bring a civil suit in federal court to remove from office a person who was disqualified by Section Three. Id. at 143. The second permitted a criminal prosecution for knowingly accepting or holding office in violation of Section Three, and included punishment by imprisonment of not more than a year, a fine of not more than $1,000, or both. Id. at 143–44.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶315 The enforcement purpose behind the Act was evident in the congressional debates held on these very two provisions. Speaking in support of their adoption, Senator Lyman Trumbull, referring to Section Three, stated, "But notwithstanding that constitutional provision we know that hundreds of men are holding office who are disqualified by the Constitution. The Constitution provides no means for enforcing itself, and this is merely a bill to give effect to the fundamental law embraced in the Constitution." Cong. Globe, 41st Cong., 1st Sess. 626 (1869) (emphasis added). He later reiterated this point as he explained that "[s]ome statute is certainly necessary to enforce the constitutional provision." Id. The debate on the floor focused not on whether the provisions were necessary for enforcing Section Three—that seemed to be a foregone conclusion—but instead on whether the second provision and its attendant punishments were necessary. The need for the first provision was so self-evident that it was not even debated. As Senator Garrett Davis put it, the first provision simply provided an "adequate remedy to prevent any of the criminals under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution from holding office in defiance of its letter." Id. at 627.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶316 While the quo warranto provision in the Enforcement Act would have provided a civil cause of action to challenge President Trump's eligibility to appear on Colorado's presidential primary ballot, Congress repealed it in 1948. See Myles S. Lynch, Disloyalty & Disqualification: Reconstructing Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment, 30 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 153, 206 n.365 (2021) (citing Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 646, § 39, 62 Stat. 869, 993); see also Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 645, § 2383, 62 Stat. 683, 808. The Enforcement Act's criminal provision, however, appears to have survived: As best I can tell, 18 U.S.C. § 2383 is its descendant. Id.

¶317 Presumably recognizing the civil-action gap created by the 1948 repeal, just months after the January 6, 2021 incident, legislation was proposed to allow the Attorney General of the United States to bring a civil action "against any Officeholder who engages in insurrection or rebellion, including any Officeholder who, after becoming an Officeholder, engaged in insurrection or rebellion." H.R. 1405, 117th Cong. (2021). H.R. 1405 would have disqualified such an Officeholder from federal or state office. Id. Furthermore, it would have provided what has been so apparently lacking from this state proceeding—clear designations of the appropriate procedures, forum, and standard of evidence, as well as the definition of "insurrection or rebellion." Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶318 H.R. 1405 made it no further than introduction in the House. But the relevant point for our purposes remains: As recently as 2021, just months after the January 6 incident, Congress considered legislation to enforce Section Three through a civil proceeding. Why would Congress do so if, as the majority insists, Section Three is self-executing? Along the same lines, if the majority is correct that Section Three is self-executing, why did Congress pass the Enforcement Act to begin with (on the heels of Griffin's Case) and then allow it to remain in effect in its entirety until 1948? The majority offers no salient explanation.

¶319 If there is any enforcing legislation for Section Three currently on the books, it is arguably what remains from the Enforcement Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2383. Similar to its ancestor, that statute states that:

> Whoever incites, sets on foot, assists, or engages in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or gives aid or comfort thereto, shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both; and shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

While section 2383 might provide an enforcement mechanism for Section Three, it is not presently before us. That's because President Trump has never been charged with, let alone convicted of, violating it. The instant litigation feels to me like an end run around section 2383.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶320 To the extent there is interest in seeking to disqualify President Trump from holding public office (one of the mandatory punishments provided in section 2383) based on the allegation that he engaged in insurrection (one of the acts prohibited by section 2383), why wasn't he charged under section 2383? And, relatedly, why isn't he entitled to more due process than that which he received in this constricted Election Code proceeding? To be sure, unlike section 2383, Section Three prescribes neither a fine nor a term of imprisonment as a consequence for engaging in an insurrection after taking the prerequisite oath. So, I'm not suggesting that President Trump should have been afforded all the rights to which a defendant would be entitled in a criminal case. But here, the district court found that he engaged in insurrection after taking the prerequisite oath, despite affording him subpar due process (even under civil-procedure standards).

¶321 Compellingly, although H.R. 1405 wouldn't have called for a criminal proceeding, it would have provided more due process than that available in a civil action. For example, H.R. 1405 would have required any action brought to be "heard and determined by a district court of three judges." H.R. 1405, § 1(d)(1). Additionally, any allegation of insurrection would have demanded proof by clear and convincing evidence, and any final order or injunction would have been reviewable by appeal directly to the U.S. Supreme Court. Id. at § (1)(d)(1)-(4). I infer from these provisions that at least some members of Congress acknowledged the need to provide ample due process (more than is available in typical civil cases) to anyone alleged to have violated Section Three.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶322 My colleagues in the majority necessarily view as acceptable the diminished due process afforded President Trump as a result of enforcing Section Three through our Election Code. Instead, they prioritize their fear that a ruling disallowing the disqualification of President Trump from the primary ballot pursuant to Section Three would mean that "Colorado could not exclude from the ballot even candidates who plainly do not satisfy the age, residency, and citizenship requirements of the Presidential Qualifications Clause of Article II." Maj. op. ¶ 68. They see this as a more insidious evil. As I discuss in the following section, however, my colleagues are mistaken in their understanding of the law, and their worry is therefore unjustified.

E. Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment Is Unlike Other Constitutional Qualification Clauses

¶323 The U.S. Supreme Court has acknowledged a non-exhaustive list of constitutional Qualification Clauses. See U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 787 n.2 (1995) (quoting Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 520 n.41 (1969), which lists "qualifications" codified in the following provisions of the U.S. Constitution: (1) Art. I, § 2, cl. 2; (2) Art. I, § 3, cl. 7; (3) Art. I, § 6, cl. 2; (4) Art. IV,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

§ 4; (5) Art. VI, cl. 3; and (6) Amend. XIV, § 3). This list can fairly be expanded to include Article II, Section One, Clause Five, and perhaps also Section One of the Twenty-Second Amendment. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5 (laying out three presidential eligibility requirements related to birth ("natural born Citizen"), age ("thirty five Years"), and residency ("fourteen Years a Resident"), which are similar to those specified in Art. I, § 2, cl. 2); U.S. Const. amend. XXII, § 1 (using the same "No person shall" language found in Art. I, § 2, cl. 2 and specifying a two-term limit for the presidency).

¶324 Although Section Three was included in Powell among the so-called Qualification Clauses, closer scrutiny reveals that it is unique and deserving of different treatment. That's because Section Three is the only one that is "qualifie[d]" by the following language: "[C]ongress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provision[s] of this article." Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 26 (emphasis added) (quoting U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 5 and stating that "[t]he fifth section qualifies the third"). None of the other Qualification Clauses—even when viewed in the context of the original Articles in toto—contains the "appropriate legislation" modifier. Indeed, that modifier only appears in certain other Amendments, none of which are objectively relevant to the instant matter. I need not contemplate what bearing, if any, this has on the self-executing nature of constitutional provisions more generally. While that might be an open question, see Blackman & Tillman, supra (manuscript at 23) (noting that there appears to be "no deep well of consensus that constitutional provisions are automatically self-executing or even presumptively self-executing"), the demands of the instant matter counsel in favor of limiting my exposition to the Constitution's presidential qualifications, especially those found in Article II, Section One, Clause Five.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶325 Here, once again, the interplay between Sections Three and Five of the Fourteenth Amendment is of great significance. See Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 26. As mentioned, Article II, Section One, Clause Five contains nothing akin to the "appropriate legislation" language in Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, unlike Section Three's disqualification clause, which is modified by Section Five's "appropriate legislation" language, the Article II presidential qualifications do not appear to have a constitutionally mandated reliance on congressional enabling legislation.

¶326 We are not at liberty to ignore this blistering lacuna in Article II's language. But that is exactly what my colleagues in the majority do. And in so doing, they err. Even if the presidential qualifications contained in Article II are self-executing or allow for state enabling legislation — thereby providing the Electors with a cause of action to enjoin the Secretary of State ("the Secretary") from certifying a candidate disqualified by birth, age, or residency, to the Colorado presidential primary ballot, see, e.g., Hassan v. Colorado, 870 F. Supp. 2d 1192, 1194–95 (D. Colo.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

2012), aff'd, 495 F. App'x 947 (10th Cir. 2012); see also § 1-4-1203(2)(a), C.R.S. (2023)—the same does not hold true for Section Three's disqualification clause.

¶327 Moreover, I detect a principled reason underlying this discrepancy in the language of Article II and Section Three. It relates to what I previously identified as my third takeaway from Griffin's Case. Recall that the Fourteenth Amendment's grant of absolute power to Congress vis-à-vis Section Three's enforcement was pragmatic, not merely formalistic. It was motivated by the complex nature of the disqualification function. Chief Justice Chase presciently observed that to "ascertain what particular individuals are embraced" by Section Three's disqualifying function, and to "ensure effective results" in a disqualification case, considerable "proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcements of decisions . . . are indispensable." Griffin's Case, 11 F. Cas. at 26. In my view, the unwieldy experience of the instant litigation proves beyond any doubt the foresight of Chief Justice Chase's pronouncements. It doesn't require much process, procedure, or legal acumen to determine whether a candidate is barred by the binary and clerical requirements of birth, age, residency, and term limits. Typically, a notarized statement of intent will do the trick. See § 1-4-1204(1)(c), C.R.S. (2023). By contrast, Section Three disqualification necessarily requires substantial procedural and normative mechanisms to ensure a fair and constitutionally compliant outcome. These include, to name but a few, instruction on discovery and evidentiary rules; guidance as to whether a jury must be empaneled or a bench trial will suffice; direction as to the proper standards of review and burdens of proof; and clarification about whether civil or criminal proceedings are contemplated. Additionally, there's a vital need for definitional counsel on such questions as who is an "officer of the United States"? What is an "insurrection"? What does it mean to "engage[] in" the same? Does "incitement" count?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶328 By no means do I intend to undermine the sacred role of the judiciary in directing the course of similar issues through precedential pathways. Nor would I have the third branch hamstrung in its task of setting the metes and bounds of litigation practice. But when the enforcement power of a punitive constitutional mandate is delegated to Congress in such unequivocal terms, it would appear decidedly outside the judicial bailiwick to furnish the scaffolding that only "appropriate legislation" can supply. Because the Constitution gives this job to Congress, and only Congress, I consider it equally improper—indeed, constitutionally impossible—for state legislatures, in the absence of federal legislation, to create pseudo causes of action pursuant to Section Three's disqualification clause. This is precisely what the framers sought to prevent.

¶329 For this reason, the cases cited by the district court for the proposition that "states can, and have, applied Section [Three] pursuant to state statute without federal legislation" do not alter my analysis. See Worthy v. Barrett, 63 N.C. 199, 200

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

(1869), appeal dismissed sub no. Worthy v. Comm'rs, 76 U.S. 611 (1869); In re Tate, 63 N.C. 308, 309 (1869); State ex rel. Sandlin v. Watkins, 21 La. Ann. 631, 631–34 (La. 1869); State v. Griffin, No. D-101-CV-2022-00473, 2022 WL 4295619, at *15–22 (N.M. Dist. Sept. 6, 2022); Rowan v. Greene, No. 2222582-OSAH-SECSTATE-CE-57-Beaudrot, 1 (Ga. Off. Admin. Hearings May 6, 2022). To the extent other state courts have concluded that their own state statutes allow them to adjudicate Section Three claims, I respectfully submit that they are flat out wrong. Unfortunately, the majority joins company with these misguided decisions and holds that our General Assembly not only can, but has, empowered Colorado's state courts to adjudicate Section Three claims via our Election Code.[8] Maj. op. ¶ 88 n.11. I turn next to why Colorado's Election Code cannot rescue the majority.

F. Colorado's Election Code Cannot Supply What Congress Has Withheld

¶330 There is zero authority permitting state legislatures to do that which, though delegated to it, Congress has declined to do. The majority, however, holds that the Electors' Fourteenth Amendment claim can be brought under sections 1-1-113

[8] Interestingly, the majority does not explain what should happen moving forward if nobody challenges a candidate whom the Secretary believes previously engaged in insurrection after taking the prerequisite oath. Without the state courts' involvement, is the Secretary supposed to decide on her own whether the candidate is disqualified from public office by Section Three? And if so, how would the Secretary go about doing that? Would the majority expect her to act as investigator, prosecutor, and adjudicator in that type of situation?

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

and 1-4-1204(4), C.R.S. (2023), of the Colorado Election Code because the Secretary's listing of a constitutionally disqualified candidate on the presidential primary ballot would be a "wrongful act," as that term is used in section 1-1-113. See § 1-1-113(1). Maj. op. ¶¶ 4–5. But the truncated procedures and limited due process provided by sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4) are wholly insufficient to address the constitutional issues currently at play.

¶331 Section 1-1-113(1) provides that "when any eligible elector files a verified petition . . . alleging that a person charged with a duty under this code has committed or is about to commit a breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act, . . . upon a finding of good cause, the district court shall issue an order requiring substantial compliance with the provisions of this code." (Emphases added.) Section 1-4-1204(4) outlines the procedures to be followed when a section 1-1-113 challenge concerns the listing of a candidate on the presidential primary ballot. It provides that the challenge "must be made in writing and filed with the district court . . . no later than five days after the filing deadline for candidates." § 1-4-1204(4). The written challenge "must provide notice in a summary manner of an alleged impropriety that gives rise to the complaint." Id. Once the challenge is filed, the district court must hold a hearing within five days. Id. At that hearing, the district court must "hear the challenge and assess the validity of all alleged improprieties." Id. The filing party has the burden of sustaining the challenge by a preponderance of the evidence. Id. After the hearing, the district court must issue its findings of fact and conclusions of law within forty-eight hours. Id. An appeal from the district court's ruling must be brought before this court within three days of the district court's order, and this court has discretion to accept or decline jurisdiction over the case. § 1-4-1204(4); § 1-1-113(3).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶332 As these statutory provisions make clear, a section 1-1-113 challenge to the certification of a candidate to the presidential primary ballot is meant to be handled on an expedited basis. See Frazier v. Williams, 2017 CO 85, ¶ 11, 401 P.3d 541, 544 ("[S]ection 1-1-113 is a summary proceeding designed to quickly resolve challenges brought by electors, candidates, and other designated plaintiffs against state election officials prior to election day."). Indeed, "such proceedings generally move at a breakneck pace." Id. It's unsurprising, then, that this court has previously limited the types of claims that can be brought under section 1-1-113 to those "alleging a breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act under the Colorado Election Code." Id. at ¶ 10, 401 P.3d at 543 (emphasis added).

¶333 Because section 1-1-113 constitutes a modest grant of power, until today, this court has expressly declined to use that section's reference to "other wrongful act[s]" to expand its scope to include constitutional claims and other claims that do not arise specifically under the Election Code. Id. at ¶ 14, 401 P.3d at 544. The "accelerated" nature of a section 1-1-113 proceeding and the limited remedy available in such a proceeding (i.e., an order requiring "substantial compliance with the provisions of [the Election Code]") render the statute incompatible with complex constitutional claims such as the one involved here. See id. at ¶¶ 16–18, 401 P.3d at 544–45.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶334 An examination of the proceedings below highlights why a section 1-1-113 proceeding is a mismatch for a constitutional claim rooted in Section Three. The Electors filed their verified petition on September 6, 2023. The verified petition, far from being a "summary" notice of the alleged impropriety, see § 1-4-1204(4), was 105 pages in length. The district court did not hold a hearing within five days as required by section 1-4-1204(4). In fact, the court didn't hold its first status conference until September 18, twelve days after the verified petition was filed.[9] During that status conference, the court set deadlines for initial briefing. The district court gave the parties just four days, or until September 22, to file initial motions to dismiss with briefing on those motions to be completed by October 6. Cf. C.R.C.P. 12(b) (allowing twenty-one days from service of the complaint in a civil case to file motions to dismiss). The court also scheduled a five-day hearing to begin on October 30, or roughly eight weeks after the verified petition was filed.

[9] I recognize that the case was removed to federal court on September 7, the day after it was filed. But the federal court returned the case to the state court on September 12, six days before the first status conference was held.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

That's fifty-four days, which is nearly ten times the amount of time permitted by the Election Code. See § 1-4-1204(4) ("No later than five days after the challenge is filed, a hearing must be held . . . .").

¶335 At the next status conference, on September 22, the court set more deadlines, this time related to exhibit lists, expert disclosures, and proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. With respect to expert disclosures, the court ordered the Electors to provide expert reports by October 6, or twenty-four days before the hearing. Cf. C.R.C.P. 26(a)(2)(C)(I) (providing that in a civil case the claiming party's expert disclosures are typically due "at least 126 days (18 weeks) before the trial date"). It ordered President Trump to provide his expert reports no later than October 27, three days before the hearing was to begin. Cf. C.R.C.P. 26(a)(2)(C)(II) (stating that a defending party in a civil case is generally not required to provide expert reports "until 98 days (14 weeks) before the trial date"). And even though it was apparent from very early on in these proceedings that the Electors would rely heavily on expert testimony regarding both legal and factual matters to attempt to prove their challenge, the district court did not allow experts to be deposed. Cf. C.R.C.P. 26(b)(4)(A) (setting forth the default rule on the deposition of experts in civil cases: "A party may depose any person who has been identified as an expert disclosed pursuant to subsection 26(a)(2) of this Rule whose opinions may be presented at trial."). Instead, the court ordered that expert reports must be "fulsome" and that experts would not be allowed to testify to anything outside their reports.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶336 As planned, the hearing began on October 30 and concluded on November 3. The district court gave each side eighteen hours to present its case. The parties presented closing arguments on November 15, and the court issued its final order on November 17, two weeks after the hearing concluded and seventy-two days after the verified petition was filed.

¶337 This was a severe aberration from the deadlines set forth in the Election Code, see § 1-4-1204(4), which require a district court to issue its ruling no more than forty-eight hours after the hearing and roughly a week after the verified petition is filed. Despite this clear record, my colleagues in the majority curiously conclude that the district court "substantially compl[ied]" with all the statutory deadlines. Maj. op. ¶ 85. That's simply inaccurate (unless the majority views complete failure as substantial compliance). The majority's reading of the record, while creative, doesn't hold water.

¶338 Given the complexity of the legal and factual issues presented in this case, it's understandable why the district court may have felt that adhering to the deadlines in section 1-4-1204(4) wouldn't allow the parties to adequately litigate the issues. But the district court didn't have the discretion to ignore those statutory deadlines. Section 1-4-1204(4) states that "a hearing must be held" no later than five days after a challenge is filed and that the district court "shall issue findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing." See Waddell v. People, 2020 CO 39, ¶ 16, 462 P.3d 1100, 1106 ("[T]he 'use of the word "shall" in a statute generally indicates [the legislature's] intent for the term to be mandatory.'" (alteration in original) (quoting People v. Hyde, 2017 CO 24, ¶ 28, 393 P.3d 962, 969)); Ryan Ranch Cmty. Ass'n v. Kelley, 2016 CO 65, ¶ 42, 380 P.3d 137, 146 (noting that "shall" and "must" both "connote[] a mandatory requirement").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶339 Rather than recognize that the Section Three challenge brought by the Electors was a square constitutional peg that could not be jammed into our Election Code's round hole, the district court forged ahead and improvised as it went along, changing the statutory deadlines on the fly as if they were mere suggestions. If, as the majority liberally proclaims, sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4) provide such a "robust vehicle" for handling the constitutional claim brought here, Maj. op. ¶ 86, why didn't the district court just drive it? Why, instead, did the district court feel compelled to rebuild such a "robust vehicle" by modifying the procedural provisions of the Election Code? I submit that, in reality, while sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4) are plenty adequate to handle ordinary challenges arising under the Election Code, they did not measure up to the task of addressing the Electors' Section Three claim. The result was a proceeding that was neither the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"summary proceeding" envisioned by section 1-1-113 nor a full-blown trial; rather, it was a procedural Frankenstein created by stitching together fragments from sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4) and remnants of traditional civil trial practice.

¶340 Even with the unauthorized statutory alterations made by the district court, the aggressive deadlines and procedures used nevertheless stripped the proceedings of many basic protections that normally accompany a civil trial, never mind a criminal trial. There was no basic discovery, no ability to subpoena documents and compel witnesses, no workable timeframes to adequately investigate and develop defenses, and no final resolution of many legal issues affecting the court's power to decide the Electors' claim before the hearing on the merits.

¶341 There was no fair trial either: President Trump was not offered the opportunity to request a jury of his peers; experts opined about some of the facts surrounding the January 6 incident and theorized about the law, including as it relates to the interpretation and application of the Fourteenth Amendment generally and Section Three specifically; and the court received and considered a partial congressional report, the admissibility of which is not beyond reproach.

¶342 I have been involved in the justice system for thirty-three years now, and what took place here doesn't resemble anything I've seen in a courtroom. In my experience, in our adversarial system of justice, parties are always allowed to conduct discovery, subpoena documents and compel witnesses, and adequately prepare for trial, and experts are never permitted to usurp the role of the judge by opining on how the law should be interpreted and applied.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶343 The majority tries to excuse the due process shortcomings I have discussed by noting that section 1-1-113 proceedings "move quickly out of necessity" because "[l]ooming elections trigger a cascade of deadlines . . . that cannot accommodate protracted litigation schedules, particularly when the dispute concerns a candidate's access to the ballot." Maj. op. ¶ 81. But that's exactly my point. The necessarily expedited nature of section 1-1-113 proceedings is precisely why the Electors should not have been allowed to piggyback a Section Three claim—an admittedly complex constitutional claim—on their Election Code claim in the first place. In any event, the majority's acknowledgement that section 1-1-113 proceedings "cannot accommodate protracted litigation" seems to directly contradict its determination that the Election Code endowed the district court with the "flexibility" to adequately accommodate the needs of this complex litigation. Id. at ¶¶ 81, 85.[10] The majority can't have its cake and eat it too.

---

[10] Even if the majority were correct about the district court's "flexibility" to accommodate a constitutional claim, the "limit[ed] appellate review" available under the letter of section 1-1-113 further demonstrates why the Election Code is not an appropriate avenue for the prosecution of a Section Three claim. Frazier, ¶ 18, 401 P.3d at 545. This court has the sole discretion to review section 1-1-113 proceedings, § 1-1-113(3); § 1-4-1204(4), so, whenever we decline such review, "the

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶344 The irregularity of these proceedings is particularly troubling given the stakes. The Electors ask us to hold that President Trump engaged in insurrection and is thus disqualified from being placed on the ballot for this upcoming presidential primary.[11]

¶345 Today's decision will have sweeping consequences beyond just this election. The majority's ruling that President Trump is disqualified under Section Three means that he can never again run for a Senate or House of Representatives position, or become an elector, or hold any office (civil or military) under the United States or under any state. In other words, he will be barred from holding any public office, state or federal, for the rest of time. His only possible out is if Congress at some point decides to remove the disqualification through a two-thirds vote by each House (which is no small feat). "A declaration that a person is permanently barred from any future public office raises constitutional issues that simple removal from office does not . . . . The serious nature of any such holding decision of the district court shall be final and not subject to further appellate review," Frazier, ¶ 18, 401 P.3d at 545 (quoting § 1-1-113(3)). Imagine, then, if we had declined to review the instant matter. Alarmingly, the adjudication of federal constitutional provisions, disqualifying President Trump from office, would have met its road's end in state district court. How can this court give its imprimatur to such an inverted conception of the supremacy doctrine? I, for one, cannot.

---

[11] This same ask has been made of other courts based on their state election codes. See, e.g., Trump v. Benson, No. 23-00151-MZ (Mich. Ct. Cl. Nov. 14, 2023); Growe v. Simon, 997 N.W.2d 81 (Minn. 2023). Ours is the first to take the bait.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

demands that the rules of procedural due process be complied with strictly." Bohannan v. Arizona ex rel Smith, 389 U.S. 1, 4 (1967) (Douglas, J., dissenting).

¶346 There was no strict compliance with procedural due process here. How is this result fair? And how can we expect Coloradans to embrace this outcome as fair?

¶347 I cannot agree with the majority that the chimeric proceedings below gave President Trump process commensurate to the interest of which he has been deprived. Nor did the proceedings below protect the interest Coloradans have in voting for a candidate of their choosing. Of course, if President Trump committed a heinous act worthy of disqualification, he should be disqualified for the sake of protecting our hallowed democratic system, regardless of whether citizens may wish to vote for him in Colorado. But such a determination must follow the appropriate procedural avenues. Absent adequate due process, it is improper for our state to bar him from holding public office.

¶348 More broadly, I am disturbed about the potential chaos wrought by an imprudent, unconstitutional, and standardless system in which each state gets to adjudicate Section Three disqualification cases on an ad hoc basis. Surely, this enlargement of state power is antithetical to the framers' intent.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

II. Conclusion

¶349 In the first American Declaration of Rights in 1776, George Mason wrote that "no free government, nor the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by . . . the recognition by all citizens that they have . . . rights, and that such rights cannot be enjoyed save in a society where law is respected and due process is observed." Va. Const. art. I, § 15. Some two and a half centuries later, those words still ring true. In 2023, just as in 1776, all, including those people who may have committed horrendous acts, are entitled to procedural due process.

¶350 Because I cannot in good conscience join my colleagues in the majority in ruling that Section Three is self-executing and that the expedited procedures in our Election Code afforded President Trump adequate due process of law, I respectfully dissent. Given the current absence of federal legislation to enforce Section Three, and given that President Trump has not been charged pursuant to section 2383, the district court should have granted his September 29 motion to dismiss. It erred in not doing so. I would therefore affirm its judgment on other grounds.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

JUSTICE BERKENKOTTER dissenting.

¶351 Today, the majority holds that former President Donald J. Trump ("President Trump") cannot be certified to Colorado's presidential primary ballot. Maj. op. ¶ 5. He is, the majority concludes, disqualified from being President of the United States again because he, as an officer of the United States, took an oath to support the Constitution and thereafter engaged in insurrection. See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3[1]; Maj. op. ¶¶ 4–5. In reaching this conclusion, the majority determines as an initial matter that a group of Colorado Republican and unaffiliated electors eligible to vote in the Republican presidential primary ("the Electors") asserted a proper claim for relief under Colorado's Election Code ("Election Code"). See §§ 1-1-101 to 1-13-804, C.R.S. (2023); Maj. op. ¶ 57.

---

[1] Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment is a Civil War era amendment to the United States Constitution that was ratified in 1868. Its aim was to prohibit loyalists to the confederacy who had taken an oath to support the Constitution from taking various state and federal offices. It provides:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶352 I write separately to dissent because I disagree with the majority's initial conclusion that the Election Code—as currently written—authorizes Colorado courts to decide whether a presidential primary candidate is disqualified under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution ("Section Three") from being listed on Colorado's presidential primary ballot. Maj. op. ¶¶ 62–63, 66. In my view, the majority construes the court's authority too broadly. Its approach overlooks some of part 12 of the Election Code's plain language and is at odds with the historical application of section 1-1-113, C.R.S. (2023), which up until now has been limited to challenges involving relatively straightforward issues, like whether a candidate meets a residency requirement for a school board election. Plus, the majority's approach seems to have no discernible limits.

¶353 To explain why the majority—to my mind—is wrong, first, I explain the process for challenging the listing of a candidate on the presidential primary ballot in Colorado and describe sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4), C.R.S. (2023), since those sections of the Election Code define the scope of the district court's authority to hear the case below. Then, I lay out the procedural history of this case. After that, I turn to the question of whether the district court erred in interpreting these two statutes and consider the majority's analysis with respect to each. In doing so, I conclude that the General Assembly has not granted courts the authority the district court exercised in this case and that the court, accordingly, erred in denying President Trump's motion to dismiss.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

I. The Process for Challenging the Listing of a Candidate on the Presidential Primary Ballot in Colorado

¶354 Part 12 of the Election Code charges Jena Griswold, in her official capacity as Colorado's Secretary of State ("the Secretary"), with certifying the names and party affiliations of the candidates to be placed on presidential primary ballots no later than sixty days before the presidential primary election. See § 1-4-1204(1). Section 1-4-1204(4) details the process through which an eligible petitioner can challenge a candidate's listing on the presidential primary ballot. It states:

> Any challenge to the listing of any candidate on the presidential primary election ballot must be made in writing and filed with the district court in accordance with section 1-1-113(1) no later than five days after the filing deadline for candidates. Any such challenge must provide notice in a summary manner of an alleged impropriety that gives rise to the complaint. No later than five days after the challenge is filed, a hearing must be held at which time the district court shall hear the challenge and assess the validity of all alleged improprieties. The district court shall issue findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing. The party filing the challenge has the burden to sustain the challenge by a preponderance of the evidence. Any order entered by the district court may be reviewed in accordance with section 1-1-113(3).

§ 1-4-1204(4).

¶355 Section 1-1-113 is Colorado's fast-track procedural process under the Election Code that allows candidates; political parties; individuals who have made nominations; and, as pertinent here, eligible electors to file section 1-4-1204(4) and other challenges in court, alleging that the Secretary or one of Colorado's sixty-four county clerks and recorders has committed or is about to commit a breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act. It provides:

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

> When any controversy arises between any official charged with any duty or function under this code and any candidate, or any officers or representatives of a political party, or any persons who have made nominations or when any eligible elector files a verified petition in a district court of competent jurisdiction alleging that a person charged with a duty under this code has committed or is about to commit a breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act, after notice to the official which includes an opportunity to be heard, upon a finding of good cause, the district court shall issue an order requiring substantial compliance with the provisions of this code. The order shall require the person charged to forthwith perform the duty or to desist from the wrongful act or to forthwith show cause why the order should not be obeyed. The burden of proof is on the petitioner.

§ 1-1-113(1) (emphasis added).

II. Procedural History

A. The Electors' Petition

¶356 On September 6, 2023, the Electors sued the Secretary under sections 1-1-113 and 1-4-1204(4) of the Election Code, alleging that the Secretary certifying President Trump to the primary ballot would constitute an "impropriety" under section 1-4-1204(4), and thus a "breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act" under section 1-1-113(1) because Section Three—which disqualifies insurrectionists from holding office—prohibits him from being listed. The Secretary's "breach or neglect of duty or other wrongful act," the Electors argued, authorized the district court to "issue an order requiring" the Secretary to "substantial[ly] compl[y]" with the Election Code by not certifying President Trump to the ballot. See § 1-1-113(1).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

B. The Parties' Arguments in the District Court

¶357 Before trial, President Trump moved to dismiss the Electors' complaint. He argued that the court's authority to determine a claim under section 1-4-1204(4) is limited to the three criteria explicitly identified in section 1-4-1204(1)(b) and (c), which provide that the only candidates whose names shall be placed on the ballots for election are those who:

> (b) Are seeking the nomination for president of a political party as a bona fide candidate for president of the United States pursuant to political party rules and are affiliated with a major political party that received at least twenty percent of the votes cast by eligible electors in Colorado at the last presidential election; and
>
> (c) Have submitted to the secretary, not later than eighty-five days before the date of the presidential primary election, a notarized candidate's statement of intent together with either a nonrefundable filing fee of five hundred dollars or a petition signed by at least five thousand eligible electors affiliated with the candidate's political party who reside in the state. Candidate petitions must meet the requirements of parts 8 and 9 of this article 4, as applicable.

¶358 President Trump acknowledged that the Secretary's "Major Candidates Statement of Intent" form requires a candidate to affirm that they meet the three qualifications set forth in Article II of the U.S. Constitution,[2] but emphasized that the form says nothing about Section Three. Thus, he urged the court to adopt a very narrow reading of section 1-4-1204(4): So long as a party candidate (1) is a bona fide presidential candidate; (2) timely submits a notarized statement of intent affirming that they meet the three Article II qualifications; and (3) pays the $500 fee, the Secretary must certify the candidate to the presidential primary ballot, thus fulfilling her duty under the Election Code.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶359 Challenges based on anything other than those three criteria, including but not limited to a Section Three challenge, President Trump asserted in his motion, fall outside the court's authority to decide and fail to state a proper claim for relief under sections 1-4-1204(4) and 1-1-113. Any such claim, he posited, must be dismissed.

¶360 The Electors countered in their response to the motion to dismiss that section 1-4-1204(4) must be read in conjunction with the other provisions of the Election Code, including, specifically, section 1-4-1201, C.R.S. (2023), which states

---

[2] Article II, Section 1, Clause 5 of the U.S. Constitution states:

> No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

that "it is the intent of the People of the State of Colorado that the provisions of this part 12 conform to the requirements of federal law and national political party rules governing presidential primary elections . . . ." § 1-4-1201 (emphasis added).

¶361 The Electors also pointed to section 1-4-1203(2)(a), C.R.S. (2023), which states:

> Except as provided for in subsection (5) of this section, each political party that has a qualified candidate entitled to participate in the presidential primary election pursuant to this section is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election. At the presidential primary election, an elector that is affiliated with a political party may vote only for a candidate of that political party.

(Emphasis added.) And they leaned on section 1-4-1203(3), which provides, in part, that the Secretary and county clerk and recorders have "the same powers and shall perform the same duties for presidential primary elections as they provide by law for other primary elections and general elections." Based on this section, they argued that, in all "other primary elections and general elections," only candidates who meet all the qualifications to hold office may access the ballot. Finally, the Electors emphasized the text of section 1-4-1204(4), which allows for "[a]ny challenge to the listing of any candidate" and directs the district court to assess the validity of "all alleged improprieties." (Emphases added.) In the Electors' view, part 12 of the Election Code, when read as a whole, necessarily encompasses challenges under Section Three.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

C. The District Court's Final Order

¶362 In its final order, the district court rejected President Trump's argument in his motion to dismiss that the Electors failed to state a proper claim under sections 1-4-1204(4) and 1-1-113. Anderson v. Griswold, No. 23CV32577, ¶ 224 (Dist. Ct., City & Cnty. of Denver, Nov. 17, 2023). It concluded that the Secretary lacked the authority under the Election Code to investigate and determine presidential primary candidate qualifications. Id. at ¶ 216. It then turned to whether it had the authority to adjudicate the Electors' complaint. Id. at ¶ 217. The court considered three cases in which this court concluded that the Election Code requires courts—not election officials—to determine candidate eligibility. Id. at ¶¶ 219–21; see Hanlen v. Gessler, 2014 CO 24, ¶ 40, 333 P.3d 41, 50 (holding that the Secretary exceeded his authority by passing a rule that permitted election officials to determine whether a candidate appearing on the state ballot was not qualified for office because "the election code requires a court, not an election official, to determine the issue of eligibility"); Carson v. Reiner, 2016 CO 38, ¶ 8, 370 P.3d 1137, 1139 ("[W]hen read as a whole, the statutory scheme evidences an intent that challenges to the qualifications of a candidate be resolved only by the courts . . . ."); Kuhn v. Williams, 2018 CO 30M, ¶ 40, 418 P.3d 478, 485 (per curiam) (a court may review the validity of a challenged candidate-nomination petition and consider extrinsic evidence in doing so). The district court found particularly instructive this court's conclusion in Kuhn that a challenger could "present evidence demonstrating that a petition actually fails to comply with the Election Code, even if it 'appear[ed] to be sufficient' in a paper review." ¶ 39, 418 P.3d at 485; Anderson, ¶ 219.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶363 The court then interpreted two provisions of the Election Code to implicitly incorporate Section Three, which it concluded grants courts broad authority to review, through section 1-1-113's expedited procedures, whether a candidate is disqualified as an insurrectionist. Anderson, ¶¶ 222, 224. Specifically, the court interpreted the language in section 1-4-1201 stating that the provisions of part 12 of the Election Code are intended to "conform to the requirements of federal law" as incorporating the entire U.S. Constitution, including Section Three. Anderson, ¶ 222. And the court noted that section 1-4-1203(2)(a) provides that only political parties that have a "qualified candidate" are entitled to participate in the presidential primary process. Anderson, ¶ 222. Relying on these provisions, the court held that, while the Secretary is not empowered to investigate and adjudicate a candidate's potential disability under Section Three, courts are not so constrained. Id. at ¶ 224.

D. The Majority's Opinion

¶364 The majority also appears to construe part 12 very broadly. In sum, its view is that section 1-4-1201's reference to "federal law" speaks to the General

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Assembly's intent, that section 1-4-1203(2)(a) limits participation in the presidential primary to "qualified" candidates, and that certification of a candidate who is not "qualified" thus constitutes a "wrongful act" within the scope of section 1-1-113. Maj. op. ¶¶ 36–37, 62–64. The majority draws on other provisions of the Election Code to inform the meaning of the term "qualified candidate." Id. at ¶¶ 37, 62 (citing § 1-4-1205, C.R.S. (2023) (requiring presidential primary write-in candidates to file a "notarized . . . statement of intent"); § 1-4-1101(1), C.R.S. (2023) (a write-in candidate's "affidavit of intent" must affirm that the candidate "desires the office and is qualified to assume its duties if elected"); § 1-4-1203(5) (when every party has no more than one certified candidate, whether party-nominated or write-in, the Secretary may cancel the presidential primary for all parties and declare the sole candidate the winner)). According to the majority, these provisions suggest that major party candidates—who are also required to submit a statement of intent—must also be "qualified to assume [the office's] duties if elected." Id. at ¶ 62; see § 1-4-1101(1).

¶365 Read as a whole, the majority thus interprets the Election Code to provide that a major party candidate in a presidential primary must, at a minimum, be qualified to hold the Office of President under the U.S. Constitution. Maj. op. ¶ 63. As such, it concludes that the General Assembly, through the Election Code, granted courts broad authority to determine presidential primary candidates' constitutional eligibility, including eligibility under Section Three. Id. at ¶¶ 60–62, 65–66. In the majority's view, a reading of the Election Code that constrains courts from considering a candidate's constitutional qualifications would produce a result "contrary to the purpose of the Election Code." Id. at ¶ 64.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

III. The Electors Failed to State a Cognizable Claim for Relief

¶366 Sections 1-4-1204(4) and 1-1-113 frame the threshold question this court must address before turning to the merits of the parties' appeal: Did the General Assembly intend to grant Colorado courts the authority to decide Section Three challenges? Based on my reading of sections 1-4-1204(4), 1-4-1201, and 1-4-1203(2)(a), I conclude that the answer to this question is no. As a result, I conclude that the Electors have not stated a cognizable claim for relief and their complaint should have been dismissed.

A. Section 1-4-1204(4) Allows for a Broad, but Not Unlimited, Range of Claims for Relief

¶367 As an initial matter, I acknowledge that the language in section 1-4-1204(4) is fairly broad insofar as it allows expedited challenges to the listing of any candidate on the presidential primary election ballot based on "alleged improprieties." And I agree with the majority that "section 1-1-113 'clearly comprehends challenges to a broad range of wrongful acts committed by officials charged with duties under the code,'" Maj. op. ¶ 61 (quoting Carson, ¶ 17, 370 P.3d at 1141), "including any act that is 'inconsistent with the Election Code,'" id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

(quoting Frazier v. Williams, 2017 CO 85, ¶ 16, 401 P.3d 541, 545). I also agree with the majority that a "wrongful act" is "more expansive than a 'breach' or 'neglect of duty.'" Id. (quoting Frazier, ¶ 16, 401 P.3d at 545).

¶368 But this language can only do so much. As we also held in Frazier, "other wrongful act" is limited to acts that are wrongful under the Election Code. ¶ 16, 401 P.3d at 545. We have also emphasized that section 1-1-113 is a summary proceeding designed to quickly resolve challenges brought by designated plaintiffs against state election officials prior to election day. Id. Indeed, past cases decided by this court reflect the generally straightforward nature of the cases filed under section 1-1-113, the lion's share of which involved disputes over state or local election residency or signature requirements. See, e.g., Griswold v. Ferrigno Warren, 2020 CO 34, ¶ 15, 462 P.3d 1081, 1084 (deciding whether the Election Code's minimum signature requirement mandates substantial compliance and whether a U.S. Senate candidate satisfied that standard); Kuhn, ¶¶ 1–6, 418 P.3d at 480–81 (deciding whether a non-resident signature circulator could legally collect signatures for a candidate's petition); Frazier, ¶ 1, 401 P.3d at 542 (considering whether the Secretary improperly invalidated signatures included on a U.S. Senate candidate's petition to appear on the primary election ballot); Carson, ¶ 21, 370 P.3d at 1142 (considering whether a challenge to a candidate's qualifications based on their residency was permitted after the Secretary certified the candidate to the ballot).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶369 Don't get me wrong, the almost 450 entries in the district court register of actions in the two months and eleven days between September 6, 2023, the date on which the petition was filed, and November 17, 2023, the date on which the district court issued its 102-page final order, illustrate the extraordinary effort that the attorneys and the district court dedicated to this case. But that effort also proves too much. The deadlines under the statute were not met, nor could they have been. Setting aside the factual questions, an insurrection challenge is necessarily going to involve complex legal questions of the type that no district court—no matter how hard working—could resolve in a summary proceeding.

¶370 And that's to say nothing of the appellate deadline. Three days to appeal a district court's order regarding a challenge to a candidate's age? Sure. But a challenge to whether a former President engaged in insurrection by inciting a mob to breach the Capitol and prevent the peaceful transfer of power? I am not convinced this is what the General Assembly had in mind.

¶371 The various provisions of the Election Code on which the district court and the majority rely to suggest otherwise do not persuade me either.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

B. The Term "Federal Law" Does Not Support a Broad Grant of Authority to Colorado Courts to Enforce Section Three ¶372 The district court relied on the declaration of intent in part 12. Anderson, ¶ 222. It explains the intent of the People of the State of Colorado in the context of presidential primary elections. It provides: "In recreating and reenacting this part 12, it is the intent of the People of the State of Colorado that the provisions of this part 12 conform to the requirements of federal law and national political party rules governing presidential primary elections . . . ." § 1-4-1201 (emphasis added).[3] In adopting a broad view of section 1-4-1204(4)'s reach, the court assumed that the term "federal law," as used in this section, refers to the entire U.S. Constitution, including Section Three. Anderson, ¶¶ 222–24.

¶373 The majority also leans on this reference to "federal law" in section 1-4-1201, though more obliquely, suggesting it means the General Assembly intended for part 12 to operate "in harmony" with federal law. Maj. op. ¶ 36. I am not persuaded.

---

[3] As Professor Muller notes in his amicus brief, "A postpositive modifier like ['governing presidential primary elections'] attaches to both 'federal law' and 'national political party rules.'" Brief for Professor Derek T. Muller as Amicus Curiae Supporting Neither Party. Hence, the term "federal law" is properly understood not as a standalone term but as only relating to presidential primary elections.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶374 In my view, the term "federal law" is ambiguous at best. A brief dive into the history of part 12 explains why. See McCoy v. People, 2019 CO 44, ¶ 38, 442 P.3d 379, 389 ("If, however, the statute is ambiguous, then we may consider other aids to statutory construction, including the consequences of a given construction, the end to be achieved by the statute, and the statute's legislative history.").

¶375 Part 12 was enacted as part of the return to a primary system in Colorado. See § 1-4-1102, C.R.S. (1990) (governing Colorado's presidential primary system in the 1990s). From 2002 to 2016, presidential candidates were selected through a closed party caucus system. But in 2016, after "Colorado voters experienced disenfranchisement and profound disappointment with the state's [caucus] system," voters considered Proposition 107, which promised to restore presidential primary elections in Colorado, with one significant change—unlike prior iterations of its primary system, beginning in 2020, Colorado would host open presidential primaries, allowing unaffiliated voters to participate in these primary elections. See Proposition 107, § 1, https:// www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/ elections/Initiatives/titleBoard/filings/2015-2016/140Final.pdf [https:// perma.cc/2GA9-ZY7U] (noting that "restor[ing] [Colorado's] presidential primary" to an open primary system would enable the "35% of Colorado voters who are independent of a party" to "participat[e] in the presidential nomination process," and "encourage candidates who are responsive to the viewpoints of more Coloradans").

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶376 When Proposition 107 passed, the General Assembly amended the Election Code and adopted part 12 to formally re-introduce the presidential primary process. Nothing in this history indicates that one of the concerns animating either the proponents of Proposition 107 or the General Assembly was a need to challenge, through the courts, issues concerning candidates' constitutional disqualifications. In fact, the language in the current version of section 1-4-1201 mostly mirrors the 1990 version of part 12 (then, part 11): "It is the intent of the general assembly that the provisions of this part 11 conform to the requirements of federal law and national political parties for presidential primary elections." § 1-4-1104(3), C.R.S. (1990) (emphasis added).

¶377 There is some history surrounding Proposition 107 and part 12 which suggests that proponents of this new open presidential primary system were concerned about one specific constitutional issue: a potential First Amendment challenge to the new law based on political parties' private right of association. See Independent Voters, Denver Metro Chamber of Com., https://denverchamber.org/policy/policy-independent-voters-white-paper/ [https://perma.cc/T2TT-A2UD] (The Denver Chamber of Commerce, which launched Proposition 107, noted that a semi-open primary system, because it would permit unaffiliated voters to affiliate with the Republican or Democratic parties in a presidential primary, could face legal challenges based on parties' First Amendment rights of association.); see also Christopher Jackson, Colorado Election Law Update, 46-SEP Colo. Law. 52, 53 (2017) (noting that the law was likely crafted in a manner designed to "stave off a First Amendment challenge" given the U.S. Supreme Court's 2000 decision in California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567 (2000), which struck down California's "blanket primary" law).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶378 Curiously, the earlier version of the statute required the Secretary to provide a "written report" to the General Assembly "concerning whether the provisions of this part 11 conform to the requirements of federal law and national political party rules for presidential primary elections[,]" and provided that "the general assembly shall make such reasonable changes to this part 11 as are necessary to conform to federal law and national political parties' rules." § 1-4-1104(3), C.R.S. (1990). It is unclear if those reports were intended to speak to potential First Amendment concerns or some other issue, as any reports that may have been submitted to the General Assembly appear to have been lost to the sands of time (or, according to the State Archivist's Office, possibly a flood).

¶379 At bottom, this legislative history does little to illuminate what the 2016 General Assembly meant by this language in section 1-4-1201. What this history does show, however, is that the term "federal law" is most certainly not an affirmative grant of authority to state courts to enforce Section Three in expedited proceedings under the Election Code.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

C. The Term "Qualified Candidate" Does Not Support a Broad Grant of Authority to Colorado Courts

¶380 The other principal support for the district court's broad interpretation of section 1-4-1204(4) rests on the term "qualified candidate." The majority relies heavily on this language as well. Maj. op. ¶¶ 37, 62–64.

¶381 To understand the meaning of this term, it is critical to consider it in its full context. Recall, it states:

> Except as provided for in subsection (5) of this section, each political party that has a qualified candidate entitled to participate in the presidential primary election pursuant to this section is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election. At the presidential primary election, an elector that is affiliated with a political party may vote only for a candidate of that political party.

§ 1-4-1203(2)(a) (emphases added).

¶382 The district court construed this section expansively. It looked to the term "qualified candidate" as evidence of the General Assembly's intent to grant the court authority to determine if President Trump was disqualified under Section Three. The district court, like the Electors, appears to have read section 1-4-1203(2)(a) like a syllogism, such that if (1) participation in the presidential primary is limited to qualified candidates, and if (2) Section Three disqualifies insurrectionists, then (3) a court may appropriately consider a

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section Three challenge. But that is not what the statute says. Rather, it provides: "[E]ach political party that has a qualified candidate entitled to participate in the presidential primary election pursuant to this section is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election." Id. (emphases added).

¶383 Section 1-4-1203(2)(a) addresses when and how presidential primary elections are conducted. It does not prescribe additional qualifications through its use of the term "qualified candidate." See People ex rel. Rein v. Meagher, 2020 CO 56, ¶ 22, 465 P.3d 554, 560 ("[W]e do not add words to or subtract words from a statute."). Nor can it be read, given the fact that the term is explicitly tethered to subsection 1203, as expanding the criteria outlined in section 1-4-1204(1)(b) and (c): A candidate is eligible to be certified to the ballot by (1) being a bona fide candidate for president; (2) submitting a notarized candidate's statement of intent, and (3) paying the $500 filing fee or submitting a valid write-in petition. See § 1-4-1204(1)(b), (c).

¶384 It is significant, as well, that this part of the statute describes when a political party can participate in a presidential primary election. The consequence for a party that does not have a qualified candidate—that is, a candidate who does not meet the three-part criteria laid out in section 1-4-1204(1)(b) and (c)—is that the party cannot participate in the primary. Considered in context, then, the term

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"qualified candidate" does not offer support for an expansive reading of the court's authority to determine a challenge under Section Three.

¶385 The majority takes a slightly different approach. It points to section 1-4-1201's "federal law" declaration and suggests it means that the General Assembly intended part 12 to operate "in harmony" with federal law. Maj. op. ¶ 36. Then, like the district court, it gives great weight to the language in section 1-4-1203(2)(a), which it construes to mean that participation in the presidential primary is limited to "qualified candidates." Id. at ¶¶ 37, 62–64. It effectively reads "pursuant to this section" out of the statute by concluding that the phrase "sheds no light on the meaning of 'qualified candidate.'" Id. at ¶ 37 n.3 (quoting § 1-4-1203(2)(a)). The majority then asserts that, "[a]s a practical matter, the mechanism through which a presidential primary hopeful attests that he or she is a 'qualified candidate' is the 'statement of intent' (or 'affidavit of intent') filed with the Secretary." Id. at ¶ 37 (quoting § 1-4-1204(1)(c)).

¶386 And, it explains, the Secretary's statement of intent for a major party presidential candidate requires the candidate to affirm via checkboxes that the candidate meets the qualifications set forth in Article II of the U.S. Constitution for the Office of President, i.e., that the candidate is at least thirty-five years old, has been a resident of the United States for at least fourteen years, and is a natural-born U.S. citizen. Id. at ¶ 38; U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5; Major Party Candidate

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Statement of Intent for Presidential Primary, Colo. Sec'y of State, https://www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/elections/Candidates/files/MajorPartyCandidateStatementOfIntentForPresidentialPrimary.pdf [https://perma.cc/RY72-ASSD]. As well, the form requires the candidate to sign an affirmation that states: "I intend to run for the office stated above and solemnly affirm that I meet all qualifications for the office prescribed by law." Major Party Candidate Statement of Intent for Presidential Primary, supra.

¶387 The majority stitches these various parts of the Election Code together to conclude the General Assembly intended to grant state courts the authority to decide Section Three challenges. Maj. op. ¶¶ 36–38, 62. This approach falls short for five reasons.

¶388 First, there is nothing in section 1-4-1201's "federal law" declaration that indicates the General Assembly meant to refer to Section Three. Perhaps the declaration refers to the General Assembly's concern regarding a potential First Amendment right of association challenge to the open primary system created by part 12, perhaps not. The declaration's history is muddy at best.

¶389 Second, the term "qualified candidate" cannot be fairly read to grant Colorado courts authority to adjudicate Section Three disqualification claims. The term is best understood as describing when a political party can participate in the presidential primary process, not as the foundation for a wrongful act claim under section 1-4-1204(4) and section 1-1-113.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶390 Third, even assuming the General Assembly intended to grant some authority to the courts through its reference to the candidate's statement of intent in the exceptionally roundabout manner suggested by the majority, there is no basis for concluding that authority extends beyond the fairly basic types of Article II challenges that have come before this court in the past, such as those involving a candidate's age, or other challenges like those alleging that petition circulators did not reside in Colorado.

¶391 Fourth, I am not persuaded by the majority's reliance on sections 1-4-1205 and 1-4-1101, which govern the requirements write-in candidates must satisfy before being certified to the ballot. See Maj. op. ¶¶ 37, 62. Like major party presidential primary candidates, write-in candidates for the presidential primary must file a "notarized . . . statement of intent" and submit to the Secretary "a nonrefundable fee of five hundred dollars . . . no later than the close of business on the sixty-seventh day before the presidential primary election." § 1-4-1205. Section 1-4-1101(1), which applies to all write-in candidates regardless of office, requires that the write-in candidate confirm "that he or she desires the office and is qualified to assume its duties if elected." (Emphasis added.) According to the majority, "[t]he Election Code's explicit requirement that a write-in candidate be

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

'qualified' to assume the duties of their intended office logically implies that major party candidates under 1-4-1204(1)(b) must be 'qualified' in the same manner." Maj. op. ¶ 62.

¶392 It is true that both major party candidates and write-in candidates must fill out statement of intent forms, and that the forms are similar in some respects. But, if anything, the General Assembly's decision to include a specific qualification provision for write-in candidates shows that when it wants to include an explicit qualifications requirement, like the one in section 1-4-1101(1), it knows how to do so. See People v. Diaz, 2015 CO 28, ¶ 15, 347 P.3d 621, 625 ("But, in interpreting a statute, we must accept the General Assembly's choice of language and not add or imply words that simply are not there." (quoting People v. Benavidez, 222 P.3d 391, 393–94 (Colo. App. 2009))).

¶393 Fifth and finally, there is the problem that Section Three is a disqualification for office, not a qualification to serve. As the majority acknowledges, the U.S. Supreme Court has twice declined to address whether Section Three—which is described in the text as a "disability" and is referred to as the Disqualification Clause—amounts to a qualification for office. Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 520 n.41 (1969) (observing that an academic suggested in a law review article in 1968 that the three grounds for disqualification (impeachment, Section Three, and the Congressional incompatibility clause) and two other similar provisions were each no less of a "qualification" than the Article II, Section 5 qualifications); U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 787 n.2 (1995) (seeing "no need to resolve" the same question regarding Section Three in a case concerning the propriety of additional qualifications for office); Maj. op. ¶ 65.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶394 Given the fact that the U.S. Supreme Court has not weighed in on whether Section Three is a qualification for office, it seems all the more important to look for some affirmative expression by the General Assembly of its intent to grant state courts the authority to consider Section Three challenges through Colorado's summary hearing and appeal process under the Election Code. I see no such expression.

IV. Conclusion

¶395 The Electors' arguments below and before this court are, to my mind, unavailing. Too much of their position rests on text like "federal law" and "qualified candidate" that—on closer examination—does not appear to mean what they say it means because it is taken out of context. In short, these sections do not show an affirmative grant by the General Assembly to state courts to decide Section Three cases through Colorado's summary election challenge process.

¶396 Because it too relied on the provisions of part 12 regarding "federal law" and "qualified candidate," the district court's reasoning suffers from the same shortcomings.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶397 And, at the end of the day, while the majority's approach charts a new course—one not entirely presented by the parties—its approach has many of the same problems. It stitches together support from the Secretary's general authority to supervise the conduct of primary and other elections, § 1-1-107(1), C.R.S. (2023); the inference that section 1-4-1201's "federal law" declaration means something pertinent to Section Three; part, but not all, of the "qualified candidate" statute, § 1-4-1203(2)(a); inferences from the write-in candidate process statute, § 1-4-1101(1); and the novel suggestion that the General Assembly granted authority to state courts to adjudicate a Section Three challenge by virtue of its reference to the Secretary's statement of intent form in section 1-4-1204(1)(c). See Maj. op. ¶¶ 35–37, 62–63.

¶398 I agree with the majority that, if the General Assembly wants to grant state courts the authority to adjudicate Section Three challenges through the Election Code, it can do so. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 2 (authorizing states to appoint presidential electors "in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct"); see also Hassan v. Colorado, 495 F. App'x 947, 948 (10th Cir. 2012) (recognizing that it is "a state's legitimate interest in protecting the integrity and practical functioning of the political process" that "permits it to exclude from the ballot candidates who are constitutionally prohibited from assuming office"). I just think it needs to say so.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

From: Jonathan Williams [jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Sent: 12/20/2023 6:32:18 PM
To: Hammoud, Fadwa (AG) [HammoudF1@michigan.gov]; Aboona, Rebecca (AG) [AboonaR1@michigan.gov]; Banghart-Linn, Linus (AG) [Banghart-LinnL@michigan.gov]; Meingast, Heather (AG) [MeingastH@michigan.gov]; King-Piepenbrok, Pier (AG) [KingP1@michigan.gov]
CC: Christine Sun [christine@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Robert Cotter [Robert@statesuniteddemocracy.org]; Zack Goldberg [zack@statesuniteddemocracy.org]
Subject: Re: Colorado Trump Decision--Privileged
Attachments: Anderson v. Griswold Opinion (Co. Supreme Court) 12.19[53].pdf

CAUTION: This is an External email. Please send suspicious emails to abuse@michigan.gov

Good afternoon,

As we noted yesterday evening, the Colorado Supreme Court (by a 4-3 vote) yesterday held that former President Trump is disqualified from holding the office of the President under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment ("14.3") because he engaged in an insurrection on January 6, 2021. The court determined that because Trump is disqualified, the Secretary of State in Colorado cannot place him on the primary ballot, pursuant to the state's Election Code.

The order of the court is stayed until January 4, 2024 to allow the parties to seek review in the U.S. Supreme Court prior to the Secretary's deadline to certify the presidential primary ballot (on January 5). If a party seeks review in the U.S. Supreme Court before the stay expires, the stay will remain in place "and the Secretary will continue to be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot, until the receipt of any order or mandate from the Supreme Court." (9).

Below is a summary of the court's holdings on questions of state law, the construction of 14.3, and an evidentiary issue arising at trial. We've also included brief summaries on the dissents. The opinion is attached again here for convenience.

We'll have more on next steps soon. As always, please reach out if you have questions or need anything from us.

Summary of Anderson v. Griswold (Colorado Supreme Court)

- State Election Law and the State's Authority re: Ballot Access (pp. 17-49)
  - Under Colorado law, courts have authority to "assess presidential qualifications."
  - Pursuant to the Colorado Election Code, electors can raise challenges in district court alleging that a person with a duty under the code has committed or is about to commit a breach of duty or other "wrongful act." Certifying an unqualified candidate constitutes a "wrongful act" under the Election Code.
  - The U.S. Constitution authorizes states to assess presidential qualifications of candidates. This is through the Electors Clause and the state's plenary power.
  - Limiting the ballot to constitutionally qualified candidates does not interfere with the Colorado Republican party's associational rights and the state statutes at issue provide sufficient due process to candidates.
- 14.3 Construction
  - 14.3 is "self executing" (pp. 49-51)
    - Based on 14.3's plain language and Supreme Court cases addressing other Reconstruction Amendments, the disqualification provision attaches without congressional action.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

- The court notes that holding otherwise would lead to absurd results: If any of the Reconstruction Amendments required additional legislation Congress could "nullify" them, simply by failing to pass such legislation. This would mean, among other things, that slavery would remain legal.

- 14.3 encompasses the Presidency and someone who has taken an oath as President (69-88)
  - The presidency falls "comfortably" under definitions of "office" at the time of the Fourteenth Amendment's ratification.
  - The Constitution refers to Presidency as "an office" 25 times.
  - The court doesn't place much weight on the fact that the presidency isn't explicitly mentioned in 14.3, noting this is likely because the presidency is so clearly encompassed.
  - "A construction of Section Three that would nevertheless allow a former President who broke his oath, not only to participate in the government again but to run for and hold the highest office in the land, is flatly unfaithful to the Section's purpose." (84)
  - The presidential oath is an oath to support the Constitution:
    - "[A] commitment to 'preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution'—is consistent with the plain meaning of the word 'support.'" (86)
- Trump "engaged" in an "insurrection"(pp. 96-116)
  - The district court did not clearly err in concluding that Trump "engaged in" the "insurrection" on January 6.
  - For purposes of Section Three, the court held that "insurrection" "would encompass a concerted and public use of force or threat of force by a group of people to hinder or prevent the U.S. government from taking the actions necessary to accomplish a peaceful transfer of power in this country." (99)
    - Substantial evidence at trial showed January 6 falls under this definition
  - The court held that "engaged in" requires "an overt and voluntary act, done with the intent of aiding or furthering the common unlawful purpose." (105)
    - The court held that based on substantial evidence, Trump engaged in insurrection: "President Trump's direct and express efforts, over several months, exhorting his supporters to march to the Capitol to prevent what he falsely characterized as an alleged fraud on the people of this country were indisputably overt and voluntary. Moreover, the evidence amply showed that President Trump undertook all these actions to aid and further a common unlawful purpose that he himself conceived and set in motion: prevent Congress from certifying the 2020 presidential election and stop the peaceful transfer of power." (115)
- Political Question: Judicial review is not precluded by the political question doctrine (pp. 61-68)
  - The court finds no constitutional provision that reflects a "textually demonstrable" commitment to Congress of the authority to determine presidential qualification.
  - Section Three involves "judicially discoverable and manageable standards"
    - Here the court notes its disagreement with the Michigan Court of Claims: "In our view, declining to decide an issue simply because it requires us to address difficult and weighty questions of constitutional interpretation would create a slippery slope that could lead to a prohibited dereliction of our constitutional duty to adjudicate cases that are properly before us." (69)
- First Amendment: Trump's Speech on January 6 is not protected by the First Amendment (pp. 116-133)
  - Pursuant to Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 447 (1969), Trump's speech was unprotected under the First Amendment because it incited lawless action.
- Admission of the January 6th Report at Trial: The trial court did not err by admitting the January 6th Report at trial (88-95)
  - The report follows under the following hearsay exception recognized under Colorado rules of evidence: "reports . . . of public offices or agencies, setting forth . . . factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

- The court agreed with the trial court's finding that the report was "trustworthy" as required for the hearsay exception.

Dissents

- Justice Boatright's dissent is based on the Colorado Election Code. According to Justice Boatright, the issues presented "reach a magnitude of complexity not contemplated by the Colorado General Assembly for its election code enforcement statute." (11)
- Justice Samour found that the expedited procedures under the Colorado Election Code did not provide Trump with adequate due process and that Section Three is not self-executing.
- Justice Berkenkotter would hold that the Election Code doesn't authorize Colorado courts to determine disqualification under 14.3: there is no "affirmative grant by the General Assembly to state courts to decide Section Three cases through Colorado's summary election challenge process." (24)

From: Jonathan Williams <jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org>
Date: Tuesday, December 19, 2023 at 8:32 PM
To: Hammoud, Fadwa (AG) <HammoudF1@michigan.gov>, Banghart-Linn, Linus (AG) <Banghart-LinnL@michigan.gov>, Aboona, Rebecca (AG) <AboonaR1@michigan.gov>, Heather Meingast <meingasth@michigan.gov>, Pier King Piepenbrok <KingP1@michigan.gov>
Subject: Colorado Trump Decision--Privileged

All:

You may have seen that the Colorado Supreme Court just held that Trump is disqualified from the office of the President under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment. The decision is attached here.

The court stayed the decision until January 4, 2024 contemplating review in the US Supreme Court:

"Therefore, to maintain the status quo pending any review by the U.S. Supreme Court, we stay our ruling until January 4, 2024 (the day before the Secretary's deadline to certify the content of the presidential primary ballot). If review is sought in the Supreme Court before the stay expires on January 4, 2024, then the stay shall remain in place, and the Secretary will continue to be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot, until the receipt of any order or mandate from the Supreme Court. "

We'll send a summary of the decision tomorrow.

Best,

Jonathan

Jonathan L. Williams | Senior Counsel
States United Democracy Center
(704) 578-4725 | @statesunited
jonathan@statesuniteddemocracy.org

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Opinions of the Colorado Supreme Court are available to the public and can be accessed through the Judicial Branch's homepage at http://www.courts.state.co.us. Opinions are also posted on the Colorado Bar Association's homepage at http://www.cobar.org.

ADVANCE SHEET HEADNOTE
December 19, 2023

2023 CO 63

No. 23SA300, Anderson v. Griswold—Election Law—Fourteenth Amendment—First Amendment—Political Questions—Hearsay.

In this appeal from a district court proceeding under the Colorado Election Code, the supreme court considers whether former President Donald J. Trump may appear on the Colorado Republican presidential primary ballot in 2024. A majority of the court holds that President Trump is disqualified from holding the office of President under Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Because he is disqualified, it would be a wrongful act under the Election Code for the Colorado Secretary of State to list him as a candidate on the presidential primary ballot. The court stays its ruling until January 4, 2024, subject to any further appellate proceedings.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

The Supreme Court of the State of Colorado
2 East 14th Avenue • Denver, Colorado 80203

2023 CO 63

Supreme Court Case No. 23SA300
Appeal Pursuant to § 1-1-113(3), C.R.S. (2023)
District Court, City and County of Denver, Case No. 23CV32577
Honorable Sarah B. Wallace, Judge

Petitioners-Appellants/Cross-Appellees:

Norma Anderson, Michelle Priola, Claudine Cmarada, Krista Kafer, Kathi Wright, and Christopher Castilian,

v.

Respondent-Appellee:

Jena Griswold, in her official capacity as Colorado Secretary of State,

and

Intervenor-Appellee:

Colorado Republican State Central Committee, an unincorporated association,

Intervenor-Appellee/Cross-Appellant:

Donald J. Trump.

Order Affirmed in Part and Reversed in Part en banc
December 19, 2023

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Attorneys for Petitioners-Appellants/Cross-Appellees:
KBN Law, LLC
Mario Nicolais
Lakewood, Colorado

Tierney Lawrence Stiles LLC
Martha M. Tierney
Denver, Colorado

Olson Grimsley Kawanabe Hinchcliff & Murray LLC
Eric Olson
Sean Grimsley
Jason Murray
Denver, Colorado

Donald Sherman
Nikhel Sus
Jonathan Maier
Washington, District of Columbia

Attorneys for Respondent-Appellee:
Philip J. Weiser, Attorney General
Michael Kotlarczyk, Senior Assistant Attorney General
Jennifer L. Sullivan, Deputy Attorney General
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Intervenor-Appellee Colorado Republican State Central Committee:
Melito Law LLC
Michael Melito
Denver, Colorado

Podoll & Podoll, P.C.
Robert A. Kitsmiller
Greenwood Village, Colorado

Attorneys for Intervenor-Appellee/Cross-Appellant Donald J. Trump:
Gessler Blue LLC
Scott E. Gessler
Geoffrey N. Blue
Greenwood Village, Colorado

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Floyd Abrams, Bruce Ackerman, Maryam Ahranjani, Lee C. Bollinger, Erwin Chemerinsky, Alan Chen, Kent Greenfield, Martha Minow, and Geoffrey R. Stone:
Keker Van Nest & Peters LLP
Steven A. Hirsch
San Francisco, California

Rathod Mohamedbhai LLC
Edward C. Hopkins Jr.
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Professors Carol Anderson and Ian Farrell:
Ballard Spahr LLP
Matthew A. Morr
Denver, Colorado

Ballard Spahr LLP
Burt M. Rublin
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Colorado Common Cause and Mary Estill Buchanan:
Rosenblatt, Gosch & Reinken, PLLC
William R. Reinken
Greenwood Village, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Constitutional Accountability Center:
Ernst Legal Group, LLC
Dan Ernst
Denver, Colorado

Amicus Curiae Treniss Jewell Evans III, pro se
Forney, Texas

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Free Speech for People:
Martinez Law Colorado, LLC
Anna N. Martinez
Denver, Colorado

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Martinez Law, LLC
Esteban A. Martinez
Longmont, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Mark A. Graber:
The Paul Wilkinson Law Firm LLC
Nelson Boyle
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Kansas Republican Party, Delaware Republican Party, Michigan Republican Party, North Dakota Republican Party, Oklahoma Republican Party, West Virginia Republican Party, Wisconsin Republican Party, Wyoming Republican Party, Delaware Republican Party, Georgia Republican Party, Nebraska Republican Party, Maine Republican Party, Idaho Republican Party, and Rhode Island Republican Party:
McGowne Law Offices, P.A.
Christopher J. McGowne
Hays, Kansas

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Kurt T. Lash:
Illingworth Law, LLC
David W. Illingworth II
Woodland Park, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Derek T. Muller:
Covenant Law PLLC
Ian Speir
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Republican National Committee, National Republican Senatorial Committee, and National Republican Congressional Committee:
Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck, LLP
Christopher O. Murray
Julian R. Ellis, Jr.
Denver, Colorado

Attorneys for Amici Curiae States of Indiana, West Virginia, Alabama, Alaska, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming:
Office of the Attorney General
James A. Barta, Solicitor General
Indianapolis, Indiana

Office of the Attorney General
Michael R. Williams, Principal Deputy Solicitor General
Charleston, West Virginia

Nussbaum Gleason
Andrew Nussbaum
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae Professor Seth Barrett Tillman:
The Reisch Law Firm, LLC
R. Scott Reisch
Jessica L. Hays
Denver, Colorado

Josh Blackman LLC
Josh Blackman
Houston, Texas

Attorneys for Amici Curiae Wyoming Secretary of State Chuck Gray, Missouri Secretary of State Jay Ashcroft, and Ohio Secretary of State Frank LaRose:
West Group Law & Policy
Suzanne M. Taheri
Denver, Colorado

PER CURIAM.
CHIEF JUSTICE BOATRIGHT dissented.
JUSTICE SAMOUR dissented.
JUSTICE BERKENKOTTER dissented.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

PER CURIAM.[1]

¶1 More than three months ago, a group of Colorado electors eligible to vote in the Republican presidential primary—both registered Republican and unaffiliated voters ("the Electors")—filed a lengthy petition in the District Court for the City and County of Denver ("Denver District Court" or "the district court"), asking the court to rule that former President Donald J. Trump ("President Trump") may not appear on the Colorado Republican presidential primary ballot.

¶2 Invoking provisions of Colorado's Uniform Election Code of 1992, §§ 1-1-101 to 1-13-804, C.R.S. (2023) (the "Election Code"), the Electors requested that the district court prohibit Jena Griswold, in her official capacity as Colorado's Secretary of State ("the Secretary"), from placing President Trump's name on the presidential primary ballot. They claimed that Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution ("Section Three") disqualified President Trump from seeking the presidency. More specifically, they asserted that he was ineligible under Section Three because he engaged in insurrection on January 6, 2021, after swearing an oath as President to support the U.S. Constitution.

---

[1] Consistent with past practice in election-related cases with accelerated timelines, we issue this opinion per curiam. E.g., Kuhn v. Williams, 2018 CO 30M, 418 P.3d 478; In re Colo. Gen. Assemb., 332 P.3d 108 (Colo. 2011); In re Reapportionment of Colo. Gen. Assemb., 647 P.2d 191 (Colo. 1982).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶3 After permitting President Trump and the Colorado Republican State Central Committee ("CRSCC"; collectively, "Intervenors") to intervene in the action below, the district court conducted a five-day trial. The court found by clear and convincing evidence that President Trump engaged in insurrection as those terms are used in Section Three. Anderson v. Griswold, No. 23CV32577, ¶¶ 241, 298 (Dist. Ct., City & Cnty. of Denver, Nov. 17, 2023). But, the district court concluded, Section Three does not apply to the President. Id. at ¶ 313. Therefore, the court denied the petition to keep President Trump off the presidential primary ballot. Id. at Part VI. Conclusion.

¶4 The Electors and President Trump sought this court's review of various rulings by the district court. We affirm in part and reverse in part. We hold as follows:

- The Election Code allows the Electors to challenge President Trump's status as a qualified candidate based on Section Three. Indeed, the Election Code provides the Electors their only viable means of litigating whether President Trump is disqualified from holding office under Section Three.
- Congress does not need to pass implementing legislation for Section Three's disqualification provision to attach, and Section Three is, in that sense, self-executing.
- Judicial review of President Trump's eligibility for office under Section Three is not precluded by the political question doctrine.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

- Section Three encompasses the office of the Presidency and someone who has taken an oath as President. On this point, the district court committed reversible error.
- The district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting portions of Congress's January 6 Report into evidence at trial.
- The district court did not err in concluding that the events at the U.S. Capitol on January 6, 2021, constituted an "insurrection."
- The district court did not err in concluding that President Trump "engaged in" that insurrection through his personal actions.
- President Trump's speech inciting the crowd that breached the U.S. Capitol on January 6, 2021, was not protected by the First Amendment.

¶5 The sum of these parts is this: President Trump is disqualified from holding the office of President under Section Three; because he is disqualified, it would be a wrongful act under the Election Code for the Secretary to list him as a candidate on the presidential primary ballot.

¶6 We do not reach these conclusions lightly. We are mindful of the magnitude and weight of the questions now before us. We are likewise mindful of our solemn duty to apply the law, without fear or favor, and without being swayed by public reaction to the decisions that the law mandates we reach.

¶7 We are also cognizant that we travel in uncharted territory, and that this case presents several issues of first impression. But for our resolution of the Electors' challenge under the Election Code, the Secretary would be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Therefore, to maintain the status quo pending any review by the U.S. Supreme Court, we stay our ruling until January 4, 2024 (the day before the Secretary's deadline to certify the content of the presidential primary ballot). If review is sought in the Supreme Court before the stay expires on January 4, 2024, then the stay shall remain in place, and the Secretary will continue to be required to include President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot, until the receipt of any order or mandate from the Supreme Court.

I. Background

¶8 On November 8, 2016, President Trump was elected as the forty-fifth President of the United States. He served in that role for four years.

¶9 On November 7, 2020, Joseph R. Biden, Jr., was elected as the forty-sixth President of the United States. President Trump refused to accept the results, but President Biden now occupies the office of the President.

¶10 On December 14, 2020, the Electoral College officially confirmed the results: 306 electoral votes for President Biden; 232 for President Trump. President Trump continued to challenge the outcome, both in the courts and in the media.

¶11 On January 6, 2021, pursuant to the Twelfth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XII, and the Electoral Count Act, 3 U.S.C. § 15, Congress convened a joint session to certify the Electoral College votes. President Trump held a rally that morning at the Ellipse in Washington, D.C. at which he, along with several others, spoke to the attendees. In his speech, which began around noon, President Trump persisted in rejecting the election results, telling his supporters that "[w]e won in a landslide" and "we will never concede." He urged his supporters to "confront this egregious assault on our democracy"; "walk down to the Capitol . . . [and] show strength"; and that if they did not "fight like hell, [they would] not . . . have a country anymore." Before his speech ended, portions of the crowd began moving toward the Capitol. Below, we discuss additional facts regarding the events of January 6, as relevant to the legal issues before us.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶12 Just before 4 a.m. the next morning, January 7, 2021, Vice President Michael R. Pence certified the electoral votes, officially confirming President Biden as President-elect of the United States.

¶13 President Trump now seeks the Colorado Republican Party's 2024 presidential nomination.

II. Procedural History

¶14 On September 6, 2023, the Electors initiated these proceedings against the Secretary in Denver District Court under sections 1-4-1204(4), 1-1-113(1), 13-51-105, C.R.S. (2023), and C.R.C.P. 57(a). In their Verified Petition, the Electors challenged the Secretary's authority to list President Trump "as a candidate on the 2024 Republican presidential primary election ballot and any future election ballot, based on his disqualification from public office under Section [Three]."

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶15 President Trump intervened and almost immediately filed a Notice of Removal to federal court, asserting federal question jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1441(a), 1446. In light of the removal, the Denver District Court closed the case on September 8. On September 12, the federal district court remanded the case back to state court, concluding that it lacked jurisdiction because the Electors had no Article III standing and the Secretary had neither joined nor consented to the removal.

¶16 Once the Electors filed proof with the Denver District Court that all parties had been served, the court reopened the case on September 14. At a status conference four days later, on September 18, the Secretary emphasized that she must certify the candidates for the 2024 presidential primary ballot by January 5. See § 1-4-1204(1). The court set the matter for a five-day trial, beginning on October 30. On September 22, with the parties' input, the court issued expedited case management deadlines for a host of matters, including the disclosure of expert reports, witness lists and exhibits, as well as for briefing and argument on several motions. The court also granted CRSCC's motion to intervene on October 5.

¶17 On October 11, the Secretary's office received (1) President Trump's signed and notarized statement of intent to run as a candidate for a major political party in the presidential primary; (2) the approval form for him to do so, signed by the chair of the Colorado Republican Party, asserting that President Trump was "bona fide and affiliated with the [Republican] party"; and (3) the requisite filing fee. See § 1-4-1204(1)(c).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶18 On October 20, the district court issued an Omnibus Order addressing many outstanding motions. Regarding President Trump's motions, the court reached three conclusions that are relevant now: (1) the Electors' petition involved constitutional questions, but remained "a challenge against an election official based on her alleged duties under the Election Code," and "such a claim [was] proper under [section] 1-1-113 as a matter of procedure"; (2) "[section] 1-4-1204 expressly incorporates [section] 1-1-113, and [section] 1-1-113 does not limit challenges to acts that have already occurred, but rather provides for relief when the Secretary is 'about to' take an improper or wrongful act"—thus, because the Electors had alleged such an act, the matter was ripe for decision; and (3) it could not conclude, as a matter of law, that the Fourteenth Amendment excludes a candidate from the presidential primary ballot or that the Secretary has the authority to determine candidate qualifications, so those issues would be determined at the trial.

¶19 Regarding CRSCC's motions, the court, in relevant part, concluded that the state does not violate a political party's First Amendment associational rights by excluding constitutionally ineligible candidates from the presidential primary ballot, but also rejected CRSCC's argument to the extent it purported to raise an independent constitutional claim beyond the proper scope of a section 1-1-113 proceeding.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶20 On October 23, President Trump filed a petition for review in this court, asking us to exercise original jurisdiction to halt the scheduled trial. Four days later, we denied the petition without passing judgment on the merits of any of President Trump's contentions.

¶21 On October 25, the district court denied President Trump's Fourteenth-Amendment-based motion to dismiss. As relevant now, the court concluded that (1) it would not dismiss the case under the political question doctrine, but it reserved the right to revisit the doctrine "to the extent that there is any evidence or argument at trial that provides the Court with additional guidance on whether the issue of presidential eligibility has been delegated to the United States Congress"; (2) whether Section Three is self-executing is irrelevant because section 1-4-1204 allows the Secretary to exclude constitutionally disqualified candidates, and states "can, and have, applied Section [Three] pursuant to state statutes without federal enforcement legislation"; and (3) it would reserve for trial the issues of whether Section Three applies to a President and whether President Trump had engaged in insurrection.

¶22 The trial began, as scheduled, on October 30. The evidentiary portion lasted five days, with closing arguments almost two weeks later, on November 15.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

During those two weeks, the Electors, the Secretary, President Trump, and CRSCC submitted proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court issued its written final order on November 17, finding, by clear and convincing evidence, that the events of January 6 constituted an insurrection and President Trump engaged in that insurrection. The court further concluded, however, that Section Three does not apply to a President because, as the terms are used in Section Three, the Presidency is not an "office . . . under the United States" nor is the President "an officer of the United States" who had "previously taken an oath . . . to support the Constitution of the United States." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3; see Anderson, ¶¶ 299–315. Accordingly, the Secretary could not exclude President Trump's name from the presidential primary ballot. Anderson, Part VI. Conclusion.

¶23 On November 20, both the Electors and President Trump sought this court's review of the district court's rulings under section 1-1-113(3). We accepted jurisdiction of the parties' cross-petitions. Following extensive briefing from the parties and over a dozen amici, we held oral argument on December 6 and now issue this ruling.

III. Analysis

¶24 We begin with an overview of Section Three. We then address threshold questions regarding (1) whether the Election Code provides a basis for review of the Electors' claim, (2) whether Section Three requires implementing legislation

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

before its disqualification provision attaches, and (3) whether Section Three poses a nonjusticiable political question. After concluding that these threshold issues do not prevent us from reaching the merits, we consider whether Section Three applies to a President. Concluding that it does, we address the admissibility of Congress's January 6 Report (the "Report") before reviewing, and ultimately upholding, the district court's findings of fact and conclusions of law in support of its determination that President Trump engaged in insurrection. Lastly, we consider and reject President Trump's argument that his speech on January 6 was protected by the First Amendment.[2]

A. Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment and Principles of Constitutional Interpretation

¶25 The end of the Civil War brought what one author has termed a "second founding" of the United States of America. See Eric Foner, The Second Founding: How the Civil War and Reconstruction Remade the Constitution (2019). Reconstruction ushered in the Fourteenth Amendment, which includes Section Three, a provision

[2] President Trump also listed a challenge to the traditional evidentiary standard of proof for issues arising under the Election Code as a potential question on appeal, claiming that "[w]hen particularly important individual interests such as a constitutional right [is] at issue, the proper standard of proof requires more than a preponderance of the evidence." As noted above, the district court held that the Electors proved their challenge by clear and convincing evidence. And because President Trump chose not to brief this issue, he has abandoned it. See People v. Eckley, 775 P.2d 566, 570 (Colo. 1989).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

addressing what to do with those individuals who held positions of political power before the war, fought on the side of the Confederacy, and then sought to return to those positions. See National Archives, 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution: Civil Rights (1868), https://www.archives.gov/milestone-documents/14th-amendment#:~:text=Passed%20by%20Congress%20June%2013,Rights%20to%20formerly%20enslaved%20people [https://perma.cc/5EZU-ABV3] (explaining that the Fourteenth Amendment was passed by Congress on June 13, 1866, and officially ratified on July 9, 1868); see also Gerard N. Magliocca, Amnesty and Section Three of the Fourteenth Amendment, 36 Const. Comment. 87, 91–92 (2021).

¶26 Section Three provides:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 3.

¶27 In interpreting a constitutional provision, our goal is to prevent the evasion of the provision's legitimate operation and to effectuate the drafters' intent. People v. Smith, 2023 CO 40, ¶ 20, 531 P.3d 1051, 1055. To do so, we begin with

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section Three's plain language, giving its terms their ordinary and popular meanings. Id. "To discern such meanings, we may consult dictionary definitions." Id.

¶28 If the language is clear and unambiguous, then we enforce it as written, and we need not turn to other tools of construction. Id. at ¶ 21, 531 P.3d at 1055. However, if the provision's language is reasonably susceptible of multiple interpretations, then it is ambiguous, and we may consider "the textual, structural, and historical evidence put forward by the parties," Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189, 201 (2012), and we will construe the provision "in light of the objective sought to be achieved and the mischief to be avoided," Smith, ¶ 20, 531 P.3d at 1055 (quoting Colo. Ethics Watch v. Senate Majority Fund, LLC, 2012 CO 12, ¶ 20, 269 P.3d 1248, 1254).

¶29 These principles of constitutional interpretation apply to all sections of this opinion in which we address the meaning of any constitutional provision.

B. The State Court Has the Authority to Adjudicate a Challenge to Presidential Candidate Qualifications Under the Election Code

¶30 The Electors' claim is grounded in sections 1-4-1204 and 1-1-113 of the Election Code. They argue that it would be a breach of duty or other wrongful act under the Election Code for the Secretary to place President Trump on the presidential primary ballot because he is not a "qualified candidate" based on

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

Section Three's disqualification. § 1-4-1203(2)(a), C.R.S. (2023). The Electors therefore seek an order pursuant to section 1-1-113 directing the Secretary not to list President Trump on the presidential primary ballot for the election to be held on March 5, 2024 (or any future ballot).

¶31 President Trump and CRSCC contend that Colorado courts lack jurisdiction over the Electors' claim and that the Electors cannot state a proper section 1-1-113 claim, in part because the Electors' claim is a "constitutional claim" that cannot be raised in a section 1-1-113 action under this court's decisions in Frazier v. Williams, 2017 CO 85, 401 P.3d 541, and Kuhn v. Williams, 2018 CO 30M, 418 P.3d 478 (per curiam). CRSCC also argues that the Secretary lacks authority to interfere with a political party's decision-making process or to interfere with the party's First Amendment right of association to select its own candidates. Lastly, President Trump argues that the expedited procedures under section 1-1-113 are insufficient to evaluate the Electors' claim.

¶32 Before considering each of these arguments in turn, we first explain the standard of review for statutory interpretation and then provide an overview of the Election Code provisions at issue. Turning to Intervenors' contentions, we first conclude that the district court had jurisdiction to adjudicate the Electors' claim under section 1-1-113. But, recognizing that the ability to exercise jurisdiction here does not mean the Electors can state a proper claim under section 1-1-113, we explore whether states have the constitutional power to assess presidential qualifications. We conclude that they do, provided their legislatures have established such authority by statute. Analyzing the relevant provisions of the Election Code, we then conclude that the General Assembly has given Colorado courts the authority to assess presidential qualifications and, therefore, that the Electors have stated a proper claim under sections 1-4-1204 and 1-1-113. We next address Intervenors' related arguments and conclude that limiting the presidential primary ballot to constitutionally qualified candidates does not interfere with CRSCC's associational rights under the First Amendment. Finally, we conclude that section 1-1-113 provides sufficient due process for evaluating whether a candidate satisfies the constitutional qualifications for the office he or she seeks.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

1. Standard of Review

¶33 We review the district court's interpretation of the relevant statutes de novo. Griswold v. Ferrigno Warren, 2020 CO 34, ¶ 16, 462 P.3d 1081, 1084. In doing so, "[o]ur primary objective is to effectuate the intent of the General Assembly by looking to the plain meaning of the language used, considered within the context of the statute as a whole." Mook v. Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs, 2020 CO 12, ¶ 24, 457 P.3d 568, 574 (alteration in original) (quoting Bly v. Story, 241 P.3d 529, 533 (Colo. 2010)). When a term is undefined, "we construe a statutory term in accordance with its ordinary or natural meaning." Id. (quoting Cowen v. People, 2018 CO 96, ¶ 14,

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

431 P.3d 215, 218). If the language is clear, we apply it as written. Ferrigno Warren, ¶ 16, 462 P.3d at 1084.

¶34 If, however, the language is reasonably susceptible of multiple interpretations, we may turn to other tools of construction to guide our interpretation. Cowen, ¶ 12, 431 P.3d at 218. These may include consideration of the purpose of the statute, the circumstances under which the statute was enacted, the legislative history, and the consequences of a particular construction. § 2-4-203(1), C.R.S. (2023). We also avoid constructions that would yield illogical or absurd results. Educhildren LLC v. Cnty. of Douglas Bd. of Equalization, 2023 CO 29, ¶ 27, 531 P.3d 986, 993.

2. Presidential Primaries Under the Election Code

¶35 Before addressing the merits, we provide a brief overview of the Election Code's provisions relating to presidential primary elections. Article VII, Section 11 of the Colorado Constitution commands the General Assembly to "pass laws to secure the purity of elections, and guard against abuses of the elective franchise." Pursuant to this constitutional mandate, the Secretary's duties under the Election Code include supervising the conduct of primary and general elections in the state and enforcing the provisions of the Election Code. § 1-1-107(1)(a)–(b), (5), C.R.S. (2023).

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶36 Part 12 of article 4 of the Election Code governs presidential primary elections. See generally §§ 1-4-1201 to -1207, C.R.S. (2023).[3] Section 1-4-1201, C.R.S. (2023), explains that "it is the intent of the People of the State of Colorado that the provisions of this part 12 conform to the requirements of federal law and national political party rules governing presidential primary elections." This reference indicates that the legislature envisioned part 12 as operating in harmony with

---

[3] Before 1990, Colorado's political parties used caucuses to nominate their presidential candidates. That year, Colorado voters adopted a referred measure establishing presidential primary elections. See generally Ch. 42, sec. 1–2, §§ 1-4-1101 to -1104, 1990 Colo. Sess. Laws 311, 311–13. The legislature later amended these statutes as part of a 1992 repeal and reenactment of the Election Code. See Ch. 118, sec. 7, §§ 1-4-1201 to -1207, 1992 Colo. Sess. Laws 624, 696–99. These amendments added the precursor to current section 1-4-1204(4): they permitted "challenges concerning the right of any candidate's name to appear on the ballot of the presidential primary election" but directed the Secretary (not a court) to hear and assess the validity of such challenges. Ch. 118, sec. 7, § 1-4-1203(4), 1992 Colo. Sess. Laws at 697–98.

Colorado eliminated presidential primary elections in 2003. Ch. 24, sec. 6, 2003 Colo. Sess. Laws 495, 496. In 2016, however, voters restored such elections through Proposition 107, a citizen-initiated measure. Proposition 107, Ballot Initiative No. 140, https://www.coloradosos.gov/pubs/elections/Initiatives/titleBoard/filings/2015-2016/140Final.pdf [https://perma.cc/7TX8-J59L]. Proposition 107 largely preserved the pre-2003 version of section 1-4-1204(4) that vested the Secretary with the power to hear challenges to the listing of presidential primary candidates. Id. at 61. In a 2017 clean-up bill, the General Assembly adopted several amendments to the citizen-initiated measure "to facilitate the effective implementation of the state's election laws." S.B. 17-305, 71st Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Colo. 2017). Relevant here, the legislature directed challenges under section 1-4-1204(4) away from the Secretary and instead to the district court through section 1-1-113 proceedings. Id. at 4–5. Section 1-4-1204(4) has remained otherwise unchanged since its reenactment.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

federal law, including requirements governing presidential primary elections. As such, it is instructive when interpreting other provisions of part 12.

¶37 The Election Code limits participation in the presidential primary to "qualified" candidates. § 1-4-1203(2)(a) ("[E]ach political party that has a qualified candidate . . . is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election."[4] (emphasis added)); see also §§ 1-4-1101(1), -1205, C.R.S. (2023) (allowing a write-in candidate to participate in the presidential primary election if he or she submits an affidavit stating he or she is "qualified to assume" the duties of the office if elected). As a practical matter, the mechanism through which a presidential primary hopeful attests that he or she is a "qualified candidate" is the "statement of intent" (or "affidavit of intent") filed with the Secretary.[5] See § 1-4-1204(1)(c) (requiring candidates to submit to the Secretary a notarized "statement of intent"); § 1-4-1205 (requiring a write-in candidate to file a notarized

---

[4] In full, the quoted language reads: "[E]ach political party that has a qualified candidate entitled to participate in the presidential primary election pursuant to this section is entitled to participate in the Colorado presidential primary election." § 1-4-1203(2)(a). The phrase "pursuant to this section" sheds no light on the meaning of "qualified candidate." Section 1-4-1203 simply establishes the mechanics of presidential primaries, such as the date of the primary, elector party affiliation rules, and the content of primary ballots. § 1-4-1203(1), (2)(a), (4). Thus, "pursuant to this section" modifies the "presidential primary election" in which qualified candidates are entitled to participate: an election conducted in accordance with section 1-4-1203.

[5] In this context, the legislature appears to have used "statement" and "affidavit" interchangeably.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

"statement of intent" in order for votes to be counted for that candidate and stating that "such affidavit" must be accompanied by the requisite filing fee).

¶38 The Secretary's statement-of-intent form for a major party presidential primary candidate requires the candidate to affirm via checkboxes that he or she meets the qualifications set forth in Article II of the U.S. Constitution for the office of President; specifically, that the candidate is at least thirty-five years old, has been a resident of the United States for at least fourteen years, and is a natural-born U.S. citizen. Colo. Sec'y of State, Major Party Candidate Statement of Intent for Presidential Primary, https://www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/elections/Candidates/files/MajorPartyCandidateStatementOfIntentForPresidentialPrimary.pdf [https://perma.cc/YA3X-3K9T] ("Intent Form"); see also U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 5. The form further requires the candidate to sign an affirmation that states, "I intend to run for the office stated above and solemnly affirm that I meet all qualifications for the office prescribed by law."[6] Intent Form, supra (emphasis added). No party has challenged the Secretary's authority to require candidates to provide this information on the statement-of-intent form.

---

[6] The Affidavit of Intent for write-in candidates for the presidential primary has the same requirements. Affidavit of Intent for Presidential Primary Write-In Designation, Colo. Sec'y of State (last updated June 20, 2023), https://www.sos.state.co.us/pubs/elections/Candidates/files/PresidentialPrimaryWrite-In.pdf [https://perma.cc/V83P-HLAD].

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶39 Section 1-4-1204(1) requires the Secretary to "certify the names and party affiliations of the candidates to be placed on any presidential primary election ballots" not later than sixty days before the presidential primary election. For the 2024 election cycle, that deadline is January 5, 2024.

¶40 Section 1-4-1204(1) further states:

> The only candidates whose names shall be placed on ballots for the election shall be those candidates who:
>
> . . . .
>
> (b) Are seeking the nomination for president of a political party as a bona fide candidate for president of the United States pursuant to political party rules and are affiliated with a major political party that received at least twenty percent of the votes cast by eligible electors in Colorado at the last presidential election; and
>
> (c) Have submitted to the secretary not later than eighty-five days before the date of the presidential primary election, a notarized candidate's statement of intent together with either a nonrefundable filing fee of five hundred dollars or a petition signed by at least five thousand eligible electors . . . .

For the 2024 election cycle, the deadline to submit these items was December 11, 2023.

¶41 Section 1-4-1204(4) allows for "challenge[s] to the listing of any candidate on the presidential primary election ballot." Any such challenge must be brought "no later than five days after the filing deadline for candidates" and "must provide notice . . . of the alleged impropriety that gives rise to the complaint." Id. The district court must hold a hearing no later than five days after the challenge is filed to "assess the validity of all alleged improprieties." Id. The statute does not limit the length or content of the hearing; it does, however, require the district court to issue findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than forty-eight hours after the hearing concludes. Id. "The party filing the challenge has the burden to sustain the challenge by a preponderance of the evidence." Id.

Obtained by Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Michigan FOIA

¶42 Challenges under section 1-4-1204(4) must be brought through the special statutory procedure found in section 1-1-113 for adjudicating controversies that arise under the Election Code. § 1-4-1204(4) (providing that any challenge to the listing of a candidate on the presidential primary ballot "must be made in writing and filed with the district court in accordance with section 1-1-113(1)" and "any order entered by the district court may be reviewed [by the supreme court] in accordance with section 1-1-113(3)").

